THE POLICE.—We now bring our remarks on the Police to a close. Last week we gave the general outline of Mr. Halliday's bold and vigorous plan of Police reform, and are happy to find that it meets generally with the approbation of the public writers at this Presidency. We have now only to notice the three minor questions of the River, the Cantonment and the Metropolitan Police.

Nothing can be more defective than our River Police, except it be the Band Police. The range of country embraced by the Report contains more than two thousand miles of navigable river communication, which is constantly covered with the richest freights. The traffic of the Lower Provinces, and more especially of the great emporium of Calcutta, is carried on chiefly by water; there is not a tithe of the goods which the metropolis receives or distributes, which is not conveyed through the high ways of commerce, with which Providence has so abundantly furnished the country in its numberless streams. The property afloat on our rivers may be counted by crores, rather than by lakhs. Yet the fixed establishment of boats for the protection of this vast commerce, and for the security of thirty-two districts, containing a population of thirty millions, is only fifty-four, with forty-one temporary vessels; and the sum expended by Government in the department of River Police amounts to the large sum of three thousand two hundred and ninety-nine Rupees a month! Were this sum paid to honest and faithful men, it would still be found miserably inadequate to the interests to be protected; but, unfortunately, the River Police is quite as useless to the community as the Land Police. Happy is the vessel which can escape its terrible protection. It is stated on good authority, in Mr. Halliday's Minute, that the worst decoits in the neighbourhood of the Sunderbuns are the Thannah Guard Boats, and this testimony will be freely corroborated by every one who has any experience on this subject. Mr. Halliday proposes to incorporate the River Police with his own reformed system; to improve its organization, its pay and its efficiency; to divide the vessels into squadrons, each consisting of five boats; one for the Inspector; and the other four to be employed continually in cruising up and down within the beat. Assuming the number of miles included in the lines of communication at 2,285, he proposes to raise 24 squadrons of boats, at an annual expense, exceeding the present outlay, of Rs. 1,38,136.

• The Cantonment Police requires as much improvement as any other branch. It is under the superintendence of a Commissioned Officer, who is called the Superintendent of the Betting Bazar. His jurisdiction is limited to the circle of the Cantonment; beyond which, the Police authority is vested in the Magistrate of the District, and the Cantonment Police is thereby rendered totally inefficient. To take that of Dum Dum for instance, with its wild, undisciplined recruits. These "undisciplined, incontinent youths," as Brigadier Faithful styles them, are allured into the joints of vice and infamy, which have been established around it, just beyond the line of Military control; and hence the atrocities of the Cantonment is unquestionably the worst portion of it. The Brigadier says,

"I would also beg to mention to the Committee that Bazzars have lately been erected and are increasing just without the boundary line of the Cantonments, over which neither the Commanding Officer nor the Superintendent of the Bazar has the slightest authority or control. Every Native wishing to set Military authority at defiance, either to sell liquor, receive the Soldier's kit, which the disaffected characters will sell for a trifle, locate in these places, in preference to coming into the Military Bazaar. Not only these people, but the servants of the Soldiers and of the Officers do the same, as they are then beyond all immediate and Military control. I estimate the Native population in these Bazzars at five thousand persons."

"What I would wish to impress upon the Committee is this, that nearly all the inhabitants residing in the Bazzars immediately on the boundary of the Cantonments, have gradually increased to their present extent, in consequence of the wants and necessities of the persons residing within the Cantonments, and that there is an absolute necessity for bringing them under the same prompt control that takes place within the Cantonments; and until this is done, I do not see that it is practicable for any Commanding Officer to keep that good order within the Cantonments that is necessary for its efficiency."

The Brigadier suggests, that the Military Superintendent of Police in the Cantonment, and the Assistant Adjutant General of Artillery, should be Joint Magistrates of the 24 Pargannahs, and should be able to apprehend offenders within four miles of the Cantonments. Mr. Halliday's plan is thus expressed by himself:

"I shall only follow out and apply the Brigadier's intelligent propositions if I connect the Office of the Cantonments with that of the Country at large, by extending to Military Stations the same principles of application of functions and of uniform subordination which are the foundation of the present plan."

"The mode of doing this will vary in different Cantonments, and of course a smaller addition to the establishment will be required in some Stations than in others. Generally, however, it would be necessary to station a Local Judge (or Sudder Ameer,) Native or European, in a Cantonment to adjudicate to a certain extent cases not Military within that Cantonment, and in a circle of country round it; and an Assistant Superintendent, with an adequate force of Police," would be required in addition to the establishment of Officers, for which I have already provided."

As it regards the Police of Calcutta, in which the Judicial and Executive functions have already been separated, to the great advantage of the administration of justice, Mr. Halliday proposes that it should be placed under the Superintendent General of Police, and be incorporated with the general system. "In the Districts which immediately surround the Metropolis, the greater crimes all emanate from the Capital, and the Magistrates of the neighbouring Zillahs well know the secure retreat which Calcutta affords to Dacoits, after the commission of robberies in the suburbs." And in like manner it may be said, the Magistrates of Calcutta know well how secure a retreat for crime is afforded by the suburbs to which their authority does not extend. By drawing this line of demarcation around the Capital, both the Police of the neighbourhood and of Calcutta is weakened, and nothing is gained but an impunity for crime.

* In Stations where European Corps are quartered, European Constables would be required.

In the arrest of culprits time is of the last importance. At present, during the precious moments that are wasted in applications to other Magistrates, and in issuing the process of arrest, offenders find the most ample security; and are enabled to play a kind of hide and seek game with the authorities on either side of the Mahratta Ditch. If it has been found necessary for the perfection of the Police in London, to break down its ancient municipal barrier, how much more necessary must it be in Calcutta, where our arrangements are so very defective, and our Native agency so superlatively corrupt. The establishment of a separate Police for Calcutta is based upon no ancient prescription, or municipal privilege; it was adopted for the greater benefit of the Metropolis, and for the higher security of its vast population and property. The object which dictated the former arrangement now calls for a modification of it. A more efficient and a better connected plan is now required, in order to wipe out the disgrace which has so long hung upon the Metropolitan Police, and to cast into oblivion the homely observation, that the only reason why the Police of Calcutta is not the worst in the world, is because there is no Police at all.

Mr. Halliday closes his Minute with the following summary of the principal alterations he proposes to make:—

"1. To discover the Judicial from the Executive functions of Magistracy, and to vest the former in Civil and Criminal Judges and Sudder Ameen, and the latter in the Officers of Police.

2. To take into the hands of Government the funds now applicable for the payments of Village Police, and adding to them the amount now expended on the Police, to organize a complete and connected body of Police Officers, under the controul of a Superintendent General.

3. To establish as a part of the same system, and in full communication with and subordination to the same heads, an organized River Police on the chief lines of water communication throughout the Provinces.

4. To extend this system without interruption over the Lower Provinces, by incorporating and assimilating with it the Establishments of Cantonment Police.

5. To bring under the same head and the same system of controul the Police of Calcutta, making in its organization such slight changes as are required to assimilate it with the Police force proposed for the rest of the country.

6. If possible to complete the unity of the Police Establishment by amalgamating with it the Preventive Service of the Opium and Salt Departments.

7. To separate the Magistracies from the Collectorships, making the consequent necessary alteration in the gradation of the Civil Service, and causing the office of Collector to be an introduction to Judicial duties.

8. To alter the subordinate Judicial Establishment, by abolishing the office of Moonsiff, and appointing a Sudder Ameen to every Moonsiff's jurisdiction, and two to every chief Sudder Station, the salaries of these Officers to rise gradually from 250 Rupees per mensem to 600 Rupees, exclusive of Establishment allowances.

9. To make European British subjects in like manner with Natives, and in all cases, but capital felonies, amenable to the local Jurisdictions."

The additional expense to which this vigorous system of Police is likely to put the country, is estimated at about two lakhs and eighty thousand Rupees.

Mr. Bird, the Chairman of the Committee, has recorded his opinion of Mr. Halliday's plan in a separate Minute, from which we gather that he is unfavourable to its adoption, chiefly, however, upon the ground, that the funds with which it is to be built up, are not available. Mr. Bird says,

"I have read Mr. Halliday's Minute. The plan proposed in it is founded entirely on the assumption that the native community in general, and the Zemindars in particular, would gladly agree to the imposition of a Police Commutation Tax, to the annual amount of more than 60 lakhs of rupees—an assumption which appears to me to be totally without foundation."

"There are many other grave and important objections to the plan, but as I consider the difficulty of raising voluntarily the sum of 60 lakhs of rupees a year, without which it cannot be introduced, to be insurmountable, it would be giving unnecessary trouble until that difficulty has been overcome, to enter into any further discussion on the subject."

But it should be remembered, that Mr. Halliday proposes, no sudden and sweeping alteration in the mode of raising the tax which the people now pay for the Police. He would not alarm the public mind by any startling innovation. He himself requires that it be introduced gradually, by as slow degrees as may be thought necessary. He says, "this is in fact the mode in which it should be introduced. A few districts should be selected, and the commutation made. If it fails, there is no great harm done, and the old system must be at once reverted to." Surely the plan which he has sketched out, is worthy at least of this moderate trial.

Nor must it be forgotten that the plan of the Committee;—the attempt which they propose to make, "to reform the old system before they introduce a new one," carries with it quite as much innovation as that of Mr. Halliday. The reform which they propose is, indeed, a radical one. "The village establishments are to be carefully revised; an adequate allowance is to be assigned to each watchman; which may be done by a new allotment of the allowances, whether in money or land, by reducing the number, in order to increase their pay, by recovering lands which have been misappropriated, or resumed by the Zemindars, and substituting a money payment on the part of the Zemindar, wherever it may be practicable; in fact by re-organizing the whole establishment." Really for boldness of innovation we think the re-organization of the Committee quite a match for that which Mr. Halliday proposes. Indeed when it is considered that, in addition to these fundamental alterations which must interfere so essentially with every branch of the present economy, it is proposed to advance one fearful step farther, and to take the management of one hundred and seventy thousand Police Officers out of the hands of Government, and lodge it in the hands of the Zemindar, who may be a minor, or a defaulter, or an absentee, we almost feel astonished at the moderation of Mr. Halliday's changes. The difference between the plan which he has suggested, and that of the Committee, does not consist in the amount of alterations which they respectively advocate, but in the plan to which they are to be rendered auxiliary. The plan of the Committee proposes to resign the command of the constabulary force to the landholders; that of Mr. Halliday to retain it in the hands of Government, and to give it a new and superior organization. We think Mr. Halliday will have on his side the suffrages of the community, as he has already, the testimony of experience. We have clear and unequivocal evidence in the case of the Thugs, of what may be done for the suppression of crime when Government takes the field with an adequate and well directed force. We have seen the system for the suppression of this vice, organized under one head, and directed by one impulse; and we have witnessed with what ease Major Sleeman's Assistants have tracked criminals through the whole extent of India, and arrested them a thousand miles from the Head Quarters of the Superintendent. Had that officer been constrained to wait for the co-operation of the Native community, long, indeed, would it have been before this crime would have been eradicated. Government depended on its own resources, and the good work has been completed. The Thugs, as an organized body of murderers, have become extinct. We require for the general Police an executive system, similar to that which has been found so effectual against this branch of crime. We cannot but consider it an auspicious circumstance, that Major Sleeman should have had an opportunity of demonstrating what may be effected for the Police of the country, independent on the co-operation of the people, by wise and energetic measures, just at the time when the necessity of a general reform through every department had forced itself on the notice of Government.

THE CULNA AFFAIR.—The trial of Pertaub Chund, the claimant of the Bardwan estates, has terminated in a manner not quite so satisfactory as could have been wished. A difference of opinion has arisen between the Civil and Session Judge and his Mahomedan Assessor, and the question has been referred to the Nizamut Adawlut, the highest Court of Appeal in the country. The opinions of the two Judges, as far as they are known, have been published in a letter addressed to the Hurkaru, from which we have transferred them to our own columns. The European Judge is of opinion, that the charge of fraudulent personation has been fully brought home to the prisoner, and that he is liable to a sentence of imprisonment. The Moulavee is of opinion that he is neither Pertaub Chund, nor Kisto Laul, which in fact is no opinion at all. For if he be not Pertaub Chund, he must, even in the Moulavee's judgement, be guilty of a criminal act in having endeavoured, under this false representation, to obtain the property of others. Meanwhile the prisoner is liberated on bail, and has returned to Calcutta with Mr. Shaw, his Attorney.

The object which Government proposed to itself in the present proceedings, cannot strictly be said to be defeated, unless the Nizamut Adawlut should consider the charge of personation, which the friends of the Pretender soften down into the "question of his identity," as a matter for the Civil Courts. We cannot see that, in the course which has been pursued, any blame or dishonour can be attached to the public authorities. It must always have been a matter of comparative indifference to Government who enjoyed the Bardwan estate. The soi-disant Pertaub Chund, if he paid his rents regularly, would have been quite as agreeable a Rajah as Mataup Chund; and if the Pretender had, on his appearance, instituted a suit in the Courts for the recovery of his rights in the mode laid down by law, there would have been no cause for the interference of Government. But it was a matter of paramount necessity that the peace of the country should be preserved. That the public tranquillity was endangered by his roaming through the country at the head of a rabble, advancing the most ambitious pretensions, and keeping up the strongest feeling of excitement in the public mind, will not admit of a doubt. It became a bounden duty to bring his pretensions to the earliest issue; and hence it was determined that the charge on which he was to be tried, in reference to the Culna affair, should be so framed, as to bring the general question of his claims to an immediate decision. If, in this examination, his pretensions were found to be unsupported by legal evidence, the fact of his imposture would have been publicly proclaimed, and the Native mind would have been at once disabused. If, on the contrary, he had been able to substantiate his claims, the charge against him would have fallen to the ground, and he would have been placed in a most advantageous position for quietly prosecuting his claims in a Civil Court. In either case the object of Government would have been secured. But the general excitement which the case had kindled, rendered it a matter of little doubt, that no course which Government could have pursued, would have received the approval of those who advocate his cause. We think, however, that those who advised the fair and impartial trial which the prisoner has enjoyed, have the satisfaction of having conscientiously discharged a great public duty, and may overlook the virulence of party enmity.

If the Nizamut Adawlut should refuse to decide upon the question now submitted to it, under the idea that it is a matter of civil jurisprudence, it is much to be desired that Government would withdraw from all further interference, and allow Poran Bahoo and Radhakissen Byrack to run the gauntlet of the Courts. As to the idea of instituting a Special Commission to try the dispute about the soi-disant Pertaub Chund's identity, it is not to be thought of. It would be inconsistent with the dignity of Government, and could only be viewed as holding out a premium for imposture. If the point at issue be altogether of a civil character, there can be no justifiable reason for taking it out of the hands of the regular Courts, and submitting it to a distinct and extraordinary tribunal. Let the parties fight their own battles in the Civil Courts. The cause is not likely to be brought to a final issue in this country. Whether the claim for the restitution of the estates be brought in the Queen's or in the Company's Courts, the vanquished party will be sure to appeal it to the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, and to Her most Honourable Privy Council. It is in England, therefore, that the great point will be eventually determined, whether Mr. Shaw's client be the Real Rajah or not. It would be a pity to disturb the prospect of that luxuriant legal harvest, which this rich cause holds out, both in India and in England. Let it be allowed to run its fertilizing course through the various Courts, till it terminates in the Cock-pit.

THE TINNEVELLY MISSION.—In the Madras Missionary Register for October, which we received a short time ago, there appears a communication from Messrs. Schaffter and Muller, announcing the dissolution of the Tinnevelly Mission. The difficulties with which the Missionaries have had to contend, now greatly aggravated by the unexpected, and greatly lamented death of the excellent Rheinius, together with an unfeigned desire to see divisions healed, induced them to attempt a reunion with the Church Missionary Society. The Madras Corresponding Committee of that Society received the proposition with joy, but stated "that they could not connect themselves with clergymen who had received their ordination from the Church of England, (which is the case with Messrs Muller and Lechler) unless they consented to consider themselves as placed under the Bishop of the Diocese, and subject to his authority in every respect, as are other clergymen of the Church of England. With respect to Mr. Schaffter, being a Lutheran Clergyman, they stated that they saw nothing to prevent his standing to them in the same relation as he did previously to the separation."

Mr. Schaffter felt no difficulty in again connecting himself, on such terms, with the Church Missionary Society; but conscientious reasons prevented Mr. Muller's following the same course. He has, therefore, united himself with the London Missionary Society, through its Travancore District Committee. After the death of Mr. Rheinius, the Mission was divided into two parts; one, including the Congregations and Schools to the west and north of Palamcottah, superintended by Mr. Schaffter; and the other, those to the south and east, superintended by Mr. Muller. Mr. Schaffter, with the former division, therefore, is now united to the Church Missionary Society; and Mr. Muller, with the other, to the London Missionary Society. Mr. Lechler being absent, his brethren cannot say to what decision he may come, respecting his future course. The statement closes with an account of the receipts and expenditure of the Mission to its close, on the 17th October last. There is a small balance of Rs. 794-0-9 in the hands of the Missionaries, which, with any other money they may receive, they engage to expend for Missionary purposes exclusively.

We forbear to offer much remark on this event. It is a cause of thankfulness that the operations of the Mission are still to be carried forward, we hope to their former extent, although under a different arrangement. And we trust the brief but interesting history of the Mission, will have a salutary influence upon all engaged in the same work. It affords a memorable warning to Missionary Societies to beware of harassing the consciences and feelings of their Missionaries,—an example of great usefulness with small resources,—and an indication of the right path to be chosen by those who are anxious to plant the gospel in India, without fictitious and disappointing aid. This is an important subject, which we shall take occasion hereafter to introduce more fully to the notice of our readers.

EIGHTH ANNUAL EXAMINATION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY'S INSTITUTION.—We remember well the lively impression which the first examination of this valuable Seminary produced upon those who had the pleasure of witnessing it. Every one was taken by surprise. Such numbers of Native youth were before them, quickened into mental activity by the benevolent zeal of their teachers, and freely yielding their minds and hearts to the noblest and holiest truths, that it seemed as if the regeneration of India had made a sudden leap, in advance of all our thoughts and hopes. There may have been some exaggeration in the impression, arising from the insubstantial manner in which, by a multitude of agencies, the work of Native education had for some years been spreading and advancing. The General Assembly's Seminary at once concentrated a great deal that had been scattered and diffused. It was not wholly original, but entered into the labours of others; the fruits of which had been hidden, and by it were brought to light. Nevertheless, it did possess great originality. Instead of merely doing better what had been done by others before, it assumed at once a boldness of design and execution in imbuing our popular education with true religion, and succeeded at the first in shewing that the course it had taken was not only practicable but easy.

The Institution in its continued progress has done too much good, to have it in its power any longer to take the community with the same surprise, as at first. But every year its Examination has shewn an enlargement of its labours in the increase of its pupils, and a gratifying advance in the range of their studies. At the present time upwards of 800 names stand in the Class Registers; and the average daily attendance is about 600; which to our European readers may appear an evidence of great irregularity, but will not do so in the least to those who are acquainted with the habits of India. The studies of the pupils are detailed in a Programme of the Examination, which was circulated amongst the company. It shews so valuable a course of instruction, that there can be no better commendation of the Seminary. We shall, therefore, place it amongst our selections; and next year the record will afford better means than we now possess, of doing justice to the zeal and ability with which the Institution is conducted.

The chief part of the Examination was devoted to the First and the Second Class. The First Class had only six pupils present, who were examined in their Mathematical studies, and the elements of Optics. We could not help regretting that the attainments of these young men could have so little justice done them; for Mathematical demonstrations are matters too abstruse to fix the attention of a large popular assembly, such as was convened at the examination; and in the presence of an uninterested and rather noisy and ocfused audience, it is impossible that the minds, either of pupils or examiners, should be sensible of the beauty of Mathematical truth, and so enjoy its exhibition. The disappointment in this respect, however, was fully compensated by the portions which were read of two Essays on the Evidences of Christianity; the one by Beharaj Lal Singha; and the other, by Mahesh Chandra Banerjee. The latter was the successful candidate for a gold medal given by the Rev. Mr. Charles; and the effort of the former was also so creditable to him, that it was rewarded with a second medal. In these Essays the subject was taken up in all its breadth—as it is affected both by the scepticism of Europe, and the heathenism of India: and though the argument was necessarily condensed, it was remarkably just and consecutive. The style of composition was singularly pure, and did great honour to the tuition under which it had been acquired.

Of the Second Class there were about twenty pupils present, who, we understand, may be considered the flower of the Seminary. They are the first who, having received their education wholly in it, have risen to attainments so high. They afford the best illustration yet given, therefore, of the efficiency of that system which the Conductors of the Institution have adopted; and its efficiency they have proved most satisfactorily. They were examined in Astronomy, the Outlines of Science by Macculloch, the Scriptures, and Hume's Evidences of Christianity; and in all they acquitted themselves most admirably. A considerable number of the European part of the company had retired before the Examination advanced so far; and they certainly lost the most interesting and satisfactory portion of the whole. Nothing could exceed the promptitude, the accuracy of conception, and the faithfulness of memory exhibited by these youths in all their exercises. There was no time to examine the other classes with any minuteness; nor was it necessary, to shew the value of the Institution. The whole body of its pupils were seen with sufficient distinctness, rising in successive grades, under a uniform mode of tuition, from the combination of letters in single syllables, to the marvellous elevation of the monitorial class; who, whilst they have been performing the most laborious duties of the whole school, have also been prosecuting the same Mathematical studies as the first class, and have read through Butler's Analogy, and Sir James Mackintosh's History of Ethical Science. What joy would it have given these two illustrious men, could they have known of such an application of their imperishable works: both of which are most happily adapted to purge the Hindoo mind from its subtle sophistry, and instruct it in the nature of truth and the mode of its discovery.

We have great pleasure in knowing that between the excellent Conductors of this Institution, and their fellow labourers, of other denominations, in the evangelization of India, there is no difference of opinion as to the place which it is proper their Seminary, and all others of the same character, should occupy in the system of means by which the conversion of the people is to be sought. They, at least, have no thought of supplanting, theoretically or practically, the ordinances of Divine worship, and especially the preaching of the gospel, by scholastic discipline, as the prime means of conversion to the faith of the gospel. Whilst the effect of the Institution in preparing the way for future triumphs of the gospel is, we have no doubt, beyond all calculation, its success hitherto as an instrument of real conversion to its pupils may almost be said to be nil. We have heard of but one of its students on whom divine truth has had such power as to induce him to make a public profession of faith in Christ. Another seemed to have arrived at the same point, but was forcibly withdrawn from the school, and from all intercourse with his teachers. The pupils generally scorn the thought of believing in Hindoism; they know the gospel, and admit the truth of its claims; but in few cases are their hearts affected thereby, in such a sort, as to compel their renunciation of sin, and consecration of themselves to God and his service. These are effects which, generally speaking, require for their production a purer, more tranquil, and more genial atmosphere than the best ordered school can afford—the atmosphere of Christian piety and love in the fellowship of the Church of God. These are not our convictions alone. We repeat, they are, we believe, equally the convictions of the Conductors of the Assembly's Institution: and, therefore, without a shadow of reservation, we can and do most heartily wish them all possible success in their labours.

THE HISTORY OF BENGAL AND LORD CLIVE.—The little History of Bengal, which one of the Editors of this paper has just put forth for the use of children in this province, has been received with a degree of kindness which the writer could not have anticipated. The Editors of the Englishman and of the Literary Gazette, however, in their notice of it, have regretted, the one, the want of all historical comment; the other, the absence of all imagination, in it. As the author freely confesses both deficiencies, he has only to bend to their decision; but he would take this early opportunity of putting in one plea in lar of their condemnation. He cannot consider it fair to judge of a work so humble in its pretensions, by the higher standard of historical criticism. Whether he be equal to the composition of a work which may be thought worthy of the title of historical commentaries, or of one which shall combine the severity of truth, with the allurements of the imagination, is a question which would soon be disposed of, if it were referred to him for decision; but the author's defence is, that he never indulged in any such ambitious views. The little Outline is intended for children of tender age, and was designed quite so much to assist them in the study of English, as of History. He had heard it remarked with regret, that books were put into the hands of Native children, with the view of teaching them the rudiments of the language, composed of scraps from English works, which were uninteresting from their foreign character, and which conveyed no valuable information to the mind. These remarks suggested the idea of attempting to compile a work in the simplest language, which children might study with ease, and which would imperceptibly fasten a connected series of historical facts on their minds, and lead them to the threshold of general history. By this humble standard should the Outline be judged. Criticism in the present case to be of any solid use to the second edition, which will be put to press without delay, should deal in notices of facts which may be incorrect, or of phrases which are above the capacity of that grade of intellect, for which the book was intended. Be that as it may; the Editor is equally obliged to both classes of critics for deeming so small a work worthy of their notice. Whatever melancholy impression the unfriendly criticisms of the Englishman and the Literary Gazette may have left on the mind, it has been obliterated by the animating eulogium upon the History of Bengal, contained in the following letter from Parbatty Churn Soor.

To the Editor of Serampore Press.

SIR,—I gladly take the occasion to thank the 'The History of Bengal,' which I have just received, in mooted intelligence; and, after glancing at its content, constrained to taste the value of its diction. But the Modern Author's spirit long known to me, from his unrivalled works of imminent condition, so you will send me a fresh copy,—and accordingly, I will pay.

I am, Sir,

Your's humble St. and faithful Servant,
PARBATTY CHURN SOOR.

This letter the reader will perceive is highly imaginative. Now for facts. The Editor of the Literary Gazette has selected one passage from the work for criticism, which will serve to shew how extremely difficult it is to come at historical truths. The History of Bengal stated in general terms, that Lord Clive died a violent death. The Editor remarks on this.

"Why not have said at once that heartbroken by the ingratitude of his employers, harassed by his enemies, and wearied of life, he put an end to his existence with his own hand."

But is it a fact that Lord Clive put a period to his existence? We know that such a report has been handed down to posterity. We know also that it was circulated with equal confidence, that his groans, a little before his death, terrified the neighbourhood, and that they were universally attributed to the stings of a guilty conscience. But the authentic cause of his groaning is now established to have been a disease, which, of all others, puts human fortitude to the severest test, and for the alleviation of which, he was in the habit of taking Opium. That he put a period to his existence is on record in no work which was within the compiler's reach. The Indian Histories of Mill and Anber are silent as to the mode of his death. The Biographical Dictionary does not mention it. The Encyclopædia Britannica simply says, that he died suddenly, possibly meaning to convey some particular meaning, by putting the word in italics. The Penny Cyclopædia,—which, for its worth, ought more properly to be styled the Golden Cyclopædia,—is equally silent about his tragical death; and the Life of the hero by Sir John Malcolm, leaves the matter in the dark. Thus no fewer than six authorities give no data on the subject. There are two other authorities which the compiler had not the means of consulting. A Life of his Lordship, by an ungrateful Italian, in four volumes, replete with venom, of which there exists one copy in India, but with whom, it is difficult to say; and the Gentleman's Magazine for 1774, a complete set of which journal was brought out some years ago; and, if we mistake not, taken back to England for want of a purchaser. Would D. L. R. kindly clear up this historical point in his next number?

ANNUAL EXAMINATION OF THE ARMENIAN PHILANTHROPIC ACADEMY.—Patriotic Institutions, such as the above, are sure to gain the sympathy of all persons of right feeling. It has other claims on our regard besides those of a well conducted Seminary. It forms in fact a sort of rallying point to the whole Armenian community in India, in which, though exiles from their native land, they have the means of keeping alive their national associations and literature: which are not only of interest to themselves, but to the whole civilised world. The Armenians form one of the few distinct remnants yet spared to us of the people of ancient days, whom we look upon almost as if they had been conversant with bygone generations, and who, indeed, have a peculiar contribution for us from the past. We have not yet derived from the Armenians all they could add to our knowledge in general and ecclesiastical history, and in sacred criticism; and it is no improbable thing, that the Seminary in Calcutta may hereafter be the very means of our gaining the information that is still locked up in their literature. It is true, the scholars of Germany, France and Italy have entered with zeal on the study of the ancient Armenian literature. A few of the oldest and best authors that flourished in Armenia, about the fourth and the fifth century, have been presented to the world in a Latin dress; and several elaborate essays have been published in the Journal Asiatique, on the history, geography and topography of that ancient land, so interesting from its relation to the re-peopleing of the earth after the desolation of the deluge. But were more numerous scholars to arise amongst the people themselves—Armenians in feeling and familiarity with the literature of the nation, and yet at home also in European literature, and alive to its interests, its wants and achievements, we should, in all probability, get more rapidly what we desire from their researches, and the information would, at the same time, be received with a warmer interest. We hope our friend Mr. Avdall, to whose superintendence the Institution is so deeply indebted, will live to see a generation rise up under his care, destined to gratify him by far outstripping him in the attainments and labours which have won for him the respect he enjoys.

The direct object of the Academy, however, is the benevolent one of giving a valuable education to the Armenian youth generally, and both education and support to the more destitute portion of them. It was at first founded, in 1821, and is still maintained by the liberality of the Armenians themselves, residing in the British and Netherlands Indies. The sum which has thus been contributed in these eighteen years, has amounted, we understand, to about one hundred thousand Rupees. Besides the subscriptions already raised, Mrs. Louwbruggen, a recently deceased Armenian lady of Negapatam, has bequeathed upwards of 10,000 Sierra Rupees to the Institution, for the relief and support of Armenian Orphans. It is no wonder that, having spent so much upon the Seminary, it is an object of the greatest interest to them. The number of youths who have already passed through it, and are now enjoying the benefit of the education it communicated to them, is very considerable; and about eighty are at present under instruction, of whom about thirty are boarded in the Institution, some at the expense of their relatives, and others gratuitously.

The course of instruction adopted in the Academy embraces the study of the classical languages of the nation, an English education, with its usual accompaniments of history, geography, and such like, and likewise the Latin Classics. Now and then, too, some pupil makes an attempt to master the Greek. The progress of the scholars, we have been informed, is very creditable, both to themselves and their instructors.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 17.

The Mails of the 6th October brought by the Hugh Lindsay, and which ought to have been in Calcutta on Saturday last, arrived yesterday morning! The state of the East Indian Empire had begun to excite considerable attention in England, and some of the Journals state, that the letters received from Lord Auckland, by the August Mails, contained the most urgent demand for European troops. The East India Company raised the exchange in Calcutta, from 1s. 11½d. to 2s. 0½d. Fifteen lakhs of Rupees worth of Bills on the Treasury of Calcutta had been sold in London, and have come out by this opportunity. London letters state that Major General Canment had not been appointed to Council, but that Mr. H. T. Prinsep was likely to succeed on the first vacancy. Mr. M. Kittoe is to be restored to the Service. It is understood, or it is generally reported, that the despatches which have been received by this opportunity, convey the approval of the Court of Directors of a Burness War, in case Tharawaddie should refuse to receive Colonel Benson.—The Hugh Lindsay Steamer which has brought us this intelligence, was one month on her passage from Socra to Bombay.—Moulmein papers state, that a report was current among the Natives, that the young-Prince of Ava was alive and in good health, on the frontiers of Arracan.—Mr. Richardson has been despatched to Bangkok, the capital of Siam, it is said, to endeavour to form a commercial treaty with the Court, and to prevail upon it to allow Chinese trading caravans to come on direct to Moulmein.—Strenuous efforts are in progress in Ceylon, under the influence of Government, to establish a regular steam communication between that Island and Bombay.—The Governor General took leave of Maharajah Runjeet Sing, on the 31st December. The Maharajah was so ill at the time, in consequence of recent excesses, that the interview was a painful one. We have placed an account of it from the Englishman, among our extracts.—The 10th Regiment of Foot reached its destination at Hazareebag; all well.—Letters from the Aux of the Islands published in this day's papers, state that the arrangements in the camp were to the last degree defective, more especially those relative to the Post Office. Some time since there appeared a letter in the Englishman, stating, that in consequence of the irregularities in the management of the Post Office in the Camp, every one resigned the charge of it had been transferred from Capt. Havlock to Capt. Sage. We gather from the continued complaints relative to letters, that the blame did not rest with the former Post Master, Capt. Havlock.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 18.

Jhandi has fallen without a blow. On the 5th of January, as the British troops were preparing to erect their batteries, the Old Lady, with all her Gossains, marched out of the Fort and fled. The English troops marched in, levelled the Gossain flag with the dust, hoisted the English Ensign in its stead, and played "God save the Queen."—A proposal is now in circulation in Calcutta, for building a large Steamer, to be called the Great Eastern, to ply between Calcutta and Socra. The estimated cost is six lakhs of Rupees; and it is said that there is every prospect of this sum being raised in Calcutta, without difficulty.—Yesterday's Scotsman announced the arrival of the Duke of Buccleugh from Portsmouth, the 15th of September.—A Penny Gazette of the 23rd December, states that Mr. Salmon, the Resident Councillor, had proceeded to Quedah, to ascertain whether there was a sufficient Siamese force near that place, to whom it might be made over, if we compel the Malays to retire from it.—The Honourable Mr. Ross embarked at day break yesterday morning, under a salute from the ramparts of the Fort William.—A melancholy event has occurred in the family of Dwaraknath Tagore, which has plunged him into the greatest affliction. His son, a sweet tempered and very promising youth of thirteen, died on Saturday, and on the following day the father was doomed to still deeper suffering, in the loss of his wife.—The number of covers forwarded by the last Steamer, the Atlanta, from Bombay, was 10,374.—A very erroneous statement has gone abroad, relative to the affair of the Elephant at Ferokepore, much to the discredit of Sir Henry Fane. The following is now given as a correct version of the affair. The Commander-in-Chief was close to the Governor General's Durbar Tent, having descended from his Elephant, Mr. Colvin ordered his mahout to hurry forward to fulfil some request of, we believe, the Commander-in-Chief's himself. The mahout pressed his animal on the Commander-in-Chief, who was not able, from the crowd behind, to retreat. Captain Hay was at the Commander-in-Chief's side, and seeing, as he has since declared, that the danger to His Excellency of being crushed was most imminent, drew his sword and offered it point to the farther approach of the Elephant. The Commander-in-Chief also, half drew his sword, but did not even elevate the point. Captain Hay's threatening attitude and weapon frightened the beast, who turned away from the path he was pursuing; and thus the danger was removed; but not one scratch was inflicted on the mahout or the elephant by either weapon.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 19.

The Madras papers state, that a bark had arrived at that port with some very superior New Zealand spars to dispose of, said to be equal to the lower masts of vessels of a thousand ton burden. It is to be hoped, that in the ensuing Session of Parliament, a Bill for the colonization of this Island, which promises in the lapse of time, to be the England of the Eastern Seas, may be allowed to pass.—The Englishman of this morning has a letter from Darjeling, which holds out a very animating prospect at this Sanatarius. The writer, speaking of the moory ranges which is visible from the spot, says, "These are magnificent beyond any thing I can attempt to express; rising to a height in the heavens we have been accustomed to think nothing but a cloud could pretend to; and even varying in their tints, and their hues, and their shades, at every change of the clouds, and pos-sion of the sun; but always above description glorious."—Letters from Lahore state, that Ranjeet Singh still remains fearfully ill. Lord Auckland and his suite have marched from Lahore towards Ferozepore, and the idle fears entertained regarding his safety have been entirely dispelled.—The particulars respecting the building of a magnificent steamer in Calcutta, to be called the Great Eastern, are given in yesterday's Courier. We have transferred them to our columns. We hope the plan will succeed, for independently of the advantages which must result from the possession of such a vessel, we shall then convince England, that we can help ourselves, which is the most direct way of obtaining help from thence.

MONDAY, JANUARY 21.

The last day of Pertab Chund's trial at Hooghly is now published. In consequence of a difference of opinion between the Session Judge and the Moulvies, the case has been referred to the Nizamut Adawlut. The Judge declared his intention to release the prisoner, on the bail of two persons in 5,000 Rs. each. Mr. Shaw, the Attorney, waited on the Magistrate, and in lieu of bail, offered to make a deposit of 10,000 Company's Rupees, which the Magistrate refused to receive, without an order from the Judge. The Judge was applied to, and ordered the Government Securities to be received; on which Pertab Chund was released, and went off to Calcutta with Mr. Shaw. We have given among our extracts the only account we can find of the opinion of the Judge and the Moulvies.—A rumour was current, says the Englishman, on Saturday evening, that a declaration of war against Tharrawaddie had passed Council. It appears, however, to be premature.—Huroochander Lahoree, who has been for four years in confinement, for having in his possession Government Securities for which he could not satisfactorily account, has had the remainder of his sentence of confinement remitted by the Sudder Nizamut Adawlut, and has again returned to the bosom of his family.—Letters from Persia state, that the messenger who conveyed the intelligence of the raising of the siege of Herat by the Persians, was expected to reach London via Constantinople, on the 25th of November.—The papers lead us to hope that the Mail, which left England on the 24th of that month, may be expected in Calcutta in another week.—The shipping reports of Saturday announce the arrival of no fewer than eleven vessels.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 22.

Yesterday's Semaphore announced the arrival of the Ganges Steamer from Moulemein, the 15th January, with "important dispatches" from Col. Benson. They have not as yet transpired; but letters from Rangoon state, that the Envoy had not been permitted to obtain an audience of the King Tharrawaddie; the only relaxation of the system of insult which he had experienced, consisted in permission to buy provisions. Warlike preparations are said to have been set on foot by the Burmese Government, and it appears almost certain, that the Court has made up its mind to try the issue of the sword. Nothing, however, could be more unfortunate than for the British to be prematurely precipitated into a war at this season of the year.—The Steamer Madagascar arrived at the Mauritius on 15th November, having quitted Falmouth on the 18th August. She belongs to the Mauritius Steam Navigation Company, and will be employed in navigating between the island of which she bears the name, the Mauritius and Bourbon.—The letters received at Bombay from England by the present Mail, state that the candidates for the Governorship of Bombay are Sir Charles Metcalfe, the Right Honourable Holt Mackenzie, and Sir Robert Horton, but that Sir James Carnarvon has been individually most likely to succeed.—The Kellie Castle has been entirely lost in the China seas. All hands saved.—Intelligence from Penang states, that H. M. S. Hyacinth had gone to Quedah, the grave of British honour in the Straits, to see what could be done as it respects restoring the place to the Siamese, from whom the Malays have again conquered it, where the Chiefs declared, "that if the English would take Quedah and appoint a Resident there in the same manner as at Province Wellesley, they would be happy to become subjects of the Company; but if the intention was to drive them out by force and give the country to the Siamese, in that event they had made up their minds to fight to the last drop of their blood in defence of their native land and their just rights, and that all the blood which might be shed should be upon the heads of the English."

The intelligence which has just been received from China is deeply important. A quantity of Opium which had been packed up in twenty-two treasure chests, and brought up in one of the smuggling schooners, was landed, and in the act of being carried to the stores of one of the foreign merchants, when it was seized by the Mandarins, who had obtained information of it through a spy. The Coolies employed were put to the torture to extort confession as to the vessel from which it had been delivered. They pronounced a name, which sounded like that of an American vessel. The American Captain and Agent were ordered to leave Canton in three days, and the Hong merchant connected with the vessel, Pan-hoy-quan, was seized, subjected to the indignity of the wooden collar, the greatest man of respectability can suffer, and paraded through the fleet at Whampoa. Subsequently it was discovered, that the Opium belonged to Mr. Innes, and that the poor Hong merchant had been most innocently punished. Mr. Innes was immediately ordered to leave Canton; the trade was stopped, and the Chinese authorities, moreover, threatened to continue the stoppage, until "all the foreign householders should have entered into a bond, not to carry on any smuggling trade either themselves, or by implication within the river of Canton."

On the 12th December a very serious affair occurred at Canton. The Governor had seized a poor Native, who had kept an Opium shop, and in obedience to orders from Peking, ordered him to be strangled; but in order to insult the foreign merchants, commanded the execution to take place in the square of their residence. They united together, and insisted that the execution should not take place there, and actually forced the Chinese authorities to remove the apparatus to another locality. But while they were assembled together, a large rabble of Chinese, amounting to between five and six thousand, collected, and made an attack on them. The rabble was twice repulsed, but in the mean time Mow-quan made his appearance, and beckoned to the Europeans to retire, which they did; and the rabble then pursued them, and attacked the houses in which they had taken refuge, which they would have forced, had not a Chinese military force arrived on the ground, and dispersed the mob.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 23.

The Courier of last night gives the nomination of three officers, who are to command a Corps to be raised immediately for Jaloue.—A Steamer is to start from Bombay for Suva on the 25th of February, and letters may be despatched from Calcutta till the 10th proximo.—The dispatches received from Borneo by the Ganges Steamer two days ago, clearly show that affairs continue just as they were in that country.—Influenza is said to have appeared in Calcutta; and the unseasonable weather that has prevailed is thought to promise a harvest to our friends, the doctors.—Counterfeit American dollars are now manufactured, it seems, in Madagascar.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

STEAM COMMUNICATION.

A prospect, and we think it certain one, is at last opening to India of securing a permanent Steam Communication with Europe, and we are happy that circumstances have put it in our power to be thus forward in communicating to the public this important intelligence. Several of the first mercantile establishments in Calcutta have determined to contribute largely, and to exert themselves in procuring subscriptions to build a vessel in every respect similar to the Great Western. She is to be named the Great Eastern, her burden 1200 tons, and her engines 500 horse power. The cost is thus estimated. She is to be built in Calcutta of the most seasoned teak, and at Co.'s Rs. 250 per ton, will cost three lakhs of Rupees. The engines at £5 the horse power, will be 25,000 Co.'s Rs. The outside of the total expense may be taken at six lakhs. The vessel is to run to Cossier, from whence a smaller steamer will convey the passengers to Suva, the distance from Calcutta to Cossier is precisely the same as the distance from Liverpool to New York, but as coals can be obtained at Colombo and Socotra, the steamer need not be so deeply laden with dead weight and by carrying light freight, her draft of water will be less and her speed increased. Under these circumstances, the trip will not occupy more than 12 days.

She can therefore easily perform eight voyages a year. It is calculated that by each voyage she will earn 40,000 Rs. in passengers and 10,000 in letters, parcels, and light freight, making 4 lakhs a year, her expenses will be 800 Rs. a day while under steam, which for 192 days gives 1,53,600 Rs.; and allowing the remaining 40,400 for her expenses when not employed, there will be a clear profit of 2 lakhs a year, on an outlay of six lakhs. We will conclude by given an example of the immense importance to India of such a vessel. At the last Indigo sale in London 12,000 chests were brought forward. A few days after, the intelligence of the shortness of the crop arrived, and before the letters were all delivered, it rose 40 pence, with a certainty of increasing to a shilling, when the news was generally known—taking the chest at 800 lbs., this would have made a difference of 1½ per cent, or eighteen lakhs of Rs. on the 12,000 chests. By the news arriving late, the London purchasers clear this sum, had there been a steamer to carry it quickly, it would have been the profit of the Indian owners, and this profit on the one sale, would have paid for three Steamers.—Courier.

MERGUL COAL.

The H. C. Steamer Ganges returned from the Southward on Friday last. It was the want of coal, we hear, that prevented her from proceeding to Calcutta with the Resident's last despatches, there being but a very small quantity in store. Her visit to Mergul was undertaken for the purpose of taking such coal as might be remaining there, and in this we hear she was much disappointed, as but little more was found there than the quantity hrought down a few months ago, as an experiment from the newly discovered coal fields. There must be gross neglect somewhere, that the steamer on the coast should thus be rendered ineffective, that is, as regards communication with the Presidency. We think the authorities here could not do better than take advantage of this neglect of their interests, and set to work in right good earnest and render themselves independent of other depots, by forming one of their own at Mergul. On a calculation of the relative expenses, we think it would be found that the Mergul coal could be brought down and placed in depot there much cheaper than the Burdwan coal can be sent down from Calcutta. We have learnt that the small quantity of Mergul coal now on board the Ganges, cost, all expenses included, between 12 and 18 annas a maund, just the sum that is usually paid for freight for this article from Calcutta to this port. But this coal was brought down the river at the worst season of the year, and merely as an experiment. Were a system established for bringing it down regularly and in large quantities, we have no doubt that notwithstanding the distance and the numerous impediments existing as shown by Dr. Helfer's and Captain MacLeod's reports, published in former numbers of our paper, the coal would eventually be deposited at Mergul at 8 annas a maund. Another 8 annas a maund for bringing it up here, would, we presume, be sufficient remuneration for numerous coasting vessels, so that we might eventually be supplied with the superior Mergul coal at the same rate as is now charged for the inferior Burdwan. We understand, however, that sanguine hopes are entertained of an easier access to the coal fields, through some of the rivers which flow into the sea south of Mergul. One of these rivers, called the Laynia, is said to be navigable for several miles by large sized vessels, and from native report coal is said to be found within these bounds of navigation. This point is, we hear, now under investigation, and we most sincerely hope it will turn out correct, for a discovery more beneficial to the interests of these provinces could not be made. Coal may then be shipped on board vessels for a mere nothing, and conveyed to the most distant parts of India. The Straits, Ceylon, Bombay, the Red Sea and Persian Gulf may thus be supplied with coal, rivaling in quality the best English coal, at rates less than that of Burdwan.

We understand that Dr. Helfer is now conducting his researches along the coast, and among the islands south of Mergul; we have not heard any account of his proceedings. Lieut. Hutchinson, of the Artillery, is engaged in surveying the country between Tenasserim and the site of the coal fields, with a view of ascertaining the practicability of forming a train road for the conveyance to the coal. We hear he has been hitherto unsuccessful in finding a practicable level road, but he has not abandoned all hopes of it. We are glad to see these exertions making towards the eventual working of the Mergul coal fields, but of course they will all be superseded by the discovery, if made, of an open and easy access to another point of them, by water.—Mountain Chronicle, Dec. 26.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S LAST VISIT TO BUNJEET SINGH.

Camp, Duhwara, Dec. 31, 1858.—The Governor General marched from Lahore this morning, much to the delight of the whole camp, we having had a dull time of it owing to the Maharajah's indisposition. He had been laid up since coming back with fever brought on by his recent exertions; at one time considerable anxiety was felt in the Head Quarter Camp as to his recovery; he was, however, sufficiently well on Saturday afternoon, to receive Lord Auckland to take leave, who went accompanied by Miss Eden, the different Secretaries and Commissioners of the Corps. I understood it was a painful sight, as the old man has again nearly lost his speech, and his delicate interpreter, Assees-oo-deen (alias the Faquyer), experienced considerable difficulty in understanding what he endeavoured to utter. On the presentation of a very splendid trinket by the Governor, being in imitation of a bunch of grapes, composed of emeralds and pearls to the value of 30,000 rupees, I bear, he brightened up considerably. The visit did not last long, and before taking leave, the Light Star of the Punjab was conferred on the following, viz. the Governor General, W. H. Macnaghten, Esq.; H. Torrens, Esq.; E. Currie, Esq.; J. R. Colvin Esq., Generals Sir W. Cawceman and T. P. Smith, Honorable Captain Osburne, and Captain McGregor, A. D. C., and paltry kheluts given to the remainder, consisting of swords, bangles, chogras, and worn-out shawls.—Eng.

PERTAB-CHAND'S CASE.

Upon the first charge, that of fraudulent personation, the Judge is of opinion, that the guilt of the prisoner is fully established. He conceives that the evidence as to the death and cremation of the Rajah Pertab Chund is beyond doubt, and that it has not been in the slightest degree shaken by any thing adduced either in argument or in evidence in behalf of the prisoner. The Judge is, of course, aware, that having said thus much, it was unnecessary for him to express any opinion regarding the prisoner's identity with Kato Lal, but he considers, however, that identity established by sufficient evidence, although that evidence is not altogether so satisfactory as the testimony to the death of Pertab Chund. The Judge adds, that, for reasons detailed in his decision, the balance of evidence, even as to the belief of witnesses as to the identity of the prisoner with the late Rajah, is greatly in favour of the prosecution; but being thoroughly satisfied of the death of the Rajah, he rests his decision upon that single fact.

On the second charge, that of obtaining money on false pretence, the Judge finds the fact to be proved; but as Radhakishan Byseck makes no complaint, he is doubtful whether he can convict the prisoner upon it.

On the third charge, that of heading an illegal assembly, and resisting the constituted authorities, the Judge is of opinion, that the prisoner is guilty, and that the offence comes within the con-strution of the law quoted by the Government prosecutor. He finds that no actual breach of the peace was committed, but holds that the prisoner's offences are aggravated by a former conviction on a similar charge.

With reference to the whole case, the Judge recommends, I believe, that the sot-disant Rajah should be sentenced to imprisonment for a term of not less than three, and not more than five years. The above is a simple statement of the finding of the Sessions' Judge; I leave it to our readers and to counsel to decide what scope it affords for the exhibition of this morning over the unfortunate Government prosecution.

The Futwa of the Law Officer is somewhat confused, but as far as I am able to comprehend his meaning, it is this; that he does not believe the prisoner is the either Kisto Lall or Pertab Chund, and that he does not know who he is, but that there being doubts whether he may not be Pertab Chund, he gives him the benefit of these doubts. He finds, also, there was nothing wrong in the prisoner borrowing and Hathiakbeen lending money. On the charge of tumultuous assemblage, he declares the prisoner to be guilty, and liable to punishment at the discretion of the Judge. I am not aware of any declaration either by the Judge or the Advocate, that the sot-disant Rajah has already been sufficiently punished for the illegal assemblage by the imprisonment he has undergone. There is no such declaration to be found in the official documents recording their respective opinions, and the only remark of the kind that I heard made, was applied, not to the principal offender, but to the prisoners who were charged with having aided and abetted him. These prisoners were all acquitted by the concurrent voices of the Judge and the Advocate, though a perusal of the concluding sentence of this part of the Judge's report, would lead one to infer that he was a good deal influenced in his finding, by the consideration that they had already undergone a long imprisonment.—Hurkara.

INDIA.

RELIGIOUS.

The following is the Speech on Indian Missions of the Right Hon. Mr. Stewart Mackenzie, at a late Missionary Meeting in Ceylon.

The Right Honourable the Governor moved the first Resolution in nearly the following language:—

Ladies and Gentlemen,—I have been invited to propose the first resolution for the adoption of this Meeting, and if I rightly understood the expressions of feelings which accompanied its close, and the attention with which you listened to the reading of this excellent report, my task will be an easy and very short one.

The purport of the Resolution is, that you shall approve of, and adopt the report, that you have just heard read.

The report itself exhorts us all here present, and the friends of missionary labours in general, to persevere in their exertions in the right cause, and to extend by every means in their power the sphere of those exertions.

The picture presented to us is on the whole consoling, but I may well spare your time by not dwelling on its details with which the report, in a tone of so much modesty and truth, has amply furnished us. If we cannot say indeed, that you have been yet added in the Church of Christ by the labours of Missionaries here, we must not forget, that while the Church Missionary, the Wesleyan and the London Missionary Societies, and your Baptist Missionary Society itself, all have laboured and not yet so extensively run the race of usefulness, as they have done in Ceylon, and that none have had yet a very long career.

Among the idolatries of the benighted population of this Island, the light of Gospel truth has not yet dawned upon their darkened intellect; the voice has not yet gone forth "let there be light and there was light," mental light, to pierce and chase away the clouds of ignorance and idolatry. Your efforts, my Missionaries, and our efforts must not at that account be less strenuous, nor relax; no—they require to be the more ardent and true, to cheer us amidst these labours of love among the heathen, languishing in a miserable state of ignorance, brutality, and degradation, that the Kingdom of the Messiah shall come, and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God.

If Missionary institutions, though not of yesterday, are here but comparatively young and new, let the ardour and freshness and vigour of youth animate you all in your labours, and then shall we witness those labours, cast away from us that dormancy of spirit and unconcern, with which I fear we may all be too justly reproached.

One not least important result of meetings, such as this, is to spread as widely as possible, not only a just report of the proceedings of your society, and of similar societies, but also to encourage a desire and afford facilities to any, who shall feel the inward promptings of religion, and feel so to multiply the channels of feeling, in this vast moral wilderness, any individuals, whose hearts may be illumined by a spark of that divine light, which those apostolic labourers have been the humble means of lighting up, amidst the heathen darkness and superstition, that have enveloped other lands.

Let us then but scatter encouragement here as widely as possible under the guidance of our mild and beneficent religion; let our general efforts of conversion be made under the influences, and under that confidence of success, which our reason as well as our faith assure us will prevail.

But you must continue to watch with unceasing anxiety the progress of things; what has been effected is only a beginning, and the best impressions will fade away, unless followed up by a series of wise and kind measures all directed to one end; for our cause is one, our aim and object is one, the subjugation of Christians to heathen principles and habits. This we openly avow and must steadily prosecute (not indeed expecting to see that glorious day) until the Kingdom of the Messiah shall be from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth.

Reasoning from human experience alone, why would I call on you for these exertions? It is because I have lived long enough to see pass away that unbelief, which would have checked them in an earlier stage; my friend, Mr. Charles Lushington, providing at the late anniversary meeting of your Parent Society in London, in reference to the union of the Serampore mission with it, has taken occasion to bear witness to the alarm, created by the first labours of Marshman and Carey, when at Calcutta. Well do I myself remember now 30 years ago, when the work of conversion in India was denounced as dangerous to the stability of our empire there, then perhaps too doubtful and unseasonable;—when the exposure and correction of the views and falsifications of the natives was repudiated, as making the safety of our power; when the timid worldling, and the sceptical politician, bred in the school of a cold and false philosophy, now past away and almost forgotten, could venture to sneer at the pious labours of a Ward, a Carey, and a Marshman, and predict almost against the very words of truth itself, that such labours as our Missionaries were then engaged in, would not only convert the natives in the east, but that if we succeeded in making millions of converts, (and would converts they above admitted could be made) we should shake, and weaken those habits of morality and decency (such as they were) which their own religion prescribed; and that unable to graft fresh principles of action on the minds of the natives, we should leave them immersed only in doubt and error, as to the tenets of the religion, and those religious duties, we had been striving to inculcate; and we should, to use the words of the old converts of those days, “destroy the old religion, without really and effectually teaching the new.”—Such was the calculating alarmist’s denunciation against Missionary labours, in 1818, when at least they had not been idle, so nearly at the same period, I think as late as in 1800, not one line had issued of the scriptures from the Bengal Press. Such were the predictions of the socialist, which were current and in fashion 30 years ago, but what are 30 years in the history or age of a nation, or of a nation’s religion? In 1808 when those laboured attacks against the Missionaries were sent forth, similar assaults against the discretion and judgment, in the conduct of our Indian affairs, were levelled unceasingly against such among the Directors, as supported the Missionaries: and from those attacks, neither the meekness of life, nor his assiduity and talents devoted to the interests of India as they were for half a century, could protect the late plenipotentiary Mr. Charles Grant. The Missionary at Vellore was, it was said, to be the forerunner of our expulsion from India; but mark the hand that overrules all things; within six short years thereafter, Bishop Middleton went forth from his native land, to immortalize the name of a Protestant Bishop in India, by an exemplary life of piety and virtue—and within the space of but 10 years, from 1822 to 1831, no fewer than four excellent prelates had sunk under the pressure of the peculiar trials and trials, incident to the administration of their office. How vain then the mere predictions of man, how weak these attacks against the Missionary’s labours! what are Mr. Wilberforce’s remarkable words, as quoted by Mr. Lushington at the meeting I have already referred to? “I do not know,” he says, “a finer instance of the moral sublime, than that a poor Collier working in his small shop should convert the idea of converting the Hindoos to Christianity, yet such was Dr. Carey.”

And can we doubt at this time of day, that it was to the encouraging, though slow and limited results of these labours, we owed it that our rulers at home, and our legislatures had at length learnt, that humble though the instruments had been, the work of conversion to Christianity was so widely spread abroad in India, and had been kept alive, and advanced, in spite of every trial and persecution to which the Missionary had been there subjected and exposed; had learnt too that they had not less a duty to perform in whose land, so far as human authority goes, were vested the direction and disposal of the affairs of that vast empire; thus I say was it brought home to their tardy conviction, that the time was arrived, when it was the duty of a Christian Government, and a Christian Legislature to send forth the higher dignitaries of their own church to labour in the same vineyard, in which a Ward, Carey, and a Marshman had been so long labouring to gather but a scanty harvest. Had these pious men, amidst persecutions and revilings slackened in their efforts; were they disheartened, did they not rather continue, faithful Missionaries for converting the heathen even unto death? yes, will be the universal response of all, who know and are acquainted with their lives and their labours in India, eminently useful, pious and blessed as they were.

I, too, with humility be it spoken,—my heart is in the cause, the cause of Christ’s kingdom upon earth. I too would gladly rank among the Missionaries to this heathen land, and if in my civil capacity, I am permitted to aid in making any of the many barren wastes and jungles, that deface Ceylon, smile with future prospects of plenty; if in this parasitical land, nature’s choicest productions shall be awakened into life by culture and skill, which now lie dormant or hidden in these wastes, how would it rejoice me, if this yet vaster moral and mental desert, where man indeed is vile, shall be made to blossom as the rose; if the withering blight of superstition be staid; and the thick clouds of barbarous ignorance be driven, like the mist before the glorious sun, and this people be at length called to the knowledge of the true God, under the blessed influences of your Missionary labours.

If by my presence here this day, I am permitted to aid you in the conversion of but one sinner from the errors of his way, if but one from among the heathen be drawn by our means from the darkness and shadow of death, into the light of the Gospel of Christ, ye know that the work is of the Lord’s doing, and that it shall surely prosper.

But some of you may ask, perhaps, seeing how small hitherto has been the progress of conversion elsewhere (in India excepted) by comparison with the millions of population, how can you here expect your work to succeed? If I relied not on the scriptures of truth, I might answer you in the words of one, who, then far advanced in years, was about to return to India, after an interval of repose from the great labours. Dr. Marshman at Edinburgh, I well remember, when pressed for a declaration of his sentiments on the success of Missions, when the work of conversion had been then but small, declared that it was not among the exciting race of the adult population, throughout that immense country, that he looked for any very immediate evidence of the truths revealed by the Missionaries, having taken effect; but that he did look with confidence, he said, to the certain influence of the Christian Religion on the rising generation, among whom Religion and Education would be diffused and known, and would necessarily produce the same blessed effects, as Christianity had already done, among the most uncivilized of mankind; and I believe too will be the result here; among the young will the first signs of lasting conversion be evidenced.—Madras Missionary Register.

PRIZE ESSAYS ON LAY AGENCY IN HOME MISSIONARY OPERATIONS.—We have much pleasure in announcing that the Rev. James Bennett, D. D., the Rev. Joseph Fletcher, D. D., and Joshua Wilson, Esq., have kindly undertaken the office of the adjudicators on the merits of the Essays, and the award of the Prizes, pursuant to the offer already advertised in connexion with the Congregational Union of England and Wales, that one hundred guineas will be given for the best essay, and twenty-five guineas for the essay second in merit, on the employment of Christian brethren not regularly devoted to the ministry, in efforts for the spread of the Gospel in our native country. A third umpire was appointed at the suggestion and desire of the donor of the principal prize, on the ground that as the essays are to relate more particularly to plans for the activities and labours of our lay brethren, it might be advantageous and satisfactory that they should pass under the view of some well-informed and competent lay gentlemen; as it is probable, that in judging of their merits, considerations might present themselves to the mind of an intelligent layman, which would not occur to ministers, who view the subject from a different position, and, therefore, possibly, in a somewhat different light.—Congregational Magazine.

THE REV. DR. WARREN.—It is understood, and indeed there is no doubt of the fact, that the Bishop of Chester has pronounced opinion to the above gentleman, who, it is almost unnecessary to state, was for a time considered as the head of a party which some two years since seceded from the Wesleyan Methodist, and which body has since been designated as the Wesleyan Association. From this party, however, he seceded about twelve months ago, on the alleged ground that the constitution or body of laws by which it is to be governed was too democratic. The seceding gentleman is now taking those preliminary steps essential to his formal recognition as a minister of the Establishment. Sir Oswald Blorey, lord of the manor of Manchester, has generously given a site in Every St. Annville, on which it is intended to erect a church, of which Dr. Warren is to be minister, 1,500*l.* has been promised for this object by the Lancashire Church Building Society; and when this sum is made up to 2,000*l.* by donations (for which no doubt exists, two gentlemen having given 100*l.* each, and another 20*l.*) application is to be made to Her Majesty’s Church Commissioners for a similar sum (out of the half-million grant of 1824), and which is expected to be granted.—Leeds Mercury.

A FINE UPROAR.—A considerable sensation has been created during the past week among the fair matrons of Wilkeslow and its neighbourhood, the location of the Rev. John W. Morris, by the circulation of a report, put forth in the North Cheshire Reformer, that their reverend pastor had been advocating in Stockport, and urging on the inhabitants to petition for a taxation on wives! The whole village was in an uproar. The females had a consultation, at which the wives said that, if such a tax was levied, it would create family quarrels, and the males justly argued that the chances of marriage would be fearfully increased against them; after which, they came to a resolution to proceed to Mr. Morris's house. Mr. Morris was apprised by one of his friends of the predicament in which he had placed himself, and when he saw the maids and matrons proceeding to his house, his fears were excited, and securing himself by locks and bolts against the injured fair, he went up stairs, and endeavoured to appease their wrath by a speech from the chamber window, in which he laid the blame on the printer for his carelessness in making this misprint. The ladies not knowing any thing about a misprint, separated, assuring him of what they would do when they caught him again on his way to Stockport. [The misprint was twice for wives.]—Stockport Advertiser.

A Rector Voting Against Church-Rates.—The Divines of Halifax having been able successfully to oppose a Church-rate for the last year, a meeting was held there on the 8th inst., to try if a rate could not be carried. On a division the numbers were balanced, and the casting vote remained with the rector, who was in the chair, and who gave it against the rate. In consequence of this failure, a voluntary subscription amongst the members of the Established Church only was entered into, and a sum sufficient to pay all antecedent expenses, leaving a balance in hand for future expences, was carried. The stock, which had stopped for two years, was adjusted and set going.—Halifax Express.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE PRESIDENCY OF THE ROYAL SOCIETY.

Many erroneous statements have been lately put forth with respect to the expense and state attendant upon the proper and dignified discharge of the office of its President. To this large and enlightened class of persons who know the facts of the case, those statements signify nothing—they only excite a smile; indeed the incorrect manner in which many of the distinguished names, mixed up in the anonymous articles in question, are spelt, is quite sufficient to show that the authors know as little of the matter as they do of science or of scientific people. We need not go back to the days when Newton filled the chair of the Royal Society, but date our remarks from the presidency of Sir Joseph Banks. The Society meets, with a short vacation at Easter and another at Christmas, every Thursday evening, from the middle of November till towards the end of June: the expense to each member is one shilling per meeting. When Sir Joseph Banks was president he gave frequent conversations in his house (now occupied by the Linnean Society), in one of the corners of Soho-square; these conversations were attended by hundreds of scientific and literary persons; Sir Joseph, ardently attached to science, and to suit his own taste, rallied round him every traveller and person of distinction in England; for it is a well known fact that no collector ever left these shores without having a carte blanche from him to purchase the rarest specimens in natural history that could be found. As a proof of his successful labours, we refer with national pride to the Herbarium of the British Museum, and to Robert Brown, a man distinguished by more scientific honours than perhaps any other British subject. What were the expenses of Sir Joseph's many and well attended meetings? A few dozen cups of tea and coffee, and slices of bread and butter, were the viands! The president and council immediately before each meeting may dine together at the Crown and Anchor, in the Strand; it is a small dinner, a bit of fish, chicken, chat, and two or three glasses of wine; the charge for which is about five shillings per head, paid by each person who dines. Sir H. Davy, though rich, gave no conversations at all, nor was his presidency less popular on that account. When David Gilbert was president, that kind-hearted and accomplished man, though very rich, had no town house; for years he lodged in a small first floor above Asner's toy-shop in Bridge-street, Westminster. When he was president, he gave no conversations; Gilbert invited the fellows and a friend or two to take breakfast with him on the Thursday mornings, during the session, at the Thatched House Tavern, St. James's; the breakfast was simple to a degree—"a rasher and an egg," we had almost said; it was, in short, the usual breakfast of plain people, a few wain-cresses being the chief luxury. His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, who succeeded to the chair, gave a series of conversations at Kensington Palace; these were numerous and magnificently attended; within the noble building there was scope and verge enough for all comers. The expenses of these meetings, and of the more restricted dinner-parties which preceded them, together with about 45*l.* a session for tea and coffee in the library at Somerset House, were always paid, from the Duke's own pocket; at most of the other scientific societies the latter item is usually paid by the members generally.

His Royal Highness will leave the chair with the respect and affection of every Fellow of the Society; not merely for his urbanity and great kindness of heart, but also for the substantial good he has rendered to the Royal Society. Warmly attached to his brother, his late Majesty, William IV., his royal highness was the means of successfully urging the claims of the Society, and obtaining from that liberal monarch a sum of money to defray the annual expence of the two royal gold medals of 50*l.* each, which had been granted by George the Fourth, but whose illness, and perhaps other causes in which we may not allude, had prevented the investment of a fund to provide for the medals; and, owing to that omission, the Royal Society, for a time, had well nigh incurred the ridicule of our scientific neighbours abroad, to some of whom—the Candolle, Berzelius, Mitscherlich, and others, medals were voted; two or three lesser ones, supposed to contain which were, on the mornings of society anniversaries, handed over to the proxies of the disaffected foreigners with all due form! There are several persons who will remember the annoyance which such a course caused to a high-minded man, whose name we purposely avoid mentioning, and who had to dispenise the honours. "I don't like," he exclaimed, "this beggarly account of empty boxes." The Duke of Sussex, however, was the honoured means of putting all straight; a sufficient sum was invested, a die was sunk, the medals were immediately struck, and forwarded to those to whom they had been voted years before. We could mention many more acts of good done by his royal highness to the Society, but it might savour of flattery, and we therefore abstain.—Literary Gazette.

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM.—A number of servants and workmen have been discharged at Balkeith, and the princely establishments which his Grace supports in other quarters will no doubt undergo a similar reduction. It is not denied that his object is to repair the harms which he has made on his splendid patrimony by recent great outlays of various kinds. Many of these have been on improvements which are creditable to him, and will ultimately repay him; but there are others so to which justice will be more difficult. Report says that he contributed ten thousand pounds to the funds of the Carlton Club, and expended, besides, thirty thousand in the last election. Even the ordinary expenses of a noblemen like the Duke, who keeps up seven or eight fine mansions in different parts of Britain, must be immense; or, so use the expression of a friend, he must bleed at a thousand pores. It is but justice to him to say, that his abhorrence as a politician is never redeemed by his personal qualities, his cultivation, and good faith, and that he has no more than his own merit to recommend him to the esteem of some of his most decided opponents.—Scotsman.

COMPENSATION REQUIRED FROM RAILWAY PROPRIETORS.—One of the most unwholesome of all the forms of the spirit of over-reaching, is that prevalent by an individual, who, when some part of his property is required for a public purpose, attempts to exact for that part a price three or four times its value. Some curious examples are given in the second number of a beautifully embellished work, entitled a "History and Description of the London and Birmingham Railway." From the great lord or squire, who stands up in defence of some large tract, to the village Hampden, who has only to protect some field of a couple of acres, or a poor garden connected with his cottage, one spirit pervades all—a determination to extort as much above the value of the property as they can by any means obtain. The struggle is not confined to ordinary bargain-making. The most important part of it takes place in the courts of the legislature, while the railway is as yet only in contemplation. It is by preventing all sorts of frivolous opposition there, that the great proprietors contrive to obtain satisfactory prices for their lands. And such, accordingly, is the difficulty of overruling all those obstacles, that the act for the London and Birmingham Railway cost no less than 72,000*l.* 1*8s.* 1*d.* The bill for this important public work was rejected in 1822, on the ground that the case was not made out; it was passed in the ensuing year—"the means which the directors were obliged to resort to," says the author of the work before us, "must be left to the imagination of the reader." "The compensations," says the same writer, "drawn from the Company by proprietors of land and other premises on the line of the railway, were enormous, and were an injury to the cause. All sorts of payments were required on the most frivolous pretexts. The sum of 3,000*l.* was given for one piece of land, and 10,000*l.* for consequential damages, when instead of any damages being sustained, the land has been improved. Our railier original character sold to the Company some land, and was bought and sold in his outskirts for compensation, rifling the changes on all sorts of damages which the railway could not be said to have done him. His demand was paid, and his complaint was stopped. A few months afterwards, a little additional land was wanted from the same individual, when, surprising as it may appear, for some adjoining parts of this land, so deteriorated by the railway, and on which the Company's works were to have brought utter destruction, he actually required a much larger price than was given him before; and to the Company expressing the surprise which was natural on hearing such a demand, he very coolly replied, "Oh, I made a mistake then, in thinking the railway would insure my property; it has increased its value, and of course you must pay me an increased price for it." The lost state of consciousness amongst mankind could scarcely, we think, be shown in a more striking light. It appears to be only in dealing with an individual, when we can think how we should like to be used so, that we have distinct notions of justice. In dealing with the abstraction called a railway proprietor, men seem to think themselves entitled to cheat, overreach, and extort without restraint.—Chamber's Journal.

FATE OF COACHMEN.—Ask the people of Bristol and Chester what saved them up; and they will tell you, while they were asleep, Liverpool ran off with their trade. And if you have a time to go there, ask the first coachman you get alongside of, what he thinks of the railroad; and just listen to the funeral hymn he'll sing over the turpikes. When I was in England last, I always did that when I was in a hurry, and it puts coaches in such a passion, he'll torn to and fro like horses out of spite into a full gallop. He'd say, them that sentenced them to ride to ruin the "pikes (go along you lazy sultan, Charley, and he'd lay it into the wheeler), they ought to be hanged, Sir, (that's the ticket, and he'd whip the leader); yes, Sir, to be hanged—for what is to become of them as lent their money on the "pikes" (Wh-ist, crack, crack, goes the whip.) Hauged and quartered they ought to be. These men ought to be regenerated as well as the shareholders. I wonder, Sir, what we shall all come to yet? Come to, says I, why, to be stokers, to be sure—that's what all our coachmen will end in at last, as sure as you are born. A stoker, Sir, said he (lookin' as bothered as if it was a French furrier that word,) what is that? Why, a stoker, says I, is a critter that draws, stirs, and spouts the fire of a steam-engine. I'd sooner die first, Sir, said he, than I would. Only think of a man of my age and size being a stoker, Sir; I wouldn't be in the fellow's skin that would propose it to me for the best killing that ever came out of the mill. "Take that, and that, and that," he'd say to the off'ward horse (a layin' it into him like mad,) and do your own work, you dishonest rascal. It is fun alive, you may depend.—Sam Slick.

ADULTERATION OF WINES.

The Lecturer declared it to be his decided conviction, from having narrowly investigated the question, that four-fifths of the wine sold in Great Britain was fictitious, and manufactured without the juice of the grape. According to the entries in the Custom-house books, the quantity of wine shipped from Oporto to Guernsey, in 1812, was 183 pipes and 20 hogsheads, and in the same year there was landed in the London Docks alone, from Guernsey, professing to be port wine, 2,343 pipes and 162 hogsheads. (Great laughter.) In 1820 the number of pipes of wine exported from Oporto to the Channel Islands was 38, and the number sent from thence to London was 293. (A laugh.) In 1827 the number was 39, and the same number of pipes were shipped thence to London. In 1828 the number was 70, which they had manufactured into 75. In 1829 they received none from Oporto, and shipped to London 90. In 1830 they received none, and shipped for London 247. And in 1833 they received none, and shipped to London 862 pipes. (Great laughter.) The Rev. Gentleman then read a receipt for the manufacture of port wine, which comprised red beet-root, brandy, sugar, logwood, rhatany-root, &c., and related an anecdote of a carpet-manufacturer who, on hearing the list read exclaimed—"Oh, now I understand why, when I have gone to the docks to purchase logwood, I have always found one of the principal wine merchants there picking out the choice pieces. (Great laughter and cheering.) Receipts for manufacturing champagne, Madeira, &c., were then read to the meeting, none of these containing any grape juice. A statement which had appeared in one of the London papers a short time since was thereby referred to, relative to the large wine manufacturing establishments at Marseilles. The wine there made were shipped to Madeira, and, after being braided, were dispersed all over the world as Madeira wine, being minus merely the juice of the grape. The lecturer then read a list of the ingredients used in the manufacture of fictitious wine, which included, brandy, gypsum, blood, lime, beet-root, bay salt, oyster-shells, egg-shells, lead, white-brown, sweetbrier, white laurel, water, Cambray-wood, red sandew-wood, Brazil-wood, molasses, chips, saw-dust, rhatany-root, damsons, hickory-nuts, &c. &c. The reading of this catalogue excited great laughter.—Put.

BOOKSELLERS' ESTIMATES OF LITERARY PROPERTY.—At first Miller would not give Thompson a farthing for his "Winter,"—he afterwards gave him three guineas for it. (ave offered half the bookshelves in London the property of the Gentleman's Magazine, they all refused to engage in it, he was obliged to publish it himself. "Burn's Justice" was offered in vain to every publisher for 50*l.* Dr. Buchan offered his "Domestic Medicine" to every principal bookseller in Edinburgh and

London for 100*l.* without obtaining a purchaser; and after it had passed through 25 editions, it sold in 32 stores at 50*l.* each. Brewster offered the copyright of the "Miserics of Human Life" for 50*l.*; it afterwards realised 5,000*l.*—Put.

DETERIORATION OF THE VACCINE MATTER.

The fatal prevalence of small pox is to be ascribed, we think, to the criminal neglect by parents of vaccination; and, in a certain degree, to the failure of vaccination itself as a preventive. We know that for years, no matter from what source, genuine vaccine matter had not been obtained from the cow itself; and now, when the mortality from small pox is awakening inquiry as to the causes which occasion its re-appearance, we are glad to find that the medical profession is also becoming sensible to the necessity of adopting means for its eradication. Dr. Charles Severn, Registrar of the Medical Society, Boli Court, has just published "An Inquiry into the Causes of Failure in Vaccination; with suggestions relative to the means of insuring its full protective influence," for the avowed purpose of calling the general attention to the present state of vaccination. He says—

"As small pox is kept up solely by infection, it is highly probable that, but for the circumstance of its having been disseminated by interested persons, it could now be known in England only as matter of history; and that the most certain method of extinguishing it is to render the protection afforded by vaccination as secure as possible.

"In considering this subject I have been led to the opinion that, in the transmission of lymph taken from a granitic-room animal through a long series of thousands of human constitutions, and at a distance of so long a period from the original source, it may have lost some of its properties, acquired others, or become so modified, as to afford a less perfect protection than when taken immediately from the animal; and that, therefore, the first few constitutions so peculiar, that small pox inoculation itself, with all its dangers and disadvantages, would fail to protect. To avoid the degeneracy to which all the arrangements and products of animal organisation are peculiarly liable when detached from the circumstances and situations in which they are formed, it is, I think, unreasonable to place undivided confidence on lymph already transmitted through a long series of human beings; the infinitely varied influence of constitution and temperament may, and probably does, affect the power on which its preserving efficacy depends.

"A recurrence to the cow as the genuine source for fresh and unchanged lymph would, in all probability, afford the best and most perfect security. The progressive deterioration of vaccine inoculation was wholly overlooked by its first discoverers, and is not admitted to have taken place by many practitioners at the present day—who argue, that because small pox possesses the same degree of virulence as in former ages, and produces the same destructive ravages, except when modified by the influence of vaccination,—vaccination itself has undergone no change; forgetting that small pox remains in the human constitution where in it is naturally developed, it therefore has undergone no alteration, and lost none of its virulence in the last 200 years. If small pox were communicated to another species of animal, and after being transmitted through a series of 70,000 of them in descent, were then found to possess all its original properties, and manifest precisely the same appearances, the cases would then be similar, and the inference just; but as the two diseases exist at present, none can be more perfectly distinct in their origin, nature, circumstances, and peculiarities, and, consequently, no just inference can possibly be drawn from a comparison between them. To render the circumstances analogous it would be necessary to inoculate 70,000 cows in descent with small pox matter, and to wait forty years for the result—the cases will then be parallel, but at present there is no analogy between them whatever. Indeed all analogy seems to be in favour of the progressive deterioration;—a plant indigenous, and thriving in one soil and climate, when introduced into another, and under new circumstances, when removed from its original situation and transplanted in another foreign to it; and, if it retain existence at all, by a law which appears universal, it becomes changed by the novel circumstances in which it is placed, and the unaccustomed influences to which it is exposed, from which it was in its original situation wholly exempt."

"After stating the practice consequent on the promulgation, by Dr. Jenner, of vaccination, Dr. Severn proceeds to say that, "the present day, when the practice of vaccination is almost, if not exclusively, confined to educated medical practitioners, its failures have become far more common and remarkable" than they were at earlier periods. He subsequently observes—

"It will appear from these considerations that the preserving efficacy of vaccination was, at its commencement, far more general and more perfect than at the present day; and that it has gradually undergone a diminution, not, indeed, of vital consequences, as it will usually obviate the fatal effects of the most fatal form of disease, and render it a comparatively trifling ailment. If the explanations, offered as to the degeneracy of vaccine virus be correct, it is obviously our duty to render the protection afforded as secure and lasting as it was when Jenner first brought it into notice, by procuring lymph immediately from the animal, using only that which is recent, and which has not been exposed to the modifying influence of a long series of human constitutions. This I have at length, after much delay and many disappointments, succeeded in obtaining, and shall be happy to vaccinate gratuitously with the lymph.

Mr. Severin's successful efforts in procuring and supplying vaccine matter from its original source, namely, the living animal itself, deserve the thanks of the profession and of the community. His tract should be read generally.—Pat.

TRAGICAL EVENT.

Five children and their Mother killed by poison, wilfully administered by the Mother.

Happy, for the state of morals in this country, and the sober and social tone which, in a national sense, characterises its community, it seldom falls to the lot of a public journalist to lay before his readers the details of so heart-rending and so horrifying a tragedy as that of which we read in this week our melancholy duty to communicate the particulars.

The scene of the shocking occurrence to which we refer is a small hamlet, called Fairburn, in the township of Gossanburgh between eight and nine miles from this town, and about six miles from Garstang. Edward Sanderson, his wife and their five children, residing at Fairburn, in which place Sanderson has lately been occupied as a day labourer. On Thursday morning last, Sanderson went to his work, but was not expected home to dinner; he left his wife and five children in their usual state of health, and did not observe any thing particular in the demeanour of the latter. About half-past 12 o'clock at noon of the same day (Thursday), Mr. John Brewer, of Little Ingelwhite, was passing Sanderson's house, when he was called in by Mrs. Sanderson, who stated to him, that if, (suspecting herself and children) had eaten some pudding for dinner, and she was afraid there was something in it which had poisoned them. She also requested him to go for a surgeon. Mr. Brewer, at this time saw the children, and they, as well as their mother, appeared to be sick, and the younger children were vomiting.

A medical man, resident in the neighbourhood, was in attendance before one o'clock, and he found both the mother and children in so dangerous a state that he was induced to send for Messrs. Smith and Andrews, surgeons, of Garstang, both of which gentlemen rendered their assistance with all possible promptitude. The medical gentlemen, by use of medicines and other means, exerted themselves in every possible way during the afternoon, to mitigate the suffering, and, if possible, preserve the lives of the ill-fated family, but unfortunately to relate, their efforts were unavailing and unavailing.

The names of the children were—Eleanor, 12 years of age; Daniel James, 11; Margaret, 6; Robert, 4; and William 2 years of age. Previous to the shocking affair of which we write, they were all flourishing children, and in the enjoyment of good health. About five o'clock, Robert, the youngest boy but one, after enduring the most acute suffering, died; a very short time afterwards, William also expired in great agony. At this period, we understood from an intelligent informant, who was present during the whole of the time the dreadful drama was in progress, that the scene was at once awful and harrowing. The groans and sobs of the three surviving children—the ghastly, terrified, and death-stricken appearance of the dying mother—the despair and alternately wild and subdued distraction of the afflicted father—the lifeless remains of the two poor infants who, a few hours before, were "all gay with life"—and the significant and horror-excited silence of the spectators, presented, in their united influence upon the mind, the effect of that appalling thrill and heavy emotion which we may sometimes see portrayed in the pages of romance, but which are rarely used as the representatives of reality.

The next two children, Daniel James and Margaret, languished in great anguish for about an hour longer, when they also died nearly simultaneously. Not a long period elapsed after the period of life were closed upon the two last named victims, ere Eleanor, the eldest of the ill-fated family, breathed her last. Long before her dissolution, it had become quite plain that the true hand of death was fast enrolling within its grasp the mother of the five murdered innocents. Before her death this unhappy woman stated, that in consequence of her being in debt her neighbours had come on her, and that she had, therefore, put some arsenic into the pudding to poison herself and children. She also made some communications to the Rev. Mr. Grundwell, but we have not heard to what effect. The poor creature died in excruciating torture, between 9 and 11 o'clock. She was 34 years of age.

The dreadful catastrophe has, as may be well supposed, created the strongest degree of consternation and excitement in the locality where it occurred. We understand that, a short time ago, Sanderson kept a small shop, which was principally managed by his wife. They were not successful in business, and were obliged to discontinue the shop, having incurred debt to the amount of about 40*l.*, which they were unable to discharge.

This, it appears, preyed upon the mind of the deceased woman, and she has frequently of late been heard to express the most melancholy forebodings.—Preston Chronicle.

64th regt. N. I. belonging to the corps specified in the margin, and they will afford protection to the head quarter camp, until further orders, under the command of the senior officer Captain K. F. McKenna, of the 44th regiment of native infantry.

The 27th regiment of native infantry, on being relieved, will rejoin the brigade of the army of the Indus, to which it belongs.

Head Quarters, Camp Ferozpur, 14th December, 1838.

The head quarter camp will be struck on the morning of the 18th instant, and the head quarters staff will march, according to a route to be prepared by the Quartermaster General of the Army, to Meerut.

3. The Commander-in-Chief intends to proceed on the same morning, by boat, down the Sutlej and thence to the Indus, and so to Bombay.

4. The time has therefore arrived for his connection with the Bengal army must cease; but he cannot allow it to be severed, without first bidding that army farewell, and offering his best wishes for their prosperity and happiness.

5. The support which he has received from the general officers holding commands, and the generally excellent conduct of all ranks in the army, European and Native, have for some time past rendered his command a task of great ease; and he offers his best acknowledgements and thanks to all, for this gratifying result.

6. He feels that he cannot adequately thank the general staff of the head quarters of the army, for the able and friendly assistance which they have rendered to him on all occasions; and he now takes leave of them with regret, and with feelings of cordial esteem and regard.

The troops belonging to the portion of the army of the Indus, under the command of Major General A. Dewart, will parade in review order, at 5 o'clock to-morrow morning, on the ground on which the 10th lancers were encamped, for the public investiture, by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, of the medals and honors by the native officers nominated to the honors of the Orders of British India.

The troops to be drawn up in three sides of a square, and a nominal roll of the native officers to be issued, distinguishing the two classes, to be forwarded to the Adjutant General of the army, with as little delay as possible.

The Neemuch station order of the 24th of October last, appointing Lieutenant and Adjutant General H. Dewart, of the 30th, to act as interim staff of the 3rd and 71st regiments of native infantry, proceeding to Bhow, is confirmed.

Captain Meredith's detachment order of the 4th ultimo, appointing Lieutenant J. T. Daniel, of the 47th regiment of native infantry, to act as interpreter to the detachment of Europeans Invalids, &c. proceeding under his command, to the Presidency by water, is, with the sanction of the Right Honourable the Governor General, confirmed.

At a general court martial held at Bhow, on Thursday the 22d day of November 1838, Gunner Henry Edmonds, of the 2d troop 1st brigade of horse artillery, was arraigned on the following charge:—For having, at Bhow, on the 21 September 1838, feloniously and wilfully killed Girmah, a hospital orderly, by striking him with his hands, and with a leather strap, of which blows and of rupture of the spleen, caused the death of Girmah, who died three days after.

Finding.—The court having considered the evidence brought before it, and what has been produced on the defence, are of opinion, that the prisoner Henry Edmonds, of the 2d troop 1st brigade of horse artillery, is guilty of the charge preferred against him, with the exception of the word 'wilfully,' of which they acquit him.

Sentence.—The court having found the prisoner guilty of so much of the charge as is specified, are, in sentence him, Gunner Henry Edmonds, of the 2d troop 1st brigade of horse artillery, to suffer an imprisonment of six weeks.

Approved, (signed) H. FANE, General, Commander-in-Chief, East India. December 12th, 1838. The officer commanding at Bhow will suggest the prison in which the courtier may, the most conveniently, undergo his punishment.

Head Quarters, Camp Ferozpur, 15th December, 1838.

The Presidency division order of the 22d ultimo, appointing Ensign T. C. A. Wofsy, recently admitted into the service, to do duty with the 80th regiment of native infantry at Bureeska, is confirmed.

The regimental order of the 31st instant, appointing Lieutenant H. T. Combe to act as interpreter and Quartermaster to the European regiment, vice General appointed Aide-de-Camp to Brigadier A. Roberts, commanding the 4th brigade of the army of the Indus, is confirmed.

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief is pleased to make the following removals and postings:—

Lieutenant Colonel G. R. Skardon, (on leave) from the 40th to the 4th regiment of native infantry at Agra.

Ensign J. C. Fitzmaurice, from the 3d to the 17th regiment of native infantry, at his own request, to fill a vacancy.

now even, and the opportunity has been enhanced by our contemporaries to discuss the propriety of continuing the lotteries. It was always within the power of Government, during the existence of the debt, to have terminated the lotteries at once, by relinquishing the claim; but the subject is now, by the peculiarity of circumstances, brought more prominently to view. We hope it will be regarded, not in its narrow financial bearing merely, but under the higher considerations of moral responsibility, and that the determination which may be formed, will proceed on principles worthy of a great and magnanimous Government. That the State Lottery of Calcutta is a great public nuisance, there are few in this enlightened age who will venture to deny. It is not merely by the influence which it exerts, through the medium of its own machinery, that this conviction is forced on the mind, but it has gradually become the fruitful parent of a long progeny of evils. It is the minor Lotteries, which are annually increasing, which spread the contagion of vice through every rank of society, and give a fearful energy to the corrupt principle of gambling, in which the whole system rests. The most alluring and fallacious advertisements are put forth to entrap the unwary, while the minute subdivision of tickets, bring the temptation within the reach of all but paupers. Thus the whole circle of society is tainted; and the minds of the people are drawn off from the habits of honourable industry, and involved in a state of feverish anxiety for sudden and adventitious wealth. Disappointment, instead of ending down the path, only gives it a fresh impetus; and not only are the earnings to which a family should look for support cast into the wheel, but debts are contracted, which, in many instances, embitter the remainder of life. When the capacity of borrowing is exhausted, other and more infamous practices are resorted to by the victims of this delusion; and thus immorality and misery in every diversity of form are propagated through the community.

It is not possible, however, for the public authorities to come to the rescue of society, while the evils we have described are fostered by the Government itself. It would be a strange solution to put down the minor Lotteries, while the State kept open its own great gambling shop. While the debt existed, there was some faint pretext, though no excuse, for continuing this mode of paying it off. That pretext is gone; the hypochondriac of the Lottery fund has ceased, and Government is now in a position to wipe its hands of this pollution at once. The improvement of the City of Palaces is now the only object for which the Lotteries profess to be maintained, if they are suffered to exist. But we beg the authorities of the State to enquire seriously, whether the embellishment of the town is not purchased at too high a price, when it is obtained by the sacrifice of its morals? If we were able to ascertain the statistics of crime in Calcutta, and to trace up criminality to its source, we should discover that no small portion of it is derived from that propensity to gambling which is kept alive by the State Lotteries. It is a perfect anomaly for Government, therefore, to manifest so deep an anxiety for Police reform, when this great source of crime is kept open and fed by the public functionaries of the State. Better ten thousand times that the outward improvement of the city should cease, if it can be attained only by wasting the substance, and destroying the habits and morals of its population. A city adorned by such means, is but a painted sepulchre, filled with the wreck of human virtue.

Government cannot, in the present instance, plead the want of a good example. The same arguments which have been brought to the support of the Calcutta Lotteries, were long employed to encourage a similar evil at home. Year after year were efforts made, but in vain, to induce the Chancellor of the Exchequer to relinquish this nefarious mode of raising a revenue; but the public voice, growing louder every Session, at length constrained Government to abandon it. At the interval of several years France took up and improved on the example, and not only put down all Lotteries, but shut up the Gambling Houses. Here are two noble examples for our imitation; and we cannot reject them without scolding our own conduct. We should be sorry, indeed, to find any individual with the hardihood to advise the Whig Governor General of India to allow himself to be outstripped upon such a question by the Conservative Chancellor of the Exchequer.

THE EDUCATION COMMITTEE.—The papers and notes that Dr. Wise, the Principal of Houghly College, has been appointed Secretary to the General Committee of Public Instruction. It is matter for sincere congratulation that the advocacy of the Secretaryship has at length terminated, and that the election to this important office has been made with so much discrimination and judiciousness. We are fully prepared to coincide with the eulogiums which have been passed on the late Secretary, Mr. C. C. Sutherland, and have only to regret that, during the entire period of his immaturity, the salary should have been so small as to forbid his devoting the energies of his mind exclusively to this work. We have heard, that the new appointment has been accompanied with such an augmentation of allowance, as to give the Committee some claim on the unimpaired labours of the Secretary. A considerable step has been gained towards the intellectual regeneration of India, by this practical acknowledgment of its importance. But before any large results can be expected, the department of Public Instruction must take a higher position in the economy of our administration, and the system of management must be entirely remodelled. We trust that we shall not be suspected of the slightest disrespect for the gentlemen who constitute the Committee, when we say, that the sooner the management of this department can be assimilated to that of other departments of the public service, the better. Large Committees are a sad thing on business; but when the Committee is not only large, but consists entirely of individuals who are unconnected with other duties of primary importance, the prospect of its efficiency is reduced to an imperceptible point. The Education Board is thus formed of a variety of benevolent and able individuals, who are not fully occupied with other labours, as seldom, or ever, to be able to meet the body for mutual consultation. Proposals are, therefore, sent round to their houses or offices. The first individual whom it reaches, is obliged, out of courtesy, to record his opinion, and the next two, three, or four in succession often follow the bellwether, and content themselves with "a ditto" opposite their initials. Some member at length, perhaps, starts an opinion, in an opposite direction, and those to whom the paper are subsequently sent, are embarrassed by the two tracks which are thus open to their choice. The document is at length returned to the Secretary, who is often, we hear, sorely pressed to discern the sense of the Committee,—we mean the term only as qualifying the presiding vote. Sometimes the Committee happen to be equally divided, and one part neutralizes the other. Now this is not the way to provide for the education of this empire. It is not the way, indeed, in which any business can expect ever to succeed. Were those interests on which the safety of the empire hangs, to be committed to such a system of agency, the Board of Directors would soon be able to make the alarm, and demand the instant reform of a system threatened to destroy the British power in the East, and to interrupt the annual dividends. We could not regard the Education of India as among the most weighty of its political responsibilities, and to make a corresponding arrangement for carrying it forward. Instead of this large and unwieldy Amateur Committee, our ambition for the glory of the British Empire in India will not be satisfied, till a "Minister of Public Instruction" has been appointed, with a salary equal to that of any other political functionary. Napoleon, with all his faults, still taught Europe the great lesson, that public education was an important department of the State; and it will never be bright in India, till his doctrine has been reduced to practice. We are gradually beginning to creep to his conclusion, a quarter of a century after Parliament first ordered that the two hundredth fraction of the Indian revenues should be laid out for its mental improvement. And it is to be hoped, that the system now existing will be gradually modified; till it is resolved into the individual responsibility of one well paid Secretary, and the Council of India consider the department of Public Instruction so much within the circle of their duties as that of Finance or Police.

It has been mooted in the papers, that the post of Principal of Hooghly College is to be made an appendage to the office of Civil Surgeon at Hooghly, a proposal so pre-eminently absurd in its nature, that it is difficult to think of it with patience. It did happen that the most eminent qualifications, both medical and educational, met in the person of Dr. Wise; but many years may pass over before a second Civil Surgeon of Hooghly shall be found fit to take the direction of so vast an Institution; and it would be absurd to entrust it to him, simply because he is able in another department. It would be to degrade the Institution, by the adoption of a principle contrary to the plainest dictates of common sense. It would be an insult to all those who are subalternately employed in conducting the College, and who are supposed to have been selected for their fitness, to put an individual over their heads in the supreme direction of the Institution without the smallest reference to his qualifications. We are happy to hear that the Committee have protested against the adoption of such a principle of action; and we trust their voice will be heard. If Government be anxious to avoid the inconvenience of competition, why not allow the post, when vacant, to be filled up on the principle of seniority. The Institution would then obtain for its President an individual qualified for his post, at least by his long acquaintance with its operations; and the application of this principle on the present occasion would also secure the services of one, who, with every other recommendation, combines the highest intellectual gifts.

SEVENTEENTH REPORT OF THE CALCUTTA BAPTIST FEMALE SCHOOL SOCIETY.—This Society undertakes the support of Female Christian Schools, connected with the Missions of the Baptist Missionary Society, in Calcutta, Beahloona, and Cutwa. That in Calcutta is superintended by Mrs. George Pearce. In the first half of 1838, the number of children under her care was thirty; and in the second half, twenty; seven having been married, and others having been taken home for a time by their parents. The following are given as the books used in the School; and, of course, they describe the education bestowed: The Holy Scriptures, Pilgrim's Progress, books on Geography and History, Yates' Elements of Natural Philosophy, Annual Biography, and some smaller works mentioned in former reports: Anecdotes on Moral and Religious Subjects, Bible and Gospel History, the History of Daniel, and Mr. Leechman's Catechism, with Scripture Proofs, have been introduced during the past year. Writing, arithmetic and sewing are also attended to; and the children make good progress, shew a love to reading and thirst after knowledge, and are commended for the excellence of their general behaviour. The following very interesting statement of still greater good done in the School is contained in the report of Mrs. Pearce: "Mr. Yates kindly examined eight of the girls and baptized them in the Circular Road Chapel, on the 30th September last. The ages of those baptized were from nine to fourteen. Two women were baptized at the same time, who formed a part of the adult School that was mentioned in former reports; one of the women was the mother of one of the school girls, and the other the aunt of another; both of them, we have reason to believe, received the greater part of their religious knowledge from the children in the School."

The School at Beahloona is conducted by Mrs. Williams, and contains twenty girls, who are taken through a course of instruction, similar to that adopted in the Calcutta School, but as yet more elementary. The Cutwa School is under the care of Mrs. W. Carey, and is attended by 36 girls; the greater part of whom are only commencing their education, and taking the place of others who have gone to be married. This School is supported entirely by local contributions, and not from the funds of the Calcutta Society.

The operations of the Society are of great importance in raising the character, both for intelligence and piety, of the coming generation of our Native Christian population; and therefore, they deserve the support of all to whom that is an object of desire.

SECRETARY OF THE SANSKRIT COLLEGE.—We have received several letters from Native gentlemen, intimating that some dissatisfaction is felt, in consequence of the mode in which it is supposed the vacancy in the Secretaryship of the Sanskrit College is to be filled up. It is imagined, that Bahadur Ram Kaul Sen, who must now vacate the office, on proceeding to the Upper Provinces, is endeavouring to bring in as his successor, some connection of his own—a man of no such qualifications or standing as himself. If it be so, we cannot but think the Bahadur would be acting inconsistently with his own patriotic character. We should expect from him a disinterested proposal of measures clearly conducive to the improvement of his countrymen—such measures as would both make the system of public education effective in all its parts, and enlist the affections of the most influential of our Native gentry in its success. The Secretaryship of the Sanskrit College on such considerations, it seems to us, should be given to some gentleman whose own education has been such as will enable him with intelligence and interest to watch over the progress of the Institution. He ought to be a person so worthy of the public honour conferred by an appointment of this kind, that his receiving it will give a stimulus to others to aim at similar attainments; and, if possible, his rank should be such as to draw popular respect to the Institution with which he is connected.

EXAMINATION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY'S INSTITUTION.—We are sorry to find we were led into error respecting the distribution of prizes, in our notice of the public examination of the Assembly's Seminary. We stated that Mr. Chander Banerjee had received a gold medal from the Rev. Mr. Charles, and a second had been bestowed on Mr. Lall Singha. The fact, however, is, that the gold medal is the gift of David MacFarlan, Esq., who, two years ago, appropriated a considerable sum for procuring by its yearly interest a gold medal annually as a premium for the best scholar in the Institution. It has been determined that the highest boy in the First Class should be acknowledged the best scholar, and, consequently, be entitled to this reward. In the present year that enviable position was occupied by Bahadur

THURSDAY, JANUARY 29.

The intelligence received from Seinde, by way of Bombay, is not very favourable. Cattle for the use of the army was in great request, and not easy to be obtained. Thirty thousand mounds of gold, would be required for the combined forces, and the Amers were backward in their supplies. Sir John Keane, the Commander of the Bombay forces, had reached the army. He was waited on by the Amers with a present of four hundred sheep, which he refused to accept, until they fulfilled their stipulation of 25,000 British Government, relative to the supplies of cattle. Dispatches had been received from His Excellency, at Bombay, which were dramatically scaled as it regards the public, in consequence of which, various rumours were about; some purporting that there had been a breach with the Amers; others, that an engagement had taken place with a part of Dost Mahomed's army. These, and other rumours are entitled to little credit, it appears evident that the difficulties of marching were greater than had been anticipated, and that large military and pecuniary resources were required. Early in the morning, a formidable and formidable army, composed of the Western Provinces, came to the aid of the army, and had been blessed with abundant stores, and the army was, consequently, promising.—On the 14th January the army was two feet deep in the ground at Sindh, and the British Government was at a loss in the open air.—The Amers, who had just come in from Roos, has a supply of cattle, which are very much appreciated for the approaching hot weather.—Lieut. J. H. Pratt, the son of the Venesside Mr. Pratt, one of the warm supporters of the Church Missionary Society, and a native of London, has just arrived from England, in the Harpephid, as the appointed Chaplain to the Bishop of Calcutta.—The Harpephid just after she left Calcutta on Sunday last, for Madras, by the Madras, The Guinea will, it is supposed, be despatched with dispatches to Cal. Benson, in the course of the present week.—The Harpephid of yesterday carried on board the subject of the Transit Dunes, levied on a ship proceeding down the delta, by the orders of the King of Oude. Not only the few dumb-bell, heavy, but the detention and the vexation to which the Indians are subjected, occasion very serious inconvenience. We have just been awaiting to Mr. Ross the first news of prize which he earned by adding the Transit Dunes in the Western Provinces. Surely Government will be anxious to show this great and beneficial measure to be in reality the interference of a State, which extends only to our soldiers.—The Editor of the Courier, who appears to have been summarily dismissed by the Management of the Military Orphan Society, and deprived of "one thousand a year, in which he, of course, considered himself as having a vested interest," threatens to appeal to the army at large. This unfortunate Society appears to be always in hot water with its establishment. Beside, the report tells us, was found in the cloister. In India it seems to have taken up its residence at Kidderpore.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 30.

The Management of the Military Orphan Society, it is said, have not succeeded in obtaining a new European resident, or a good European. The first are scarce in Calcutta, and the second are scarce in India, and it is necessary to import one direct from England. The Management have, in this instance, are, I suppose, under the usual presumption, that being dissatisfied with the first, when they gave out (Ruppes) a month, they were likely to obtain a superior writer to succeed him at 500 Ruppes a month.—The news from the Indus continues unfavourable. Sir A. Burnes who, we believe, across the Indus at Sikarpore, finds his situation very precarious, and fears he shall be obliged to fall back upon the advanced army. He is urging the advance of which Sir A. is contented with all speed. The Commissariat Officer at Sikarpore finds himself awkwardly situated, in consequence of a proclamation which has been put forth, threatening with the severest penalties all those who should supply the army with provisions. Sir A. Burnes has, however, succeeded in purchasing the Bolan pass, and had about 2,000 Affghans at his disposal, who were ready to follow him to the English. Major Leech, one of the fugitives, we believe, from Herat, has reached Kelat, and prevailed on the Amers of that place to join us.—The following is the latest account from Sunday, dated January 10th:—Sindh is a very fertile and fertile country, and report that heavy rains have been falling for three consecutive days at a place called Kangar Keen, on the Iravaddy, distant four days march to the Indus. The Prince is supposed, or was conceived to have taken place, at, or in the neighbourhood of Rangoon.

who had from another part of the country come to Mangalore to seek further instruction in the doctrines of the gospel which he had previously heard and believed, was, after a short preparation, baptized, and continues to rejoice our hearts both by his increasing knowledge and by a walk worthy of his profession.

Our Society at home, when they saw that the Lord was with us, took courage and determined on sending out a reinforcement of five Missionaries, who, we hope, will ere long be landed on these shores, and will enable us to fortify ourselves in some other important places in the country between Goa, Kallangi, Mertara and Mangalore.

At Hubli, a large town in the neighbourhood of Dharwar, inhabited chiefly by Lingaites, some of us will continue in the course of the next twelve months, and one of our brethren will within a short time settle at Honavar, a port about a hundred and twenty miles to the north of Mangalore. We have not yet commenced establishing schools on a larger scale, as we are afraid of entrusting Mission schools to heathens, when they cannot be carefully superintended by the Missionary himself. We are, however, training up school-masters in an institution established at Mangalore within the last year, which contains at present twenty-four boarders, from the age of six years to nineteen. All of these boys have been surrendered to the Mission by their parents or relatives, and receive a strictly Christian education, being carefully watched and trained by two of the Missionaries who have been set apart for this work. A similar institution for the purpose of educating a number of native girls is under contemplation. We intend, if our Society do not object, to receive about eighty boys and girls into these two institutions. Besides the school connected with this institution, in which English and Canarese, and the elements of Scriptural knowledge, of Mathematics and History are taught, there are one Canarese and one English school established at Mangalore; the number of scholars attending the latter is from thirty to forty, and is slowly increasing. Some twenty or another German Missionary, formerly in connection with a Mission in the south east, joined us and now are occupied by our native Christians, two of whom are preparing for the work of evangelists.

The common language of our Mission is the Canarese, which is spoken by several millions of British subjects. At the same time Telugu, the language of the lower castes in Mangalore and the surrounding country, a language never before studied by Europeans. Marathi spoken by large numbers of Brahmins at Dharwar and to the north of it, and Hindoostanee have been studied by different members of the Mission. Our Society have promised to send, if it please the Lord, next year again a number of Missionaries to carry on our war against the powers of darkness, and we hope that He who has honoured us, His unworthy servants, with the glorious privilege of making His saving name known among our perishing brethren, will move those who are looking and heeding unto the coming of the day of God, to open their hearts and hands to support a Missionary Society which, I trust, in money the poorest, has been richer in men prepared for the proclamation of the gospel among the heathen, than all the rich Societies of Great Britain.

Since 1818, our Society has sent forth into the broad field of the world 180 Missionaries, most of whom on account of the slender means of the Society, have been obliged to enter the services of Foreign Societies; of this number 33 have gone home, 92 are still labouring in connection with several Dutch, German and English Societies. The Missionary settlements in direct connection with our Society are, one on the Western Coast of Africa, established among the Ashantis, and consisting of three Missionaries, one of whom is married; our Mission on this side of India consisting of 8 Missionaries, two of whom are married, and our Mission now establishing at Auluckpore, in the interior of this country, where it is carried on by four or five Missionaries. At Auluckpore is a college under the immediate superintendence of the Committee of our Society, where about 40 students are preparing for their work under the care of four evangelists, one of whom is our much beloved and esteemed principal, G. Binchard, M. A.

Never, as far as I know, have the annual contributions collected by our Society from different parts of Germany and Sweden, exceeded our European contributions, which is not quite equal to £7000. As neither we ourselves nor the other Missionary brethren, connected with our Society, receive salaries, and as all are anxious to manage with as little money as possible, in order to enable our Society to make greater exertions in the cause of our Lord, these small resources have hitherto proved sufficient. And now when the Lord is encouraging our friends at home to send more labourers into the heathen harvest, we are confident that He, who is rich above all, will know how to provide for all. May to all of us, who are proclaiming His holy name, grace and faith be given to enable us, to labour and to suffer, to live and die, to His glory.

H. MOENING.

We most affectionately commend these promising missions to the Christian liberality, and fervent prayers of our readers. We shall be happy at all times to receive and transmit to them any contributions with which we may be entrusted.—Edin.—184.

THE HISTORY OF BENGAL.

We have devoted it fair to Mr. Marshman to republish his reply to the critique which appeared in this Journal on his elementary History of Bengal. Before we offer any remark on this defence, we beg to remind Mr. Marshman of a circumstance that he appears to have overlooked, although we adverted to it last week, that D. L. R. is not the Editor of this Journal, though as he is one of its most valued contributors, we should have requested him to vindicate his own criticism, or to make such admissions as Mr. Marshman's answer might seem to require; but as he is absent from Calcutta, we must take upon ourselves an office which we should rather have entrusted to D. L. R. himself.

If we have rightly understood the scope of D. L. R.'s remarks on Mr. Marshman's work, which were certainly conceived in no unfriendly spirit, they went merely to object, that it had not been redivided so attractive as it might and ought to have been, and assuming the suicide of Clive as a fact, that ought to have been stated as well as the causes which drove this distinguished man thus to terminate his existence. On the first point Mr. Marshman pleads guilty to the sole impeachment of the critic, but urges that in such a work, designed for children of tender age, and intended quite as much to assist them in English as in history, it is scarcely reasonable to expect that rare and happy combination of "the severity of truth with the allurement of the imagination," which might be looked for, (though it would be looked for in vain in almost every publication with which we are acquainted) in works of higher pretension. We are inclined to think that if D. L. R. had adverted more particularly to the object Mr. Marshman had in view, that he would have been disposed to mitigate, if not altogether, to waive, his objection to the publication; and we are bound to add, in fairness to Mr. Marshman, that on looking more attentively at his work, we do not find it deficient in many of those little innocents, which though not strictly historical, are extremely interesting and attractive, though narrated in a very simple style. As one example we may mention an incident related with respect to the capture of Chandernagore. The French having sunk vessels in the river, and left only a very narrow channel for ships, that channel was discovered to the English by a French inhabitant who was offended with the Governor, and thus the place was taken. This man having afterwards made money in our service, sent some of it to his aged father in France, but the old man returned it and even, as the carriage of a traitor, to his son, who instantly killed himself at his own cost. Incidents of this kind are not merely interesting, but they serve to "point the moral and adorn the tale" of history.

With regard to the suicide of Clive, Mr. Marshman gives very satisfactory reasons for not stating it. He doubts the fact and cannot find it stated in any authority to which he had access, though he mentions its authenticity of high reputation. We have referred to another, Mr. Clive's History of India, and have been unable to trace in that even any mention of Clive's death, much less in the manner of it, so that on this point we hold Mr. Marshman's answer to be complete. We do not know on what authority D. L. R. relied for the fact. Probably he trusted to the general impression which prevails that Clive did commit suicide. At this, we think that he would, on a further inspection of Mr. Marshman's work, be inclined to admit that it was not a dull, though unquestionably an unimaginative production.—Literary Gazette.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY'S SESSION AT MADRAS.

(From a Correspondent.)

We had the gratification of being present at the second examination of the General Assembly's St. Andrew's School last Thursday, (10th). The examination commenced with the younger classes a little after eleven A. M., and terminated with the older or higher a little after four P. M. This occupied about an hour.

Sir Edward Gauthier presided with the usual courtesy on the occasion, and during the whole exhibition evinced the liveliest interest and untiring patience. We give in our concluding remarks the substance of his address to the boys in the numerous classes at the conclusion of the business of the day. There were many life and gentleness present on the occasion; but what gave life and effect to the scene was the determined presence of Native on the right of the chair; chiefly youths belonging to other Institutions, and who seemed to enter with zest into all that passed before them. The feature that struck us most in each class, in the youngsters as well as oldest, was the thorough understanding of the lessons which the boys displayed. The power of thinking had evidently been called into lively action. The boys in each class cross-questioned each other, and discussed each other's powers; putting past all doubt the reality of the knowledge they had acquired, and the precision and accuracy with which they comprehended the subjects that engaged their attention.

The most deserving scholars in each class, before they passed off the stage, received at the hands of Sir Edward Gauthier the prizes awarded to them; these meanwhile covered the table at which he sat; and in giving them he addressed each boy in an appropriate manner which was evidently appreciated and felt.

The interest incurred as you advanced to the higher classes, and the same system, mutual instruction, under the management of monitors pervade all. In the Scriptures, in History, in Geography and Grammar, they were then fairly situated, and, in regard to the former, it was astonishing the grasp with which they had laid hold of the great principles of religious truth; and none can know the value they set upon them and their just perception of their nature, but those who witnessed the development, and saw that they were able to contrast these with the error and folly inherent in their national superstition.

That they thought and reasoned, the most sceptical must, we conceive, have felt convinced who heard the written essays, portions of which were read by the boys who composed them. We understood not less than 50 essays in writing were given in, and the product was the fruit of meetings that were for some time past been established among the boys in the Wednesday evening of every week; when the subjects for argument were stated, discussed, committed to writing and criticised by the boys themselves; while their teacher sat and moderated their efforts. The next Essayist got for a prize Paley's works in 8 volumes handsomely bound. This subject treated on the impediments that existed to the diffusion of a sound education amongst natives, and discussed at large the question of caste with which the school had recently struggled, and which had cost it 100 boys in the struggle; after all the roll continued 170 boys, and we believe the greatest number of these were furnishing in the respective classes on this interesting occasion.

To the best scholar was awarded Mill's History of India, and all the rest received prizes suitable to their merits. In addressing the monitorial class at the close, Mr. Edgercomb spoke to the following effect: He had witnessed with great interest the progress that had been made, which he was sure had been greatly owing to their exertion in carrying out the system under which the school was conducted, through the superintendence of their teachers. The labour must have been great that could produce such good results, and he had only further to say that they required themselves to his entire satisfaction, he might say, to his surprise.—Madras Correspondent.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

MR. DEAR SIR,—A late number of your valuable paper contains an article headed, "Caste in the Madras Presidency," in which I am about to trouble you with a few observations.

You remark, that caste prejudices are much stronger in this Presidency than in that of Calcutta, and that they extend even to the Christian converts; so that the Brahmin proselyte is served with the sacred elements before his Soudra brethren. The core is in reality, however, much stronger than you have here represented, as a Brahmin convert has rarely or never been known on this side of India; the greater number of proselytes by far is in the Soudra tribe; and next, and nearly equal to them in number, are the Pariah converts; and those vehement and unchristian disputes which so much obstruct the reception and progress of the Gospel, and which are such a source of trial and difficulty to the zealous Missionary, occur between these two tribes: the former refusing to be placed on a footing of equality with the latter. These sentiments are strongest in the Tanjore Mission; and the condition of the body of professing Native Christians connected with it, is, it is to be feared, lamentably dead. This is a question in which it is not very easy to decide on a right course of conduct; on the one hand the minister of Christ cannot consistently or conscientiously recognise any natural superiority of one class of men over another; and on the other, it cannot be doubted, that a zealous, but injudicious opposition to these prejudices, has raised up a spirit of combination and resistance in their support, which makes their eradication more difficult. Really this state of things appears to reduce the indulgence of prejudices and pride of caste ad absurdum; and it might almost be hoped, that the higher castes would discontinue to limit on them, when they find themselves thus sped by the lowest; even as, it is said, the nobility and higher classes in England have been in a great measure shamed out of duelling and crim. con. actions, since those methods of arranging disputes have been resorted to by tradesmen.

As to the case alluded to, as quoted from the Madras Spectator, that arises from another condition of caste, unknown, probably, in Bengal and Hindoostan. The tribe of Soudras is subdivided and re-subdivided in these provinces into numerous mitations, each branch being distinguished in name, in some trifling observances, and often by the refusal to intermarry with members of the others, from the other branches. These numerous families or clans have, in former times, been divided by the Brahmins into two classes, called the right hand and left hand; and these two parties are continually at variance. In every village and town one party or the other has the pre-eminence, according to the circumstances of its foundation; the predominant party is entitled in such village or town to certain symbols of homage and acknowledgments of superiority from the other party, in the conduct of the public religious observances and other affairs of the village community, and in private marriages and other ceremonies, both from such as are residents in the village and strangers; so long as these customary rights of signiority (so to speak) are duly rendered and received, well and good, every thing goes on peaceably and orderly; but when they are withheld, or when, as less frequently occurs, the superior party demand more than their right, confusion and discord immediately ensue: the fellow claimants of the parties from the neighbouring places frequently interfere, (even if the breach of custom was not the result of their instigation,) and serious and sometimes fatal conflicts often follow.

It is the part, you will perceive, of the Magistracy, after quelling the disturbance, to ascertain which party committed the breach of usage which led to it: this is difficult, because the custom is not ascertained and uniform, but varying in every village; and, therefore, to be established in every individual case by special evidence, where the personal or claimable feelings of almost every person cognizant are interested, and where truth is so little prized as by witnesses in this country, you will readily admit that this is a matter of no easy solution; it would be much more difficult, but that in many instances of this kind, documentary evidence exists in the hands of one party or the other, and were not Brahmins, and some of the higher divisions of the Soudra caste exempt from the chains of right and left hand faction, and, therefore, as far as respects their cast prejudices, neutral.

From the foregoing detail, you will perceive that the resolution stated by "The Spectator" to have been adopted by one of the judicial tribunals on the individual case in question, namely that it must be decided according to general, and not special, usage, is erroneous. It is a principle sanctioned by the highest judicial authorities, and the best informed public officers, that no such general and uniform custom exists. You will perceive, secondly, how futile and unmeaning are the Spectator's concluding remarks, when he expresses a hope, that the present necessity may be made useful, by becoming the means of eliciting a legislative enactment to settle all such cases for the future; I have not the papers by me, but this, if I remember right, was the tenor of his remarks. It is easy to fix and ascertain by law such customs as are in themselves general and uniform; but where the reverse is the case, all that can be done by the Legislature towards preserving peace, is to enact, that established usages shall not be infringed; and in this case that is not necessary, as it is the universal practice to uphold such prescriptive rights, and punish their infringement.

These remarks of the Spectator, however, show how easy it is to pen a few general and chatty remarks on a subject, of which the writer is in the most perfect ignorance, especially when those remarks are accompanied by a little animadversion and ridicule cast upon a public officer.

These remarks have run, my dear Mr. Editor, to a most unbecomable length, and I must apologise for troubling you so heavily; before I conclude, however, I must take the liberty to correct your derivation of the word "Pariah." Against your etymology there are two objections; first, that it is brought from a language never general in this Peninsula, and not introduced at all, till as late as the Mahomedan invasion; and, secondly, that it does not accord with fact, for the Pariahs are no more Hillmen than any other class of the population. The true derivation is from the Tamul word (பாறு) Parra, signifying a drum; hence comes, in strict accordance with the Tamul rules of formation, the appellative noun (பாறுவர்) Parryavars: the Pariahs are, indeed, that tribe who, in the village communities of the Carnatic, hold the hereditary office of (பாடி) Taly, or (பாடி) Taly.

ult in the worst species of democratic tyranny. "What will be the probable result of Universal Suffrage?" inquires Professor Cooper, the President of the South Carolina College, in his Lectures on Political Economy. "I do not mean," he proceeds, "this sparse population like that of the United States at the present moment, but when we suppose a much denser, as it will do in half a century. If Universal Suffrage prevail, the political power of the country will be sooner or later thrown irrevocably into the hands of those who represent the operatives, the labouring classes, the men of no property, to the exclusion of the men who possess property. This event is now continually expiated by the anarchic meetings of New York and Philadelphia." When the people of the country become an object of a solemn legislation to the representatives of the poor, will it be held sacred?"

Again: "The great mass of the community," remarks the Vetterli Professor, "are as yet unfortunately ill-educated, unformed, and unable to judge accurately of the qualifications of candidates. Moreover, they will naturally have a leaning to prefer persons in their own class of society to represent them. With Universal Suffrage, does it never happen that the ignorance of the community is pathetically represented?"

"I do not believe," he adds, "the mischief of that tyrannical and absurd maxim, the will of the majority ought to govern, is yet sufficiently understood among us. If so, then the minority has no right, no privileges, no property, no destiny." Suppose the representatives of the nobles, who are now openly advocating an equal division of property among all (Jan. 1850.), to become the efficient legislative majority; if those property would be safe under this system of liberty and equality, enforced by such a majority? What a glorious range of rapine and plunder would present itself to the innocent advocates of the right of robbery! This would be the true millennium of the jail-tantray throughout the civilized world!"

The author of the volume from which we take these paragraphs, published, as far back as 1850, a pamphlet in this country in favour of Parliamentary reform. The Duke of Richmond's proposal of Universal Suffrage was then in vogue among the Reformers. The experience of thirty years having led to a modification of his early political opinions. Mr. Cooper, in 1852, protested against the theory in his Notes to Students' Institutions. His Lectures on Political Economy appeared in 1851. Although they contain doctrines and statements which should we should strongly except and protest, they bear very conspicuous marks of acuteness, extensive knowledge, and independence of thinking. "My present opinions, in old age," says the Professor, "are not in exact conformity with those of my boyhood; but I trust they are equally in favour of the just rights of the people against those who abuse their admitted power." He is strict in his estimate of the right of voting to those who are a year's residence actually paying taxes, not the amount that "there ought to be none. Real, substantial, localised evidence of a man's stake in the country." For persons to be permitted the exercise of a privilege which they possess only in name, and which others can effectually control, is, he justly remarks, "a sinning enormously to the power of the rich and powerful." He shows that "in the last election preceding in Kent England, a secret decision was expressed by master-manufacturers who, in counter the votes of their operatives, had the candidates' names printed in italics!"

The Chairman of the Manchester Meeting (Mr. Fielden) referred to America as a political model. Without saying undue stress upon the authority of the able American Economist, we think that these extracts will furnish a sufficient reply to the challenge. We have given in another part of our column some excellent remarks upon "Limited and Universal Suffrage," from the Statesman. Our Contemporary, however, over-rides the working of the American democracy. Ignorance and poverty, "the conditions which render Universal Suffrage unsafe," are, even there, but too extensively prevalent among the masses. "Give us a good, an efficient system of Education, open gratuitously to all, with half a century to try the effect of it," says Professor Cooper. "And I should be strongly inclined to give up my argument." "With knowledge pervading the community, I have no fear." But if knowledge is to govern, and not brute will, how is high physical force resolved itself, knowledge, even when diffused most generally among all classes, will be found the possession of individuals of every class, but not of the many. The government of knowledge must be the government of a minority, although for the interests of all.—Put.

Dr. Radcliffe, a celebrated physician in the commencement of the last century, and founder of the Radcliffe Library, at Oxford, entertained but a mean opinion of the practice of physic, and criticised very few books. When Dr. Bathurst, the Master of Trinity College, visited him, he inquired of him where his study was; to which Radcliffe, pointing to a few phials, a skeleton, and a herbal, replied, "Sir, this is Radcliffe's library." He held that the whole mystery of physic might be written on "half a sheet of paper." In after-life he is said to have declared, that, "when a young practitioner, he possessed twenty remedies for every disease; and at the close of his career, he found twenty diseases for which he had not one remedy."—Put.

A RUSSIAN PARSON'S WANTS.—A MAN goes to his minister to inform him of the death of his wife. "What will you give me for burying her?" asks the priest. "I am poor," replies the applicant. "Well, give me your cow." "Nin, a cow is too valuable; I have a goose, you shall have that." "That is no little, I will not bury your wife for a goose; pay me thirty rubles." "I will give twenty." "No, I will take twenty and a shirt." And so the bargain is concluded, but cordially is at an end.—Elliot's Three Great Empires.

AN ECCENTRIC CHARACTER.—Died on Tuesday, at his residence, Willow Cottage, near Ritham, Mr. Jonathan Walton, aged 72 years. In early life he formed an attachment to the daughter of a small farmer at Crayford, but his friends being averse to their union, he was sent in the East Indies, where by perseverance he accumulated a considerable property. During 22 years which he was absent, he regularly corresponded with her; but on his arrival in England, he was only in time to pay the last tribute of affection to his beloved, who having expired two days previous. Ever after her death he secluded himself, availing only society except her brother's, by whom he has left the bulk of his fortune, amounting to upwards of £20,000, subject to the payment of two annuities of £75, each to a male and female servant, who were his only domestic for nearly 20 years. His house was built in the cottage style, situated at the extremity of a small grove of willows and poplars, and furnished in the most simple manner. The window-shutters in the front were never suffered to be open. His meals were temperate, consisting of bread and milk for breakfast, one dish of boiled meat and soup for dinner, with which he allowed himself a glass of ale, and coffee in the evening. He would not permit either wine or spirits on the premises, but so far from being penurious, he was a great benefactor to many poor persons in the neighbourhood, whom he supplied with fuel and warm clothing in the winter months. He allowed his beard to grow, except on the upper lip, and his hair, which was light brown, and very long, hung in ringlets over his shoulders. His usual dress was a knee dark gown, and when seen, which was but seldom, he had as much the appearance of a hermit as he was known to many persons in the vicinity by no other appellation. He was a well-informed person, and possessed a most excellent library, which, with his household furniture, he has bequeathed to the medical gentleman who was particularly attentive to him during his last illness.—Put.

We have met with the following interesting correspondence between George the III. and Lord North in the Journals we received by the last Mail, and publish it to correct the assertion of Sir Herbert Taylor, that the King's Ministers went freely with him in that unusual warfare. These letters confirm the impression which has long prevailed, that the American War was the King's Own War.—Ed.

LETTERS FROM GEORGE III. TO LORD NORTH.
(From the Athenaeum, No. 308, May 9, 1833.)
We are indebted to Mr. Jared Sparks for the following highly interesting paper, intended to be hereafter published in his great national work, a complete edition of the writings of Washington. Extracts from the letters of George the Third to Lord North, selected by Lord Holland from the manuscripts of Sir James Mackintosh.

1774. September 11th.—"The die is cast, the colonies must either triumph or submit."

November 18th.—"The New England Governments are now in a state of rebellion. Blows must decide whether they are to be subject to this country or independent."

December 13th.—"Dilectus Lord North's proposal of sending commissioners to America is ineffectual."

1775.—"Sundry expressions in favour of coercive measures and rigour, and many assurances of perseverance which prove the King's own determination, and imply by inference that he thought even at that time that Lord North required exhortation to keep him steady in the pursuit of his object, the subjugation of America. Throughout this year the King was confident of success, and urged Lord North not to relax his endeavours. On the 18th of August blames him for delaying the proclamation to declare American rebels, and forbids all intercourse with them. There are some expressions even in the correspondence of this year that raise a fair inference of a wish in Lord North's mind to quit the ministry, or at least the first place in it. "As to your offer," says the King in a letter of November 7th. "It is very handsome, but I can never consent to it." What the offer was is not stated, but from the context there appears some arrangement, which would have removed him from his employment, "the profits and honours of which," his Majesty observes, "are in the best hands."

1778.—The same spirit pervades his correspondence, but there are few or no extracts distinctly marking any difference between the King and the minister.

1777.—His indignation with the Americans seemed to increase. He is unwilling to believe in France going to war, and presses for vigour in North America to deter her.

1778.—As early as January there are symptoms of Lord North hinting at some offer of peace, for the King says, "Nothing short of independency will be accepted. I do not think there is a man either bold or mad enough to treat for the mother country on such a basis. Perhaps the time will come, when it will be wise to abandon all America but Canada, Nova Scotia, and the Floridas, but then the generality of the nation must first see it in that light; but to treat with Independents can never be possible."

1778, January 31st.—A direct answer to some letter of Lord North, expressing a wish to retire, in which the King, after appealing to Lord North's personal affection to him, and his sense of honour, and bestowing great praise upon him, goes on to say, "You must remember, that before the recess I strongly advised you not to bind yourself in bringing forward any plan for restoring tranquillity in North America, nor from any unwarlike ideas of conditional submission, which my mind never approves of, but from foreseeing that whatever can be proposed will be liable not to bring America back to her attachment, but to dissatisfy this country, which so cheerfully and handsomely carries on the contest, and has a right to have the struggle continued till convinced that it is vain. Perhaps this is the minute that you ought to be least in a hurry to produce a plan, from the probability of a declaration of war from France," and again, "I do not mean to reject all ideas, if a foreign war should not arise this season, of laying a proposition before Parliament."

It is manifest from this letter that Lord North had proposed some overtures, or plan, for conciliation unpalatable to the King, which he was earnest at least to postpone; and it may be reasonably inferred from the words in italics, that Lord North at expressing his wish to retire, had urged the impracticability of obtaining "unconditional submission," which he supposed, and probably with justice, to be the King's determined and sole object.

February 9th.—When it appeared from private information that war with France had become inevitable, the King expresses his anxiety, before "the veil was drawn off by the court of France," that Lord North should "not delay in bringing in his proposition."

Early in March.—He had hesitated reluctantly to a sort of offer, to Lord Chatham (who had recently declared against the independence of America) to join or support Lord North's administration, but positively objected to any application to help in forming an administration. "Should he wish to see me," says the King, "before he gives his answer, I shall most certainly refuse it."

March.—The King's correspondence, throughout the first week of this month, is full of protestations against conditions and changes of ministry, so vehement and so frequent that they prove Lord North to have urged them earnestly and repeatedly. "He would run any personal risk rather than submit to opposition." "He is grieved at Lord North's returning to the painful subject." "He will rather risk his crown than do what is disagreeable." "If the nation will not stand by him they shall have another king, for he never will put his hand to what will make him odious to the last hour of his life." "To give Lord North edge he will accept of the services of those men in his ministry; but rather than be attacked by those desperate men he would lose his crown, and not wear it at a disgrace."

March 22nd.—Calls on Lord North to answer a plain question.—"Is he resolved at the hour of danger to desert him?"

March 23rd.—Is satisfied with Lord North's answer, and always thought "his sense of honour must prevent him from deserting."

March 26th.—Seems to be brought to some disposition to accommodate matters through the commissioners with America, and to close the war with that country.

March 29th, 30th.—Lord North seems anxious to have decided continuing minister further than to close the then existing session, or as long as might be necessary to make arrangements; and the King insists on Thurlow being immediately made Chancellor.

From March to May.—Lord North considered himself as merely holding his office till the session was closed, and his successor appointed; but in May the King earnestly urged him to continue, and prevailed. The King says, on the 5th of May, "Remember the last words you used, 'You did not mean to resign;' but Lord North reverts to his intention of resigning almost immediately afterwards, and the King writes many remonstrances, and shows great sorrow and irritability."

June 10th.—Lord North applies to resign, two days before the prorogation.

In the summer recess, July, Lord North seems to have hinted at negotiation for peace; for the King urges the necessity for war, but protests his readiness to "sheathe the sword when permanent tranquillity can be obtained."

In the Autumn.—"If ministers show that they never will consent to the independence of America, and that the assistance of every man will be accepted on that ground, I am certain the cry will be strong in their favour." In the same letter he remarks that "if any one branch of the empire is allowed to throw off its dependency, the others will infallibly follow the example."

1779.—He again empowers Lord North to accept services, but does not wish any change in the Treasury; and stipulates, in offering the admiralty to Lord Howe, that he shall concur in prosecuting war in all quarters of the globe.

June.—No man in my dominions in my solid peace more than I do. But no inclination to get out of the present difficulties, which certainly keep my mind very far from a state of ease, can incline me to enter into the destruction of the empire. Lord North frequently says, that the advantages to be gained by this contest never can repay the expense. I own that in any war, be it ever so successful, if persons will sit down and weigh the expense, they will find, as in the last, that it has superseded the state entitled; but this is only weighing such events in the scale of a tradesman behind the counter. It is necessary for those whom Providence has placed in my station to weigh whether expenses, though very great, are not sometimes necessary to prevent what would be more ruinous than any loss of money. The present contest with America I cannot help seeing as the most serious in which this country has ever engaged. It contains such a train of consequences as must be examined to feel its real weight. Whether the laying a tax was deserving all the evils that have arisen from it, I suppose no man could alledge without being thought more fit for Hell than a seat in the Senate; but step by step demands of America have risen. Independence is their object, which every man not willing to sacrifice every object to a momentary and inglorious peace must oppose with me in dilating this country can never submit to. Should America succeed in that, the West India trade, which is not in independence, but dependence on America, Ireland would soon follow, and this land reduce itself to a poor island indeed." Throughout the summer the King continued to write to his Minister, strongly deprecating the admission of any man into office who was inclined to acknowledge the independence of America, or to sit with those who lean to independence; and,

June 23d.—He says, "What I told yesterday was the desire of frequent and severe self-examination. I never can depart from it. Before I will bear of any man's readiness to come into office I shall expect to see it signed under his own hand, that he is resolved to keep the empire entire, and that no troops shall consequently be withdrawn from thence, nor independence ever allowed."

November 30th.—He tells Lord North that "if he is resolved to retire he must understand that such a thought necessarily by Lord North, is very unpleasant to me."

December.—He authorises Lord Thurlow to attempt a coalition, promising "to do for his remembrance any events that may have displeased him, provided it is understood by those who join with part of his present ministry, in forming a more extended one, that every means are to be employed to keep the empire entire, to prosecute the present just and unprovoked war in all its branches with the utmost vigour, and that past measures be treated with proper respect."

Though, according to Lord Thurlow's representation of the matter, no proposal was ever made to the persons in opposition, he felt the pulse of some leading men, and as they seemed disinclined to engage for themselves, and still more for others, in the extent of the King's suggestion, his Majesty remarks with some asperity, "I see what treatment I am to expect if I call them into my service. To obtain their support I must deliver up my person, my principles, and my dominions into their hands."

1780, March 7th.—In answer pretty evidently to a hint about American independence: "I can never suppose this country so far lost to all ideas of self-importance as to be willing to grant American independence. If that could be ever universally adopted, I shall despair of this country being preserved from a state of inferiority. I hope never to live to see that day, for, however I am treated, I must love this country."

May 19th.—Earnestly exhorts Lord North not to retire.

STEAM COMMUNICATION.—From the intelligence brought by the last Mail, we are much gratified to find that the question of Steam Navigation between England and India is making steady progress. No decisive step has, it is true, been taken towards the actual establishment of a plan which shall embrace the interests of all India, but the subject continues to attract attention. The agitation of it is decidedly on the increase, and in England the steady agitation of any measure which has reason and equity in its favour, is the most certain forerunner of success. Political circumstances have suddenly brought India into notice; and those who have been awakened to a sense of the importance of the empire, are led irresistibly to the conclusion, that the first step towards the salvation of the empire, menaced as it is with another northern invasion, is to bring it into the greatest possible proximity to the resources of Great Britain. It happens also that at this juncture the means of rapid communication, across the ocean by means of steam vessels have been almost miraculously improved; and it is seen at once to be a political duty to embrace to their fullest extent all the improvements so opportunely created, in order to lessen the distance between England and India. The Times has enlisted itself in the cause, and has brought in the aid of its powerful advocacy. Other journals of minor note are beginning also to feel their way to the question, and to perceive that in the great struggle with the Northern autocrat, which Napoleon's prophetic eye fore-saw thirty years ago, and which appears now to be impending, one of the first measures we must adopt is, to unite India with England by a bridge of steamers.

An article, in the forthcoming number of Purbury's Oriental Herald, published in the London Herald Extra, calls for individual exertion in this enterprise, from a conviction of the hollowness of the zeal which the East India Company have professed on the subject. The author goes over their policy step by step, and proves that they have never catered into this great question with cheerfulness and alacrity. The stern opposition which, while it was safe, they manifested to the establishment of any communication whatever by steam between India and England, and as well as the reproaches which they heaped on the Governor General whenever he ventured to send the High Lighthouse up the Red Sea with dispatches, is now matter of history; and the page which contains it will be turned up and read with no friendly feelings, when the removal of the Charter is again brought before the public. Principally, there has been no subsequent exhibition of zeal in this cause, which might have assisted in lessening the remembrance of that impetuous opposition; and even the triumphs of the Great India have failed to excite one spark of animation in Leadenhall Street. Several vessels have, it is true, been sent out, but they are utterly inadequate to the duty, and the benefit they confer is confined to one part at the extremity of India. The Court appears to be as fully determined that the idea of steam communication shall not be extended directly to Ceylon, Malacca, Calcutta, and the Eastern Islands, as they once were that it should not be bestowed even on Bombay. With the experience of several years before them, that the communication between Bombay and Suez cannot be kept up for more than two-thirds of the year, the Directors would rather that the intercourse should be interrupted during several months than that an experiment should be made to steam from Calcutta, which might prove successful. When Lord William Bentinck waited on Sir John Campbell, the President told him that authority had been given to the Government of India, to make the trial of a direct communication between Calcutta and the Red Sea; when the Deputation waited on the Chairman of the Court of Directors, he said, that nothing whatever had been done on the subject. There is a heartiness in this proceeding, which would lead the mind to wonder that the destinies of a hundred millions of the human race should be committed to the heads and hearts of such men, did we not see constant tokens of an invisible, but Almighty power which brings good out of evil, and succeeds out of opposition.

In March, 1857, the Court state that they have observed that the Government of India has adopted arrangements, for the acceleration of the dawk, by which packets may be conveyed from Bombay to Calcutta in from eight to ten days, and which the Court consider to be a much more rapid and certain, and unquestionably a much more economical mode of communication than a steam conveyance. Twenty-two months have since elapsed; and during this period in no one instance has the journey been made in ten days; instead of any acceleration, the dawk has been steadily and regularly becoming more and more tardy. To take an instance of the most favourable month, that of January, for dawk travelling. The High Lighthouse reached Bombay on the 1st of January; yet many of her packets did not reach Calcutta till the sixteenth of that month. Instead of having letters conveyed in this most friendly month in eight days, seven days elapsed between the receipt of the first and the last packets brought by that vessel. So much for the acceleration of the dawk. It is a fact beyond controversy, that an adequate steamer built upon the last model would actually convey the mails, four thousand eight hundred miles, from Suez to Calcutta, in four or five days less than that is now consumed in conveying them, eleven hundred miles, across India, from Bombay to Calcutta. And it is equally certain that the expense of such a steamer would be lessened by an immediate increase, to twice or three the extent, of letters; far not only is the Metropolitan of British India obliged at present to put up with this detestable and irregularity, but to pay for it into the bargain. Every letter sent from Bombay to London costs ten and sixpence; every letter from Calcutta, costs nearly double the amount, or four and sixpence.

PRINCIPAL OF HUGGLEY COLLEGE.—Dr. Carbyn has taken up our remarks on this subject in the last number of his India Journal, and stated that in his opinion the wish of the Committee of Public Instruction, to expedite the appointment of Principal of the Huggley College from that of the Civil Surgeon, is very unwise; but surely no man can be so fit as a medical man to hold the situation alluded to, if he possess a disposition and other qualifications to instruct. The good Doctor thus unwittingly neutralizes his own opinion, and gives us his vote, while he fancies that he is all the time voting against us. We do not object to the appointment of the Civil Surgeon of Hooghly to the highest post in the Hooghly College, provided he has all the necessary qualifications. But to make the Principalship an appendage to the situation of Civil Surgeon, is to establish the principle that the Surgeon shall preside over the College, whether he possesses the necessary qualifications for managing its multifarious and important details or not : and to this we would offer the most strenuous opposition.

Again, Dr. Corbly thinks that those peculiar qualifications which fitted Dr. Wise so eminently for both situations arose from no individual endowments of mind, but grew spontaneously out of the nature of his professional education ; and that any other individual who had received the same education as a Physician, would have been equally capable of doing justice to both posts. Here the Doctor returns again to the ex-officio qualification principle. But the ink is scarcely dry before he turns round and knocks his own assertion again in the head. He adds immediately after, that he agrees with us that the appointment of any Civil Surgeon indiscriminately to the situation of Principal, by virtue of his office of Civil Surgeon, might be prejudicial, unless, in addition to his professional education, he possessed temper, zeal and ability,—which is the very position for which we are contending. It appears, then, that although the sole cause of Dr. Wise's fitness arose from his professional training, yet there are other qualifications necessary, without which it would be prejudicial to deliver the College over to the Surgeon. We fear that Dr. Corbly has dashed off this article in the heat of the moment, without considering whether his arguments would pull together. Indeed, we are almost quite sure that such must have been the case, for he talks of "connecting the duties of the Civil Surgeon with that of Principal," which is altogether to reverse the position for which he is apparently combating. This new and startling proposal of making the Principal ex-officio the Surgeon, will demand grave deliberation, and we recommend it to the examination of the Medical Board at its next sitting. Dr. Corbly has, however, done the side we advocate a most essential service, by this transposition ; for we are certain it will appear to that learned body, quite as absurd that the Principal of the College should be ex-officio the Civil Surgeon at Hooghly, as it appears to the Education Board that the Civil Surgeon should be ex-officio the Principal. On the one hand, if the Civil Surgeon of Hooghly happens to possess, as in the case of Dr. Wise, all the necessary qualifications, no one could object to his nomination as Principal, merely from the fact of his being the Surgeon ; but on the other, it would be unwise to degrade the College, by placing at the head of it a man totally unqualified by nature, disposition, talents, and education, simply because he happened to be the Civil Surgeon of Hooghly.

THE WEEKLY POLITICAL REGISTER IS DEAD.—None of our contemporaries have recorded the fact in their obituaries, and the task of communicating it to the public devolves on us. At the beginning of the week we received a letter from Mr. Stanhope to inform us that the Journal had been discontinued. That its exit might correspond with its advent, which was accompanied with a pious announcement that the Editor was a man of illustrious family, and traced his pedigree back for seven centuries into the dark ages, Mr. Stanhope's letter was sealed with a broad seal of red wax, with an Earl's coronet, and the ancient motto

Dem spiro spero. It came directed to the Editor of the Friend of India, in company with the letters of the overland mail ; and we opened it in the anticipation that the representative of some historical family in England had condescended to patronize our humble labours ; but it turned out to be merely the necrology of this abortion of the Indian Press.

Before the Weekly Political Register passes into oblivion, we claim the ear of our good friends for one remark on our newly acquired Liberty of the Press. The appearance and death of this Journal affords, we think, a strong proof that this freedom is not so dangerous an enemy to the British Empire in India, as some of the best friends of the country have erroneously supposed it to be. The Political Register was started at a period when the political horizon in India was obscured with clouds, and when the shades which appeared to be settling upon the empire afforded a fit theatre for the dark designs of treason. With all the venom, though without any of the life and genius of Calhoun's celebrated paper, of which it usurped the name, it addressed the worst passions of our nature. It attacked the most venerated names in the Indian administration with the most virulent abuse ; it left no element of any note untouched ; and it endeavoured to stimulate the Natives to unequivocal revolt. Those who disapproved of the great measure of Sir Charles Metcalfe's reign, fancied that the occasion had now arisen, which would demonstrate the incompatibility of this "freedom of unlicensed printing," with the safety of the empire. Some are supposed to have counselled a public prosecution, and rumours were industriously circulated that consultations had been held with the Advocate General. We profess to know nothing which could either confirm the truth or expose the fallacy of these reports. But this we do know, that Government took no notice whatever of the paper or of its author ; and we know that nothing tended so strongly to hasten its dissolution. Government calculated rightly that treason bore no premium, even in the Native community, and that the European portion of the Press, notwithstanding its fondness for an occasional growl, was sound and loyal at heart, and had manifested its fidelity to the best interests of the State on this occasion, by treating the Register with silent contempt. Government, therefore, steadily persisted in refusing the Editor the crown of martyrdom or a charter party passage to England ; and the consequence has been, that the paper, after having burnt its resources down to the socket, has gone out, leaving not even a wreck behind. As to any effect it may have left on the Native mind, this may be fairly estimated from the fact that, the Editor employed his expiring numbers in abusing the Natives of India as the most ungrateful of all creatures, in allowing the only real friend they had ever possessed, thus to sink to the ground under the weight of his patriotic struggles. Here, then, is another ordeal through which the Freedom of the Press has passed, and it issues from the crucible brighter than ever. The time is not come when the Liberty of the Press can be politically dangerous ; and we question whether such a period ever will arrive. We have seen the Native Persian paper, which endeavoured to poison the Native mind, rendered innocuous by the raising of the siege of Herat. It was from no susceptibility of disaffection in the Native community, that it became in the smallest degree formidable. Its power of mischief was borrowed from the difficulties of our empire, and ceased when those difficulties disappeared. And if no such paper had existed, yet, in the circumstances in which we stood three months ago, rumour with her thousand tongues would still have been busy in exaggerating our troubles. A strong Government in this land has nothing politically to fear from the Press ; and a weak administration will totter and reel, though no Press should assail it.

EXERCISES ON THE BOOK OF GENESIS, WITH PRACTICAL REMARKS, DESIGNED FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE YOUNG. By SARAH THOMPSON.—We blame ourselves for delaying so long to introduce this little volume to the notice of our readers. It is intended as a help to parents, and to others, in the religious instruction of their children, and is well fitted for the purpose. Although it will be found exceedingly useful at any time, Christian mothers and elder sisters will find it particularly so in enabling them to devote a portion of their Sabbath Day's retirement to the spiritual culture of the younger branches of their families. A child suffers a great loss who does not early learn to make a difference between the Sabbath and common days. At the same time the Exercises which distinguish it ought to be made as much as possible interesting to the curiosity, and alluring to the affections of the child. The Sabbath should not be made a weariness, but a delight, to the little learner; and an ample store is furnished by the Bible narratives for use in this way. The best recommendation of Miss Thompson's Exercises is, that they show how a portion of those narratives should be used; and any person who goes through Genesis with her assistance, will be able to go much farther afterwards without it. The style of the book is easy and simple; its sentiment generally just, and its spirit highly affectionate and pious. Our readers may judge of it for themselves, from our of its sections:

"Part XXXI. Jacob's Journey to Egypt, and his meeting with Joseph.

"1. When Joseph's brethren had arrived in Canaan, what did they say unto Jacob their father? They said, 'Joseph is yet alive; and he is governor over all the land of Egypt.'

"2. How did Jacob receive the news of Joseph's being alive? He could hardly believe them, till he saw the waggon that Joseph had sent to carry him and his family into Egypt; and then his heart revived; and he said, 'It is enough: Joseph my son is yet alive: I will go and see him before I die.'

"3. Did Jacob go with all his family into Egypt? Yes: there was Jacob and his daughter Dinah; his eleven sons and their wives; fifty grand-children and four great grand-children; which do the number of his family seventy-five, including the wives of his sons.

"4. When Jacob came to Beersheba, what did he do? He offered sacrifices to the God of his father Isaac.

"5. What did he mean by offering sacrifices? They were offered by way of thanksgiving and praise for the late happy change in his family, for the good news he had heard concerning Joseph, and the hopes he had of seeing him before he died. They were offered no doubt with a humble desire for God's approbation and protection in the important journey, which he was now making, with a desire that God might be with him in the way in which he went.

"6. During this journey who spake to Israel in the visions of the night? God spake to him.

"7. What did God say? 'I am God, the God of thy father. Fear not to go down into Egypt; for I will there make of thee a great nation.'

"8. Why was he afraid to go into Egypt? His concerns for the best interests of his family might lead him to fear that they would be drawn away by the pomp and vanities of Egypt, to forsake the true God; but we may safely venture ourselves in any situation, if God promise to be with us; and we ought not to go into any place or company where we cannot expect the presence and blessing of God to accompany us.

"9. Jacob must have been greatly comforted by the visions which he had, to proceed on his journey and go down into Egypt? He had not only comfort, but encouragement to go forward: for the promise was a sufficient encouragement to Jacob to trust that He would do all things well.

"10. When Jacob was drawing near to the end of his journey, what did he do? He sent Judah before him to tell Joseph that his father was come to Goshen.

"11. What did Joseph do when he heard this? He made ready his chariot, and went up to meet Israel his father; and a very affecting interview it was.

"12. What did Israel say to Joseph? He said, 'Now let me die, since I have seen thy face, because thou art yet alive.' This was uttered from the fulness of his joy on this happy event.

"13. Where did Joseph conduct his father and his family? He conducted them to the land of Goshen, called also the land of Ramesses. It was situated in the eastern part of Egypt, being that side that lay nearest to the land of Canaan."

"Practical Remarks.

"How wonderfully did God bless Jacob; and show him that he was under the divine protection, and that he would still keep him. Let us set the Lord 'always before us,' and 'sanctify him in our hearts,' and 'make him our fear;' and then we shall be delivered from the fear of others. Joseph as a brother, showed respect and love to his brethren, notwithstanding all the unkindness he had formerly received from them. Though he was a great man, and they were comparatively mean and despicable, especially in Egypt, yet he owned them. Our Lord Jesus, like Joseph here, is not ashamed to call us brethren. Observe what humility; what matchless grace resides in the blessed Saviour, when he condescends to call poor sinful creatures, such as we are, his brethren. O Lord, make us not thy brethren in name only, but in spirit and in truth. Remember the pious remark of David, 'That the angel of the Lord encampeth around those who fear him.' Good men of old, and the blessed patriarchs were now and then favoured with visions of these heavenly guards, and there can be no doubt, that though they are invisible, they are the agents of God, and employed for the good of God's servants. May it be our happiness to be made like them to Abraham's bosom. Let us always learn to trust the promises of God, as Jacob did, being assured, that faithful he who hath promised, and will also do it. Let us cheerfully resign ourselves to his disposal, in the belief of the delightful promise, 'That all things work together for good to them that love God,' to them who are the called according to his purpose."

REPORT OF THE LADIES' NATIVE FEMALE SCHOOL SOCIETY, in connection with the LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY, for 1888.—This Society devotes its care to a Female Christian Institution, under the superintendence of Mrs. Campbell and her Sister, formed after the same plan as those we had the pleasure to notice last week, as connected with the Baptist Mission. The Committee give this very sensible account of the state of their interesting School, and the principles on which it is conducted: "When the last Report was offered to the public, there were connected with the Society, 30 orphans and Christians: since that period there have been admitted eight; married to the young men of our Native Churches seven; died one; withdrawn three; remaining entirely dependent for board and education on the funds of the Society, twenty-seven. Every day these little ones, are instead of being degraded and corrupted by heathen Society, taught to engage in the exercises of our holy faith; and instead of pursuing a mere life of drudgery, ever bending to the earth as beasts of burthen, are engaged in attaining a knowledge of useful and domestic habits, by which their husbands will be able to see, that an instructed woman is a better and more comforting companion than an ignorant and untaught being—that education and religion have taught her not only to minister to his wants, but to be a comfort and solace to his mind. With this design in view, the Committee have carefully eschewed the inducing of any habits foreign to the people, or were such of their own country as may be beyond their reach in after life, for their design is not merely to make them better educated than their heathen neighbours, but also more useful. That which chiefly occupies the attention of the Committee, however, is the religious welfare of the girl, and in this they hope that their labour has not been in vain in the word." Several of the children give evidence of ge-nine piety, and two of them have been baptized during the past year.

The Report states the pleasing fact, that at every station of the London Missionary Society, their fellow labourers have established institutions similar to their own, but maintained by independent funds. At Besauree and Mirzapore, in Upper India, therefore, there are Orphan Asylums; and at Chinsurah and Berhampore an Asylum, Day and Infant Schools.

The Committee do not appear in their Report to have done full justice to their own cause. In the cash account there is an entry of 232 Rs. for the expenses of the year; but of these, certainly inferior, yet, not a word is said in the Report. The Committee are in a prosperous state, and have no need to be in a hand.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 31.

General Orders have been issued for breaking up the reserve troops which were left at Ferozepore, and the various corps have been ordered back to Meerut, Kurnal and Ludhiana.—The Draft of two Acts, containing the revised Charter of the Bengal Bank, and the new Charter for the Bombay Bank, the establishment of which the Court of Directors have just sanctioned, appear in this day's Official Gazette. Our Charter contains several alterations which will give rise to a stiff course of opinion. In the case of the Bombay Bank, it is ordered, that the whole of the Shares shall be put up to auction and sold; and thus Government will reap a considerable benefit from the premium which its Shares will fetch. The Gazetted Gazette gives us a singular specimen of the refinement which the rich Natives have attained. "It is no small thing to find upon the table of a sporting Baboo beautiful English cards with the following address, Baboo — presents his compliments to Baboo —, and requests the pleasure of his company to a Good-bye Fight at Delhi on the 10th proximo. His Lordship will remain there ten days, and then proceed via Umballa and Patwala to Simla. Major Drummond, in the progress of his survey of the Agra and Bombay road, has arrived at Meerut. Much pioneering work in clearing away the jungle will be necessary to the completion of this great national undertaking.—The assent of Government to the Petition of the Landholder's Society, on the great question of its suspension, has been given, and the Society has determined to transmit it to the Native Landholders, and to circulate it among the members throughout the country. It gives a series of strong and cogent reasons for refusing their request.—It is said that not a single proposal was made up on Tuesday, (the last day for receiving them,) for the office of Editor of the Courier, at 500 Rupees a month. There may be two reasons for this, either Editorial talent is scarce and dear in Calcutta, or no man can be found who will place his prospects at the disposal of the fickle Management, to be advertised unceremoniously out of the concern at the lapse of a twelve-month.—The Fifth Meeting of the Mechanics' Institution was held on the 26th instant, at the Paragon Academy; a couple of rules were read and considered, and it was resolved to convene a public meeting in a few days, for the purpose of determining on the establishment of the Institution.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 1.

The long-looked-for supply of Ice has at length been landed, and with it a choice cargo of American apples and pears. Kings' Tindor, whose we have all suspected of having cheated us out of our just expectations, has been as good as his word, and we may now look back to facing the next hot season with some comfort. The ice turns out to be abundant; two other vessels are to follow, and Mr. Tindor promises never to fail us again.—A letter appears in this day's Englishman on Burmese affairs, which asserts in the teeth of "IMPERIALIST" representations, that, "the troops and establishment attached to the late Resident of Ava, were not inducted to the Burmese Government for one grain of rice for upwards of two years, previous to the Resident's leaving Ava."—The Branch Bank of Mirzapore, in connection with the Bank of Bengal, has been effectually established by Baboo Ram Kunal Sen. Business has so enervated briskly, and private bills have been discounted to the extent of four lakhs of Rupees. We have now, therefore, three banking agencies at the great mart of the west, at Mirzapore, and the trade in exchange will no longer be monopolized by the Native merchants. This circumstance cannot fail to augment the convenience of residents in the interior, and to give fresh animation to commerce.—The great rate of exchange, however, the less the bank was aided by the Government, the more it was to be feared, that his agents would be unable to meet the demand for the same, and that the Government would be obliged to step in to assist them. It is highly probable that an appeal will be made to England.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 2.

The exhibition of vegetables at the Town Hall yesterday was fully equal to any thing which had been witnessed on previous years. We have given in another place an article from our two morning contemporaries on the subject. For the first time also there was a good show of Cattle, and prizes were distributed to those who produced the best. The dinner in the evening came off well, and was not a little alleviated by the speeches which the members delivered. The flourishing state of the Agricultural Society of Calcutta, affords a pleasing contrast to the condition of kindred Societies at the sister Presidencies. They will recollect that our Society at one time experienced a much greater depression than either of the others; and they have only, therefore, to follow the steps by which it has risen from the dust to its present eminence.—In spite of the District Charitable Society, pitiable mendacity, coupled with great insolence, still afflicts the City of Palaces. One Jacob, an Armenian, who lives by begging, was taken before the Magistrate, charged with having knocked out two teeth from the jaws of one of the constabulary. He pleaded that he was drunk at the time. He was fined fifty Rupees, which he paid down with little hesitation. What a profitable trade begging must be in Calcutta!—The Madras papers state, that the flagship of Mysore lately harnessed two canals which had been previously broken in, to a brouche; each canal having a separate rider. They were driven eleven miles, and at the end of that distance, tried five miles more against a pair of smart gallop horses, harnessed to another carriage; they beat the horses hollow, without being at all pressed. The winning in of the canals did not occupy more than a fortnight or three weeks.—The absence of the Bombay Mail for the last three days, gives a hope that the Despatch Overland Mail is on the road.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 3.

The Overland Mail is in, bringing intelligence from England via Marseilles to the 5th of December.

At the Hindoo College, on Saturday last, five Hindoos were publicly invested by Sir Edward Ryan with certificates of qualification to practise medicine, after having studied at the College with surprising success, for a period of three years. We have transferred a notice of the interesting ceremony from the Englishman, to our own columns.—The Honourable the Deputy Governor of Bengal has appointed Mr. J. P. Grant his Private Secretary.—Saturday morning witnessed the funeral of two gentlemen, who, on the preceding morning, were apparently well, and attended the exhibition of vegetables at the Town Hall, viz. Mr. A. M. Manuk, and the Rev. James Penney.—The last Mail brings a rumour, that the Court of Directors have further advanced their rate of exchange to 2s. 1d. 1/2, some say even 2s. 2d. The Financial Agency in China has been abolished.—In consequence of the unfavourable intelligence from the North West, four per cent. paper still continues depressed. It may now be quoted at a discount of six per cent.—The Tea sent home from Assam has been tried in London, and a letter from the Tea brokers, dated the 4th December, states that the quality of the Tea is good, strong, high-burnt, rather smoky, &c. &c. The delicacy is stated to arise more from the want of proper preparation, than from the quality of the plant.—A paper in the 24th Gazette states, that the cause of Lieut. Pottinger's leaving Shik Kamran, of Herat, is a private difference between them; that the Shah has not joined the confederacy of Afghanistan against the English, but continues firm in his friendship to us.—Raz Parsurath Bose, Principal Sadler Amrit in Baidyan, has resigned Government employ, on his having been, it is said, appointed guardian of the young Naldu of Muzardabad, on a salary of 1,000 Rs. a month.—Frambarners received in town on Saturday evening, it appears that the office of Commander-in-Chief is not likely soon to be filled up; for it is quite certain that the Court of Directors have written to Sir Harry Fane to request him to resume the command of the Army of the Indus.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 5.

Mr. W. Greenway has just issued the Prospectus of a second journal, to be published by him at Agra, to be styled Governor's Agents Journal.—The number of letters sent by the Hydrabad from Bombay on her last trip to Suva, was 7,000, which is a falling off of nearly three thousand.—A meeting will be held at Calcutta, on the 28th of the present month, to decide on the transfer of the books and films of the Calcutta Library to the Asiatic Society's Building, when there is no every prospect of seeing printed in Calcutta, in a style worthy of the City of Universities.—The Manchester Advertiser gives us reason to hope, that the long-mooted Law College, &c. &c. qualification of Natives to be employed in the various Courts of the country, is likely to be erected at no distant period. Why should not the same care and assiduity be bestowed on the education of those to whom the initiative of all suits of whatever amount is entrusted, as Government have thought fit to bestow on the training of Medical Students?—The Englishman states, that the Governor General will be at Simla during the last week of March.—Idem, it is said, have received India, indicating that the Honorable T. C. Robertson would be nominated as the future Governor of the North West Provinces.—The letters recently received from Hyderabad state, that the Government had put Mr. H. C. P. in the position of a private secretary to the Governor.

PRECIS OF EUROPE INTELLIGENCE.

The November Mail, with letters and papers to the 5th of December, reached Calcutta early on Saturday last.

Parliament, it is stated, in the next papers received by this opportunity, would be pronounced to the beginning of February, when it would meet for business.

Lord Durham received the intelligence of the Bill of Indemnity, as might have been expected, with the highest indignation, and instantly determined to resign the Government. In giving publicity to the orders in Parliament, he issued a Proclamation, couched in the most select and choice phraseology, but eminently calculated to irritate the inhabitants of the Colonies. He declared that the Government of the colony was usurped by two or three individuals in one branch of the legislature, and that, deprived as he was of all substitutive power, he could no longer continue to administer the government of the Province. He had determined to return to England by way of America, and to endeavour to strengthen the bonds of union between the two Governments. But having heard from the American Government that an extensive conspiracy had been formed along the whole line of the frontier, by forty or fifty thousand men, to renew the rebellion on the continent, ment of winter, he hastened home in the Invincible Frigate, and arrived in London on the 5th of December. It was said, that he intended to pay his commission at the feet of the Queen, and on the opening of Parliament to enter on the defence of the measures which he had pursued for the pacification of the Canadas, and to develop the plans which he had formed for the future government.

There are various rumours regarding Lord Durham's successor in Canada. The Marquis of Normandy, Lord Spencer and Lord William Bentinck have all been spoken of for the post; but we must postpone all speculation on the subject, till the next Mail shall have put us in possession of more definite information respecting the movements in Canada, and those of Lord Durham in London.

The Right Honourable Mr. C. Fergusson, Justice Advocate General, died at Paris, in the month of November. His remains were to be transported to England, and deposited in the family vault at Cusickbarrow, in Scotland. Mr. Sergeant Arden had been appointed to succeed him, pro tempore, and Sir Charles Edward Gray was spoken of as his eventual successor.

The intelligence of the warlike movements in India, which reached England in November, had created no small sensation in the political world; and combined with the movements of Russia in Europe, and turned public attention to the ambitious views of that colossal power. The Russophobes had been again lulled by the Christians; and disquiet from the Russian name had been scarcely frequent. An insurrection had also broken out in Circassia, which the Russian Government abstained himself unable to quell with the 50,000 men under his command. It is stated in the papers of France, that the Russian Government is making efforts to render them as Sir Edward Colebrooke expired on the 5th of November.

It is understood, that Sir James Rivett Carnu has been definitely appointed to succeed the late Sir Robert Grant, at Bombay, and that he is likely to reach that Presidency in the month of April.

A suit is at present in progress in the Ecclesiastical Court at Winchester, against Mrs. Mary Winstley, for erecting a tombstone in the Church Yard with this inscription. Pray for the soul of Joseph Winstley.

The Thames Tunnel is complete to within 110 feet of low water mark, and there is no uncertainty that this great national undertaking will be completed.

Joseph Lancaster, the celebrated founder of the system of education which goes by his name, died of an aneurism at New York, on the 21st October, at the age of 61.

A great number of resolutions have been proposed upon the different rail-roads, which will call for the immediate attention of Parliament.

The affairs of Spain are in the same unsatisfactory state as ever. Don Carlos had married, by Papal dispensation, his own niece, who was smuggled into France in the train of a female Carlist. Great commotions have taken place in Madrid, where the Government appears to be in a most unsettled state, but the tumults were put down by military authority. Cabrera on entering on Villanueva, brought out the garrison, consisting of 35 soldiers and shot them. The Valencians instantly brought out 35 Carlist prisoners and shot them.

At a Court of Directors, held at the India House, on the 7th, Major General Sir William Cassement, K. C. B., was appointed provisionally Member of the Council of India, to take his seat therein on the termination of Colonel Morrison's services, or upon the death, resignation, or coming away of that officer.

Intelligence had been received in England that the siege of Herat had been raised, and that Dr. McNeill had resumed his functions as Envoy at the Court of the Shah of Persia.

The re-election of Mr. Van Buren was considered certain. Her Majesty has signified her intention of standing sponsor to the infant daughter of Lord John Russell; she is to bear the royal name of Victoria.

It is stated that a gentleman of the name of James Brook has started an expedition to explore the Eastern Archipelago, in his own yacht, and at his own expense, with the view of obtaining more accurate knowledge of that vast region, its geography, natural history, and inhabitants.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

CIVIL SURGEONRY OR NOBILITY.

We learn that it is the wish of the Committee of Public Instruction to separate the appointment held by Dr. Wise, at the Hooghly College, from that of the Civil Surgeon. Such a resolution, if we may run on a word, is exceedingly unwise in our opinion. Surely no man can be so fit as a medical man, if he possess a disposition and other qualifications to instruct, to hold the situation alluded to. By having a man of science as superintendent of education, the pupils will receive lectures in the various branches of Natural Philosophy—the importance of which must be obvious to every one who will give the subject a moment's consideration. We are glad to learn that the President in Council is decidedly in favour of connecting the appointments, but out of courtesy probably to the expressed opinion of the Committee of Instruction, this separation will be made, unless the members of that committee reconsider and change their resolution.

Our contemporary, the Friend of India, is of opinion that making the Principal of Hooghly College an appendage to the office of Civil Surgeon at Hooghly, is prominently absurd, ergo, the appointment of Dr. Wise as Principal of that College was preeminently absurd! O no, adds our contemporary, "It did happen that the most eminent qualifications, both medical and educational met in the person of Dr. Wise, but many years may pass over before a second Civil Surgeon of Hooghly College be found fit to take the direction of so vast an institution," and why did it so happen that those eminent qualifications, medical and educational, met in Dr. Wise? is a question our contemporary does not seem to have attempted to investigate. Why? on no other grounds than those of Dr. Wise's education having been that of a physician, which embraces every branch of Natural Philosophy, and which combine in the physician, generally, qualifications medical and educational; therefore the fittest person for the office alluded to, is most likely to be found in the extensive Medical Department on this side of India; and when found, he may safely, as by experience, connect the duties of Civil Surgeon with those of Principal in the College. We agree with our contemporary that the appointment of any Civil Surgeon, indifferently, to the situation of Principal by virtue of the office of his Surgeonry, might be precise, unless temper, zeal and ability added to his Medical knowledge.—India Journal.

AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

Of the exhibition of vegetables yesterday at the Town Hall, we can only say, that if it did not surpass those of the last preceding years, the only reason that we can assign is, that the "force of Nature" in the vegetable kingdom, could no further go, than in these two seasons. The display would have done honour to the ancient and honourable calling of gardeners and husbandmen, in any country or climate. We did not unfortunately see the whole show of cattle; nor are we very competent to speak learnedly on such subjects, but we are informed that it was a very good "first appearance."

The prize for the best cow was awarded to a fine animal, straight backed and short in the legs, the property of Mr. Pattle. Beside the competitors for the prizes, we saw a very fine cow and calf, bred in this country, from English stock. This cow is the property of Mr. Rose, of the firm of Hunter and Co., and we are informed that, when in full milk, it gives fifteen seers per diem. This, we think, might suggest to the consideration of the Society, the beneficial effects that might be expected from the institution of prizes for the best native bred cattle, from imported stock. Such a cow and calf as Mr. Rose's, the former giving the quantity of milk above-mentioned, are the very object for which importations are made. We may make the same remark in respect to sheep, and, indeed, all importations of live stock, with a view to the improvement of breed.

AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

The exhibition of vegetables at the Town Hall yesterday, must have satisfied the visitors, (who were numerous,) that very great good has been done by the Agricultural Society, at least in one branch of its labours. Such gigantic cabbages, huge carrots, brooding magpies, and monstrous celery, we have never seen since our last visit to Conant Garden Market,—while the specimens of mull-koll, brinjals, and onions were of an excellence un-surpassed any where.—The cattle exhibited were not very numerous, but their appearance was a sufficient proof of the existence of a disposition on the part of some farmers to take some trouble to improve the cow, bulle, and sheep of more favoured countries, if properly encouraged. We are very happy to see that Mr. Pattle has gained the prize for the best cow.—Eng. Feb. 2.

MEDICAL COLLEGE.

One of the most interesting spectacles it has ever been our lot to witness in this country, was exhibited on Saturday, at the Medical College. Five young Hindoos were publicly invested with certificates of qualification to practise medicine, after having studied at the College with surprising success for a period of about three years and a half, and passed the ordeal of a very severe examination.

At eleven o'clock the interesting ceremony commenced, the Theatre of the College being then crowded to excess by all classes of Europeans and Natives. Sir Edward Ryan took the chair, supported by the Honourable T. C. Robertson, the Lord Bishop, and Sir H. Seton, and surrounded by a number of eminent men, amongst whom we noticed Col. James Young, Mr. Halliday, Mr. H. M. Parker, Dwarkanath Tagore, Mr. Mangroo, Dr. Martin, Dr. Macleod, all the members of the College Council, the Professors, and many gentlemen of the Civil and Medical Services.

Professor O'Shaughnessy opened the business of the day, by reading a letter from the Government, written in March of last year, calling upon the Committee of Public Instruction to report the names of four students qualified to take certificates of Diplomas in Decca, Moorabuland, Patna and Chittagong. "The reply to this letter followed, and if anything could be wanting to convince us of the deep anxiety of the Professors to fulfil the sacred trust confided to them, with credit to themselves and advantage to the country, this document supplied abundant evidence of the fact. Had there been an atom of the spirit of clericalism amongst the accomplished teachers,—and they have been governed by a desire of a wish to exhibit prominently the fruits of their honourable exertions, and so to disarm professional prejudices and jealousies, or temporarily to triumph over an under-current of opposition, they could have seized the opportunity given to them in the invitation of the Government, and sent in four names at once. But no—happily for the honour of the profession—happily for the interesting youths who had patiently and manfully sought the benefit of their instruction,—happy for the interests of humanity,—they rose superior to such unworthy influences, and frankly answered that they were not yet prepared to send forth any of their alumni to perform the arduous, and awfully responsible duties of the profession of their election. They pointed out that the period prescribed in Europe, as the shortest within which a student of medicine could be permitted to practise, viz. four years, had not yet been completed by any of the pupils of the college:—in fact, the Institution had not existed for that space of time, and there had been difficulties to overcome and deficiencies to supply, with which the Professors elsewhere had not to wrestle. They, therefore, entered further time, and stimulated by the obvious disposition of the Government to render the College subservient to useful State purposes, they renewed their praiseworthy endeavours to advance the students, and found in the ambition and intelligence of these latter co-operation which led to the present most important results. Dr. O'Shaughnessy proceeded to describe the whole course of studies, and to read the reports of the examinations to which these young men, who were prepared to stand the test, had submitted themselves before Drs. Grant, N. Davidson, Carlyle, Martin, St. John and others. All these reports, comprised as they are in an interesting letter from the examining committee to the Government, we shall have the pleasure of republishing in a day or two, together with such other papers, connected with the proceedings of the College as we may be favoured with.

The upshot of the effort has been the thorough qualification of four pupils for the duties required of them by the government. These youths, by name Omachurn Sett, Dwarakanath Dasgupta, Rajkishore Das, and Noidin Chunder Mitre, together with a fifth named Shamsuddin Jinn, who had fitted himself for an appointment in the aquatic gardens of Patna, were seated in front of the table of the Theatre, and received their certificates from the hands of the University, who accompanied the pleasing duty with kind expressions of interests and approbation, which, while they infinitely gratified the successful students, must have produced an excellent effect upon the minds of the many, who were witnesses of the spectacle. We are quite sure that scores of pupils will treasure in their memory the sight of a British Chief Judge, publicly shaking hands with their meritorious fellows, and look to the day when their own endeavours may achieve for them a similar distinction.

When the delivery of the certificates was completed, Dr. Grant addressed a mention or exhortation to the five young men, after the approved usage of the Colleges of Europe. We will not attempt to describe this address. To one who had never heard such a thing before, it was his roasting, his snuff, and offering. We only carry a just idea of its character, by publishing it in a paper which we so frequently find at every date.

After Dr. Grant had read the prices given by our noble and illustrious friends, the Government, were formally delivered to the successful candidates. After which the prizes granted by Government to various degrees of merit and proficiency. The assembly then broke up.

We have not space at present to do more than allude to the highly interesting and useful exhibition of the students, which the Government have allowed to be published. It is a subject of such national pride—such exquisite satisfaction—that were we to trust ourselves to dilate upon it now, we should have no room for the European intelligence, for which our readers are naturally impatient.—*Eng. #### REPORT OF THE SERAMPORE HOSPITAL, FOR 1838.

The Committee of the Serampore Hospital have much pleasure in rendering their account of the progress of the Institution for another year. Opportunity was taken in the last Report, of stating the circumstances which led to the formation of the Hospital in 1836, and attended its progress to the end of 1837. There is little need for recapitulating the same statements now. At the same time it is proper to keep before the forgetting community, from whose charity the Institution obtains its support, such a brief exposition of its claims as shall enable all to judge of the propriety of their listening to its annual appeal.

The Settlement of Serampore contains a Native population of about thirteen thousand, and the bank of the river, for several miles, both above and below the town, is crowded with a dense population, in the villages of Ichera, Mahesh, Ballahpore, Chattera, and Bydyanter, which exceeds that of Serampore itself. The whole of this population, both of the Settlement and its neighbourhood, is very closely connected with Calcutta: for a large proportion both of the rich and poor, derive the support of themselves and families from employments in the service of merchants of all classes in the Metropolis. The wants and sufferings of such a population, therefore, justly claim attention from those with whom, in the business of life, they are so closely connected.

That in a population of the extent already described there will be always much sickness, must be evident. The Native of India are not more exempt from disease than European strangers. The advantage they derive from natural adaptation of constitution to the climate, is more than nullified by poverty, ignorance, indolence, want of cleanliness, and other national peculiarities. In fact the Natives are both exceedingly liable to diseases, and quickly sink under it. At the same time they are destitute of medical resources amongst themselves. In cases requiring surgical aid, they are nearly altogether helpless. In general diseases they are the victims of a medical system of unmitigated absurdity. They are well off when their Doctor is a simple quack; for then he may possibly administer something that may do good. But great multitudes have no means of purchasing even the meretricious goods of a Native Doctor's attendance and prescriptions; and in innumerable instances disease runs a direct course for its worst issue, without a single check—in not a few its speed is accelerated by ignorant indulgence.

In these circumstances, there is a boundless scope for benevolent interposition in relieving the Native sick. At times it is so. And every year, at some portion of it, brings disease so general and fatal as to make it unusually peculiarly so. A Native Hospital, therefore, appeals, on grounds the most indisputable, to all who have any sensibility or humanity. The people are generally very ready to take medicine by whomsoever prescribed; and much good may be done by dispensing medicine to out-door patients. In this way, in the two years ended in half during which the Serampore Hospital has existed, there thousand three hundred and eight persons have been relieved; of whom two thousand two hundred and forty-nine were not inhabitants of this Settlement, but of the British territory surrounding it. But such relief is of no avail in cases of severe illness. In them the Physician must have the patient frequently under observation, and must be able to control his whole diet and treatment. An Hospital furnishes the only means of such assiduous attention. Many of the sick are reluctant to avail themselves of its advantages, not only from the natural feeling of dislike to leave their own home, and place themselves among strangers in their affliction, but still more from the prejudices and fears connected with cost. Nevertheless, the sense of danger and confidence in the skill and humanity of their European succourers, in many instances, counteract this influence. It will be seen by the statements below, that since the Hospital has been in existence, as many as seven hundred and seven Patients have been admitted into it, of whom four hundred and forty were inhabitants of the British territory. The number of patients in 1838 alone was two hundred and sixty-nine; of whom one hundred and eighty-four were from the British territory.

The actual good effected by the Hospital will best be seen from the statements of the Surgeon, J. Voigt, Esq., to whose indefatigable and gratuitous exertions the Institution owes all its value.

PORTRY.

For "The Friend of India,"
(By a Correspondent.)

He may have lost a friend he lov'd so greatly,
Or parent of that whose smile was joy to him,
Or wife who slept upon his bosom lately,
I know not—but his life of light is but a dream.

Such stricken hearts do oft so surely bleed
That they do many moans and sobs and sighs,
Till one who lov'd doth not break this bond of love,
And who therefore was not quenched this smould'ring fire?

The spring of all his grief I ask'd him not,
His I could not check, not all in vain;
And only more with him was rest my lot,
One day we met—our parting on the morrow.

How were the words he spoke, how often with sighs
When he could not check, not all in vain;
As if when he said, surely with tears, his eyes
Reveal'd—as summer sun thro' clouding rain.

And so it was there was some law within
Which he lov'd his power with hope of better things,
His son had been among the peas of sin
But never a man who lov'd her her wings.

He doth play with some strange gift of God
His I could not check, not all in vain;
And since he was a son the chast'ning rod
Was felt and feel'd soon his control away.

It is so ever—Poets of your own
Have said the same, though in another vein,—
Yet when truth such gifts is such we show,
And then there are who find such loss their gain.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

Sir,—Considering the duty of every individual to afford his assistance in procuring a clear understanding of the Police question, I hope to be excused in giving, through your columns, the results of my own experience.

I do not think that the union of the Magisterial and Collectory powers has been attended with the evil effects attributed to it. On the contrary, it has given increased efficiency to both departments, and by lending the Magistrate the assistance of the Tahsildars and their establishments, has doubled his Police force, and given him a most valuable check over the proceedings of the Darogahs and subordinate Police. The Tahsildar, a respectable man on his or her own account, with the prospect of promotion to the office of Deputy Collector, on (eventually) 50 l. Rupees, is above any petty corruption—he has the strongest and most direct object in the peace, prosperity and good government of his Perganah; his prompt and easy collection of the Revenue depending upon it, and his influence and general long standing give him great advantages for the prevention of crime. The Tahsildar, in a neighbouring district, who lately received from Government a khilaf of Rupees 1,300 for his exertions in the suppression of female infanticide, is a case in point: no more Police Officer deprived of the Tahsildars revenue influence and weight, could have succeeded to the extent he did. All the people flock readily to the Tahsildar with their grievances—who decide immediately on the merits, as by reference to arbitrators, most of the trifling quarrels brought before them,—in general to the entire satisfaction of all parties,—and refer other cases, as may appear advisable, either to the Police Darogah for investigation, or to the Magistrate for orders. This system of administration, lately first used by Mr. Thompson, the Magistrate of Azimganj, is much liked by the people, and has quite put a stop to many large disputes and feuds—besides saving the Magistrate much valuable time. Under it, a Magistrate and Collector can only be overwhelmed with work by incessant removals, and the consequent want of method and system in his district; or by negligence and inefficiency on his own part.

As for the size of districts, this need not make much difference, in this neighbourhood, the average duration of cases from the date of complaint at the Thannah, to the arrival of the parties and witnesses at the Sadler Station, is about 5 days—and in the Magistrate's Court they remain about 3 days longer. More speedy justice than this could hardly, under any contraction of jurisdiction, be expensed. When the Magistrate and Collector often moves about his district, communicates freely with the people, and exercises a judicious supervision, through the Tahsildars, but little corruption can take place on the part of the Thannahs or their subordinates. There can be no doubt that all classes of Native Officers are at present much more paid—and that the salaries of Thannahs and Tahsildars should be raised to, at least, double their present amount; within limits or given in each Zillah a full division for such as would most distinguish themselves—thus having done this, I do not think that the introduction of Deputy Magistrates would be productive of any good. These would at a large equal in influence and efficiency to good and well paid Tahsildars, and I would require much more men to manage with, and would deprive the young civilians of the school in which they at present learn their duties.

I may come to the Village Chowkedars, laying aside Mr. Halliday's plan, as unjust towards the Zemindars, who could never be called upon to pay equivalent for the transfer to the present Chowkedars, who would be distressed with out proof of guilt, and thus to base to prey on society—and besides it is expensive, even supposing it practicable, which it would not be in this part of the country. I would remark, that in this, as in every other department of Police, a good system has been ruined by neglect and inefficient supervision. Where the Thannahs are rascals and convicts, little can be expected from the Chowkedars—but where the Thannahs are respectable men of good family, and treated as such; and the Zemindars have been shown that it is for their own interest to appoint active and intelligent Chowkedars and Gorchis, who, receiving high rates of 4 hexagals each, carefully marked out in every village by the Tahsildars, and being removable only on proved misconduct, are independent, and pleased with their situation, it will be found that the Village Police is far from the corrupt and worthless body which it would appear to be in Bengal. In this part of the country they are constantly applied to on the slightest occasions, and are implicitly trusted by the villagers, with whom they are generally on the best of terms. Every Native of India has a natural clinging to the possession of land or property, and I am quite convinced, that the careful demarcation of a sufficient rent-free parcel in every village, is by far the cheapest and best method of paying the Village Watchmen. A money payment, though double in amount, does not bestow the same consideration—and is much more likely to be ill-spent. The four hexagals will produce again sufficient to support the Chowkedar and his family during the year, besides giving them inducements to labour; whereas the greater part of a money payment would be spent in the grog shop. The objection that the Chowkedars and Gorchis, if employed in agriculture, cannot perform their Police duties efficiently, is unfounded—there is nothing to prevent their going their rounds at night, and being always present in the village to prevent travellers, to take charge of criminals, or give information at the Thannah. No Native would ever think of urging such an objection.

The truth is, it is too common only to complain of their tools. When the Magistrate is himself active and capable, and stationed some years in the same district, it will be found that the present system works as well, and is as efficient as any in Europe. If, on the contrary, the Magistrate is constantly changed, or is indolent and negligent, the Amiah and Police naturally take matters in their own hands—the Chokkedars are disencouraged in the honest discharge of their duty, and oppression and corruption of all sorts prevail; and the whole system “is abhorred and detested by the people.” This, however, is the fault of the mis-management, not of the system; as would be abundantly proved by a careful inspection of the better ordered districts of the Western Provinces.

REVIEW.

Some years since, any one who should have ascribed to the Vilgin's Progress higher commendations than that of being a vigorous and whimsical book, would have been set down as either ironical or perverse. Cooper was hardly enough to praise, but not sufficiently so to mention Bunyan, “lest so decided a name should move a sneer.” But this sickliness of taste in instructed readers is happily passed away; and they who have discovered in the choicest treasures of literature the first admit the ensuing invention and fancy of the author of the “Progress,” the “Holy War,” and the “Life and Death of Mr. Bedford,” Mr. D’Israeli calls Bunyan “the Spenser of the people,” but, as it seems to us, there is in this comparison an important difference overlooked. No one forgets the allegories in Spenser, or enters into them with a personal sense of interest or participation. They are exceedingly beautiful, like the finest tapestry, or a series of pictures in compartments, but the pleasure they give is purely a contemplative one, whereas Bunyan strikes us with the force of his convictions and the realities of his visions. We walk with flesh and blood, in spite of the bold and significant names of our allegorical companions; and our senses, even more than our fancy, are employed in following Christ from the “City of Destruction” to the Gate of the Celestial City. We should rather call Bunyan “the Dante of the people.” That both composed a “Vision,” and employed allegorical objects and beings, is not to the purpose; the resemblance between them lies in the acuteness and the energy of the plastic imagination in each; in making credible, present, and tangible, as it were, their own creations; and in making and underproping them by means of those vivid realities which the bliss of death and an untried existence forever implant in the hearts of all men with a fervor of conviction that supercedes and transcends experience. Dante and Bunyan, dissimilar in their characters and fortunes, and unequal in knowledge and ingenuity, have yet so much in common in their several qualities of intellect, as to render the “Bedford Tinker” nearer akin than either Æschylus or Milton to the descendant of Cæcilia.—British and Foreign Quarterly.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A CANDIDATE'S PERPLEX.—Immediately after the Rochdale Radical demonstration last week, the clown or fool to the ring at the Rochdale Circus came forward into the middle of the ring, there being not less than 2,000 persons in the house, and, appealing to the audience for their suffrages, called upon them to elect him their member. He said, “Gentlemen, my qualifications are that I am a fool and a beggar; I will promise to fill my own pockets first, and then, if there is any thing to spare, I will bring in bills to do away with all taxes, and keep every poor man out of the public purse without work. Every man shall eat, drink, get drunk, and beat his wife to boot, without paying for it. I will abolish all labour or work, and every man shall have as many clothes as he likes without paying a farthing for them. I will abolish all magistrates, judges, police officers, bailiffs, sheriffs, jails and jailers, executioners, stocks, and whipping posts, as I hold them to be directly opposed to true and rational liberty.” At this stage of the address, the master of the ring, fearing that his fool might in his satire be going too far with the audience, pulled the chair from under the patriot's feet, and whipped him round the ring, exclaiming, “Oh, Sir, you know how to justly pay a patriot's wages.”—Coventry Standard.

SHAKESPEARE'S LETTERS.—William Nante, the picture-dealer, who was remanded by the Insolvent Debtors' Court on Wednesday, saw the person who many years ago discovered an original letter of Shakespeare, written to the Lord Mayor of 1609, who was his intimate friend. The epistle was in verse, and congratulated him on attaining his civic dignity. The letter was found in an old pocket-book, which Nante, among other things, purchased in the City, at the sale of property belonging to a person named Hathaway, a descendant of Shakespeare's wife, Anne Hathaway. Nante advertised the document, and a gentleman visited on him to treat for the purchase; he gave him 100*l.*, and Nante afterwards ascertained that he was no other than Shaprian, who had been sent by the Prince Regent. The letter is now in the British Museum, and Nante complains that it ought to have made his fortune. The pocket book he subsequently sold for 1*l.*, making a tolerable man by his discovery.—Advertiser.

A KENTISH TORY MAGISTRATE.—Mr. Alfred Wigan, of Malling, one of the county magistrates, sent a very sorry figure at the Registration Court on yesterday week. Mr. Wigan has recently been a most strenuous supporter of the “Choral Union State.” The Reformers of his district have given him great credit for zeal, but they were scarcely prepared to see the names of two juvenile Wigans, his sons, as claimants for the right of voting in the last list for that district. In the list, however, they were; William Lewis Wigan, freehold house, Mill-street, East Malling, and Alfred Wigan, freehold house, Mill-street, East Malling. As these juvenile Wigans still bear the soft peach down of youth upon their chins—and as the freehold house, Mill-street, East Malling, had, not very long before, been known to belong to Mr. Wigan, some inquiries necessarily took place. A dispute having arisen in Court as to the service of a notice, Mr. Wigan, sen., was examined. Mr. Case, the legal representative of the Liberals, asked whether the two sons of Mr. Wigan were of age? Mr. Miller, who appeared for the Tories, objected to the question, which was, however, ultimately put by the revising barrister. Mr. Wigan then admitted that one of them would not be of age till next month; and the other not till eleven months afterwards!! The revising barrister said—Really, Sir, I do think that this is very improper conduct. It appears very disgraceful that a person should put the names of his sons on the list of claimants when he knows that they are not of age. Mr. Wigan answered that he did not think that he was committing any law now stand. The barrister—The law distinctly lays it down that no person under age shall be placed upon the list.—The claims were of course disallowed.—Malden Gazette.

TRIUMPH OF STEAM.—Gulls from Bristol, England, reached Cleveland, a town of Ohio, on the shores of Lake Erie, in only thirty days. They were brought in the Great Western.—Put.

CAT AND MONKEYS.—Lately in the enclosure appropriated to the monkeys in the Jardin des Plantes, a cat had found its way among the nimble inhabitants of this vast cage, who immediately made common cause, and assailed the intruder. Puss showed fight, and for a time, by the use of his claws, kept her enemies at bay; but at length his big nose came foremost in the fight, and, seizing the cat by the neck, forced it down with its nose upon the planks, and very scientifically began with great deliberation to bite off its claws, and as he dinked each claw, he put the disarmed paw to his nose to ascertain that all was smooth. This process was continued till the screams of poor puss and the shouts of the spectators attracted the notice of the keepers, who came and put an end to the operation.—Put.

MOZART AND BEETHOVEN.—Mozart struggled all his life with difficulties, and was obliged to sell necessarily for his daily bread. His widow was saved from destitution by her second marriage with a respectable man, who became, too, a father to her dead husband's children. Her sister, who shared the triumphs of his childhood, and whose name is for ever associated with his memory, died a few years ago in old age, and in such extreme penury, that she was actually supported by charity. Beethoven lived unassisted by the great and neglected by the public, barely able to subsist by a life of labour as a pianist, unknown and unbelieved among his countrymen, even while his name was resounding through Europe; and all because his transcendent genius was accompanied by the suppleness of the courier, and the arts of the man of the world.—Ibid.

PARIS.—Amongst the Wonders of the day, in the way of what are called practical discoveries, we have the following.—A machine, worked by a single man, which is to perform the service of a sixty-horse steam-engine without fuel; this invention has been purchased by a Paris banker, who calculates that it will produce a clear profit of three millions of francs per annum. A new lamp, imported from England, for burning a mixture of essential oils, and which is to give a more brilliant light than that from gas, at one-fourth of the cost—a modification of the common but unsuccessful mode of burning coal naphtha and kerosene, on Mr. Gaudin's artificial sun, one of which is, from a tower to be erected on the cathedral of Notre Dame or any other high building, to give, on the darkest night, the light of day to the whole of Paris. Mr. Gaudin's sun is mixed hydrogen and oxygen gases thrown upon lime, as adopted in some of our light-houses. It is proclaimed that one of the suns prepared by the method, if placed on an elevated spot, enable a man on the deck of a vessel to read a newspaper 30 miles distant. The King, who has examined and pronounced his plan to be perfect. These grand discoveries do not, however, alarm the gas speculators. An Eng-ish company has just contracted for the lighting of Versailles by gas. Another gas-work is erecting at Passy, for the supply of a portion of Paris, Strasbourg, Angers, and a dozen other towns, are getting ready for gas-lighting; and the Academy of Sciences has just appointed a commission, composed of Messrs. Barrot, Gay, Lussac, and Dumas, to examine and report upon Messrs. Crox and Morle's apparatus for lighting and warming by gas in the capital. The compressed portable gas, which came out a few months ago at an enormous premium, is not in action, nor is it likely to be, for the last experiment in the presence of the prefect was near being disastrous.—Pat.

A FORTUNATE SOLDIER.—Some time ago, a notice for the next kin of Francis Braddell was inserted in the newspapers. Braddell was a native of Castleknock, Kilkenny, and left about 40 years ago, and went to America, where he resided until his death. He had amassed about £25,000, and the next of kin, the successor to this immense property, turns out to be a private of the 14th regiment, at present in Cork garrison. His name is Joseph Braddell, and he is nephew to the deceased.—Limerick Chronicle.

WONDERS OF THE INFERNALE.—Previous to the discovery of the microscope, it was little suspected that animals existed of such minute size as to elude the search of unassisted vision; much less that every drop of water in which animals or vegetable substances have been allowed to decay swarm with numberless forms of living beings; that countless millions inhabit every stagnant pool or running stream; nay, that every drop of the surface of the ocean is in itself a little world, peopled by innumerable active creatures, as various in their outward forms as they are elaborately adapted, by their internal organisation, to the circumstances in which they live.—Pat.

MINUMENT TO THE LATE DUKE OF NORTHERLAND.—The colossal statue of his grace, which has been four years in progress, will be erected on the summit of Benlurgie, in the course of the ensuing fortnight. It is thirty feet high, and can be discovered at a distance of eighty miles. The artist employed in the work has had a handsome house assigned to them at Dunrobin by the noble relief of the late duke, and a cast of the head of the statue has been placed, at the desire of her grace, in the summer-house of the castle.—Pat.

JEWEL OFFICE.—Among the mass of valuables in the Crown Jewel-house at the Tower, there are only two presents, both of which are from the county of Devon: the first is a wine fountain, three feet high, and made at the late coronation banquet, which was presented by the corporation of Plymouth to Charles I.; the second a salt-cellar, model of the White Tower—it is a tower 15 inches high, a most splendid jewel, and was presented by the people of Exeter to William III.—Ibid.

LADIES.

Let every married woman be persuaded that there are two ways of governing a family. The first is, by the expression of that which threatens force. The second is, by the power of love, to which even strength would yield.

Over the mind of the husband, a wife should never employ any other power than gentleness.

When a woman accuses herself to say, "I will," she deserves to lose her empire. Avoid contradicting your husband. When we swell a rose, we expose to injure the sweetness of its odour—we look for every thing amiable in woman. Whoever is often contradicted, feels immensely an aversion for the person who contradicts, which gains strength by time.

Employ yourself in household affairs. Wait till your husband confides in you those of higher importance, and do not give your advice till he asks it.

Never read lectures to him. Let your preaching be a good example. Practice virtue yourself to make him in love with it. Command his attention by being always attentive to him. Never exact any thing, and you will obtain much. Appear always flattered by the little he does for you, which will excite him to perform more. Men, as well as women, are vain. Never wound his vanity, nor even in the most trifling instance.

A wife may not even be too fond of her husband, but she should never seem to know it. When a man gives wrong counsel never make him feel that he has done so, but lead him on by degrees to what is rational with mildness and gentleness. When he is convinced, leave him all the merit of having found out what is reasonable and just; when a husband is out of temper, behave obligingly to him. If he is abusive, never retort, and never prevail on him to humiliate himself, but come to his closet, and pour out your complaints in prayer to God in his behalf.

Choose carefully your female friends. Have but a few, and be backward to follow advice—particularly if inimical to the foregoing instructions. Cherish neatness without luxury, and pleasure without excess. Dress with taste, and particularly with modesty. Whose adorning, let it not be that outward adorning of plating hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel." Vary the fashions of your dress in regard to colours, it gives a change to ideas, and recalls pleasing recollections. Such things appear trifling, but they are of more importance than is imagined.

"Likewise, ye wives, be in subjection to your own husbands," "Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church and gave himself for it."—London's Garland.

THE WEST INDIES.—To the honour of the British Government and Sir Lionel Smith it may be recorded, that on the day when the commissions of the special magistrates in Jamaica expired, the opportunity was taken of purging that body from several individuals whose injudicious and cruddy have gained for their names an unenviable notoriety. Their commissions were declared to have lapsed, while those of the remaining special magistrates were renewed. Lord Glenelg stated to the Anti-Slavery Committee's Deputation lately, that the great body of the special magistrates throughout the West Indies are to be retained in office until measures for a permanent stipendiary magistracy have been matured.—Lancet Mercury.

A DENTIFRICE.—The Teeth being composed chiefly of earthy matter, such as phosphatic and carbonaceous lime, the residues of strong acids decompose their substance, and leads to rapid decay. M. Cadet de Gassicourt recommends the following compound as a safe and excellent dentifrice, viz. :—One white sugar and powdered charcoal, each one ounce; of Peruvian bark, half an ounce; of cream of tartar, one drachm out a half; and of camella, twenty-four grains; well rubbed together into an impalpable powder. He describes it as strengthening in the gums and cleansing to the teeth, and as destroying the disagreeable odour in the breath on often arising from decaying teeth.—Pat.

The Oldest Scandinavian Church known is that of St. Eric, at Lilla, built in 1118, on the ruins of the celebrated temple of Odin.—Ibid.

A GEOLGICAL WONDER.—In a coal-mine, near Charleford, at the depth of 1,100 feet, a fresh palm-tree, the trunk of which is 30 inches in diameter, has lately been found in a vertical position, with its fibres fixed to the system of veins. It is ascribed to the Captain of Naara History at Brussels.—Ibid.

THE DALIA MARIA.—The dahlia is now become a valuable flower: there are many instances of seedlings being sold for 30, 40, and even 50 guineas. Mr. E. Davis, of this city, sold a fine yellow in Messrs. Brown, of Slough, at the High show, for 40 guineas.—Bath Journal.

DISCOVERY OF A NEW CONTINENT.—Mr. Dumbazel, an officer on board the Zetia (the expedition to the South Pole, has written a letter, dated Valparaiso, March 30, confirming the details given by M. D. D'Urville. A new circumstance mentioned by him is the discovery of a great continent to the south of South Shetland. "We carefully explored and determined," says that officer, "40 leagues of coast, notwithstanding the surrounding ice. This discovery is a real service to nautical and geographical science."—The Constitutional, Sept. 30.

SLAVE EMANCIPATION—THE FRENCH COLONIES.—The Minister of the Marine is stated by the Messenger to have received advices from Martinique, urging the necessity of sending out reinforcements to the garrison of that island, in consequence of the agitation produced by the emancipation of the blacks in the English colonies. The transports (One, this journal adds, is to sail immediately with troops from Brest.

Mount Etna, according to a letter from Messina, has been in eruption during the whole of August. The volcanic emissions appeared on the eastern side of the cone, at the summit of the grand crater; and the lava ran in a direct line towards Casa Inglesca, but when within the distance of a gunshot from that place, changed its course, and fell into the Val del Boce, where it did no great damage.—Pat.

AN ECCENTRIC CHARACTER.—Yesterday the remains of Mr. Ernest Peters, a Native of Switzerland, were deposited in a vault in the church of St. Dunstan, East. The deceased had for half a century been the confidential clerk of Messrs. Hankey, merchants. About ten years ago, symptoms of mental imbecility in their hitherto indefatigable and trustworthy servant induced them to propose his retiring from active pursuits, and they settled upon him 200*l.* per annum for life, to which the Messrs. Hankey added 50*l.* per annum each. The old man soon after returned to his native land, but after a short sojourn there returned to

THE MORCEST POLICE.—We publish two papers on the subject of the Mufussil Police; one from the well known and able correspondent of the Madras papers, Cassandra; the other from a friend in Orissa.

Our Correspondent of last week stated, that the present system of Police required little or no organic change; that the junction of the office of Magistrate and Collector was wise, and that the chief defect of the system arose from an unaccountable disposition in the Chief Magistrate of the district to engross the whole of his hours, and to deprive his Assistants of all chance of affording him efficient aid. In reply to this, we might state, that the present organization of the Police has been proved by incontrovertible experience to be radically defective. The union of Fiscal and Police duties, though it has increased the inefficiency of the Magistrate to such a degree, that the first step in reform must be to divorce these offices, is yet not the sole cause of existing grievances. If the Magistrate had only his Police duties to attend to, still the district is too large, as it regards extent and population, to enable him, without new arrangements, to afford adequate protection to the people. Both the disturbers and the official protectors of the peace must be brought to feel,—what they do not feel at present,—the ubiquity of unlighted candles, before any confidence can be created among the people.

Cassandra writes ably and powerfully on the subject of uniting the Police to the communities; they are to defend, in order to make them not sell the people, and for the people, instead of against them. But, according to his own line of argumentation, the country is not ripe for such a union at present. A complete change, of which time is an essential element, must be wrought in the habits and condition of the people, before they can be fitted to undertake the responsibility of directing and controlling the Municipal Police. "The whole social system,—the masses,—must be pervaded with primary education; and no one should be allowed to vote in the village corporation, till he had acquired the capacity of reading and writing." It must be obvious, that till we have such an intelligent multiplicity, to entrust so serious a charge as that of the Police to the village communities, would only be to render the Police the instrument of evil and not of good. Whether it would be judicious to delegate Police authority to the municipalities, when they have acquired all the necessary moral and intellectual improvement is, therefore, a question which at present it is premature to discuss. The duty of re-organizing the Police, and of making it an efficient instrument for protecting the lives and property of the people, will admit of no delay. We are daily moving on from bad to worse. The confidence of the people in our capacity to prevent robbery is becoming more and more feeble. The public journals teem with reports of dacoities openly committed in the precincts of the metropolis. Not many months ago, within three miles of Government House, a band of robbers, in utter derision of the Police, proceeded by water, with instruments of music, and torches, to the house of a respectable Native, and having plundered it of all they required, returned in triumph to their boats; and to this day we have not heard that a single offender has been apprehended. We cannot wait, therefore, till the village municipalities are ready to co-operate with us. We must apply our own shoulders to the wheel, and that without delay, or our administration will lose all respect in the eyes of the people, and the country will become a scene of desolation.

We must cordially approve of the plan of primary education, proposed by Cassandra, and are willing to admit that we can never be said to have done our duty by the country, till we have vigorously addressed ourselves to this undertaking. Education must be made a component part of administrative duty. It must become as much a department of the States as the Police and Revenue. But to the accomplishment of this object no step whatever has yet been taken. After having held Bengal for eighty years, the preliminary questions, whether the body of the people should receive the simplest elements of education in their vernacular language, does not appear as yet to be decided. Cassandra is perfectly correct in saying, that it is motives rather than means that the people want. Even supposing that Government is not possessed of the means of national education, is it just to the country that no motives should ever have been held out to the people to educate themselves? It is here that we are so unequivocally culpable. Incredible as it may appear, it is nevertheless true, that the simple and obvious measure of requiring a knowledge of reading and writing, as a qualification for the office of peon, or police messenger,—which would have served to diffuse this knowledge through a body of nearly ten thousand men,—has never yet been adopted. The peons cannot even read the writs they are sent to execute. To such an extent, indeed, has this negligence been carried, that it was discovered not many months since, that the Darogah of a large circle, the Chief Police Officer of a district as large as some English counties, was unable either to read or write! Let Government establish a scale of qualifications for even the lowest offices, and education would immediately receive a new impulse.

But here again, in order to effect any real good, in order to establish a system, of which the beneficial influence shall be felt, we want a larger infusion of European agency among the people. For every Magistrate we now possess, we require four, to be judiciously distributed throughout the districts.

We can expect no reform of the village municipalities till we have placed a representative of our own superior views, in a central position among them. We can have no improvement in the Police till we have a larger number of Police Magistrates, on whose exertions dependence can be placed. This multiplication of European Officers enters as much into the plan of the majority of the Police Committee, as into that of Mr. Halliday; and here we may, therefore, make a beginning, at the point where both systems coincide. Our Orissa correspondent shows how much the Natives court the presence of a controlling European Magistrate among them. We know that it would be hailed with gratulation throughout the country. A European Assistant Magistrate would immediately restrain the oppressions of the Native Police Officers, and give confidence to the people, who would not fail to repay this confidence, by giving ample information to him. He would be able to set on foot, without delay, a systematic examination of every village under his control, of its population, and its condition; and this would serve as the basis for subsequent improvements. He would be enabled, through his subordinates, to become acquainted with the people within his circle, to such an extent, as to make the detection of crime easy. He would carry the principles of our administration into the heart of every village. He would institute an enquity into the condition, the number, the character, the duties, and the remuneration of the Village Watchmen, and ascertain the centre of responsibility, and the rights of the Zemindars to their service; and thus collect a body of information which should enable the public authorities to carry forward the system of Police reform, with equity and vigour. And these Ministers would become the ministers for adapting the improvements which are daily made in Europe in the Science of Police to the circumstances of this country. Here, therefore, we may begin with confidence, and without delay.

THE DANISH COMPANY'S GODOWNS IN SINGAPORE.—During the past week, that fine range of buildings at Singapore, standing on the banks of the river, immediately behind the saluting battery, and formerly occupied as Godowns by the Danish East India Company, has been disposed of. Thirty years ago, the Godowns were filled with the rich merchandise of the Company; but the whole of it became the prize of the fortunate British troops who were sent over early one morning, after the Danish fleet had been seized at Copenhagen, and who captured our town. A simultaneous attack was also made on the unwristing ships in the river. Three rich argosies were anchored at the time in our port, and were captured by the boats of the Noderle Frigate, commanded by the Hon. Captain Elliott, the son of Lord Minto, the Governor General. The captures on the river and on shore afforded a larger share of prize money than usually falls to soldiers or sailors. These, and other heavy losses, prostrated the Danish East India Company; and the freedom of trade granted to British merchants by the Charter of 1813, combined with the supercession of the cloth of India, by the application of machinery to the manufacture of cloth in England, gave the coup de grace to the prosperity of this body. When peace was restored in 1814, and the town was given back, the commercial life of this once flourishing Association was found to be all but extinct. One vessel hulked in upon us in 1817, but never returned. Since that period we have been without a single visit; and as there was no longer any prospect of a revival of our trade with Europe, the Godowns were ordered to be sold. Unfortunately for the holders of Danish Stock, landed property has been gradually sinking in value for some years in this town. After our trade had become matter of history, the town still contrived to flourish upon the bankruptcies of Calcutta, which filled it from time to time with refugees; till at length, Mr. Hohlenberg prevailed on his Court to abolish the privilege of sanctuary, which, after the establishment of the Insolvent Court in Calcutta, was likely to be embraced by none but the most desperate characters. At present, therefore, the rent of houses will scarcely cover the expense of repairing them; while to sell them would be to submit to a ruinous loss. Several years ago, one of the finest houses in the town was sold for one-fifth the value which it had cost. In consequence of these untoward circumstances, the Company's Godowns have been sold at a great, but altogether unavoidable, loss. They cost originally about thirty thousand Rupees; they sold for six, which was rather more than their present market value. The wonder is, not that they sold at so very low a rate, but that any one could be found to offer such a sum for them.

THE COOLY TRADE.—We are happy to find from the papers which have been brought by the last Overland Mail, that the report of the meeting which was held in Calcutta, in July last, to petition Government on the subject of the Cooly Trade, has excited a most lively sensation in England. Public indignation has been kindled at the intelligence of those nefarious practices, which were brought to light at that period in Calcutta; and we have no longer any apprehension that the Trade will be suffered to revive, under any denomination or pretence. Public sympathy has been awakened in favour of the victims of this barbarous system; the public mind is fully alive to the enormity and the extent of the evil; and the cause of humanity has acquired a fresh triumph. No art which the abettors of this system can put in practice, will be allowed to delude those who have now been introduced behind the scenes. After having, at an unexampled sacrifice of money, and after an unexampled struggle, succeeded in extinguishing Slavery itself in the colonies of Britain, the benevolent in our native land will not allow a new Slave Trade to grow up in the East, under the pretence of allowing "free men to take their labour to the best market." The people of England are perfectly aware of the cupidity, the policy, and the inextinguishable perseverance of those who have unceasingly profited which are to be derived from the labour of Blacks, in the hands of the Whites. It is no longer a secret, that the West India Planters hanker after the cheap labour of our patient Coolies; and it is well known, that as soon as the prohibition to export them is relaxed, every port in India will become a slave mart, and our coasts, to the extent of more than two thousand miles, will be desolated with scenes of rapine and cruelty, as revolting as those which have depopulated the coast of Africa. By the papers now received, we are much acquainted with the real state of matters in British Guiana, as well as with the hopes and wishes of the planters. The Governor, on opening the July Sessions said,—"It is a proud thing for the colonists, that nothing has occurred to indicate a want of good feeling in the great body of the labourers. It is creditable to them, satisfactory to their employers, and confounding to those who anticipated a different state of things." But though there appears to be nothing in the circumstances of that colony to justify a wish for additional labourers, yet the report that the transportation of H. Coolies had been prohibited, was received with feelings of dismay; and the Planters began to look about to discover by what means the inconvenience which this order was likely to create, might be corrected. The following is the notable plan unfolded in the Berliner Advertiser, of the 23d August.

It is to be supposed, that men who can thus unblushingly propose that the British Government should become wholesale slave dealers; that it should purchase up prisoners taken in war in Africa, transport them across the Atlantic in Government slave vessels, and indenture them to the White Planter, will scruple at any atrocity to obtain immature Coolies from this unhappy country, if Parliament should open the door of the Cooly Trade, even an inch. Our only safety consists in the total and perpetual prohibition of Cooly transportation, and in the adoption of the most energetic measures to enforce the prohibition. We have incidentally heard that the evidence which has been collected by the Cooly Committee in Calcutta, will serve to shew, not from the testimony of the opponents of this Trade, but from that of its supporters, that neither the public nor the Government can safely dismiss all vigilance, even if the prohibition should be continued in force. We learn that, in order to recommend the establishment of legalized European agency, under certain proposed checks, for the transmission of our Coolies to * After marking the article from the Berliner paper for insertion, we carefully laid aside, as we supposed, for the Printer, but has been inadvertently lost. After a fruitless search of more than an hour, we were obliged to trust to our memory for the article. The Journalist of Berlin states, that it has become the bounden duty of the British Government to do that, which in private hands, would be called slave dealing; to secure Hottentots from the Cape; to purchase the prisoners taken in war to transport them in Government vessels to the West Indies, and to indenture them to the Planters for a term of years; in short, to take up; itself the labour of keeping up a regular supply of black labourers for the Colonies,—of course, under proper restrictions.

the colonies, some of the European merchants have exhibited the whole system of villainy practised by the Black Agents or Duffalors, in colours of the deepest die. We are also credibly informed, that still further to enforce the necessity of legalizing the Trade, the plans which may be, why, which have been concerted for continuing the supply of Coolies to the sugar colonies, in spite of legislation, have been clearly developed; and that all the dangers which the Press apprehended, as the inevitable result of the smallest encouragement, will be found to have been fully corroborated. Among the wholesale Cooly dealers in Calcutta, there are some with a larger, some with a more moderate share of courage and audacity. The more scrupulous have it in their power, we do not say, of course, in their intentions, to avail themselves of an old un repealed Regulation, which allows every vessel going out of this port to take a supplemental crew. This privilege will be stretched to its utmost limit, and under cover of it, an additional crew of Coolies, larger than the regular crew of lascars, will be conveyed to that terrestrial paradise, the Mauritius. The less scrupulous will openly set the law at defiance, and pick up Coolies along the coast from Bangoor to Bombay, in the same manner as a slaver lately took off nearly a hundred from the coast of Ceylon. We are informed that this system has already commenced; that our coasts have been already violated by kidnappers, and that unless the public authorities are upon the alert, no portion of our extensive coasts will be secure from these depredations. The evil will not die an easy death. Cupidity gives it energy; experience gives it cunning; and past success imparts to it the animation of hope. All the vigour of the community must be combined with all the strength of Government, before it can finally be subdued. But where is the report of this Committee? Is it intended to present it to Government just in time to be too late to be laid before Parliament, during the present Session; and thus to leave the field entirely in the occupation of the enemy?

LEGISLATION FOR CASTE.—A fortnight ago we gave insertion to a letter from an able Correspondent, "A Madras Christian," which ought to have received our particular notice at the time. Our Correspondent communicates information of a curious and interesting nature, for which we are his debtors, and which bears directly upon two very important points: the course to be pursued in public education, both secular and religious, and the policy to be adopted by Government, in dealing with matters of Caste in the Madras Presidency. The feelings of Caste are universally stigmatized by the epithet, prejudices; and it is, therefore, unnecessary to shew that they are inconsistent with reason. It is equally unnecessary to expose the injustice and cruelty which arise from them, and the multiplied evils they inflict upon society. It would be happy for the people, if they could be at once summarily broken down, and if no indulgence were granted to them in any case. The only objection to such a course, springs from the fear of defeating our object altogether, by the violence of the effort to attain it. And thence we infer, that the only moderation allowable in the case, is that of prudence and progressive interference. It is pride, not conscience, that is to be subdued. It is natural right and humanity we have to advance; and in no part of the enterprise can a compromise of principle be admitted.

It has always appeared to us to have been a grievous mistake, in the first Missionaries at Madras, to have allowed the prejudices of Caste to obtain a place amongst their converts. It was offering a propitiation to their worst passions, by which piety was sacrificed, instead of being promoted. The character of the great and good men we refer to, places them above suspicion of intended evil; but their policy is not the less to be deprecated. The consequences of it are distinctly and truly stated by our Correspondent. Lamentable deadness pervades the body that should now have been the greatest and most powerful witness for the gospel, and its holy and benign influence, in India. With such an example before them, the present race of Christian philanthropists are more than justified in the most uncompromising opposition to the principle of procedure, which produced it. Opposition, however, may be mild, persuasive and conciliatory, at the same time that it is uncompromising; and it is only by being so, that it can be successful. Indeed, its success will not be proportioned to the directness and violence of its assaults on the evil to be removed; but to the labour bestowed in winning the minds of the converts, new and old, with the genuine truth and sentiment of the gospel. The arrogant self-importance of Caste, whether Indian or European, can never live in the same heart with the humble contrition, faith and love of genuine Christianity. Foster these, and the other will die of course.

In public education we have the opportunity of carrying the cure of Caste prejudices beyond the limited pale of professed Christianity. Education is sought at our hands from motives chiefly of worldly gain. It is needed for advancement in life; so needed that it must be had. The offer of it, therefore, cannot be made without being accepted; and as long as it is offered gratuitously or cheaply, we may dictate the terms in other respects on which it shall be received. Of this we have daily proof in Bengal; and our friends will have the same in Madras. It would be criminal to neglect the advantage derived from this state of things, for undermining the mischievous power of Caste in interrupting the beneficial intercourse of all classes of society, by arrogance on one side, and degradation on the other, equally unjustifiable. We cannot, therefore, but highly approve of the stand made at Madras in the General Assembly's School. A few months of perseverance in it, we are confident, will produce a still more important effect in moral influence upon the community at Madras, than all the mere literary and scientific education that could be bestowed in a dozen years.

Disputing the policy of Government, in dealing judicially with those questions of Caste, the origin and nature of which our Correspondent has stated so well, we are inclined to think with him, that any Legislative enactment is unnecessary. We fear, too, it would be in future exceedingly injurious. It is a sore evil, when laws come to consecrate and perpetuate wrong; and this they very frequently do, when professing simply to maintain right. The claims of Caste are an invasion of natural right, which would die out with the mere progress of knowledge and civilization. They are of force now only through the natural consent of the parties concerned in demanding and yielding them. When that consent comes to be withdrawn, from an increasing sense of justice and general expediency, it would be mortifying in the extreme to have the advance of a whole community to a healthful and rational state arrested by the prescription of legal enactments, and the lingering selfishness and barbarity of such individuals as would not suffer them to become a dead letter. It might be long before the Legislative authorities would or could step in, to remove the mischief their predecessors had sanctioned.

We are obliged to our Correspondent for his etymological deduction of "Pachai," and bow to his authority.

MAP OF THE BURMESE EMPIRE.—We take shame to ourselves for having so long omitted to notice Mr. Tassin's last contribution to the geography of Asia, the map of our Eastern Provinces, the Burmese Empire, Boshu, and portions of China, which is executed with his usual precision and elegance. It is on a large scale, in six sheets, and comprizes all the information which has been gained by the successive journeys made through the various parts of that empire, by the Officers of the British Government. before the jealousy of Tharrawadee put a stop to all farther research. It embraces the east a portion of the Kingdom of Siam; on the north-east, the neighbouring provinces of China, and on the north includes the whole of Assam, and the mountains which lie to the north of it, and includes the information obtained of Tibet, by the recent deputation under the command of Capt Penherton. To the west, it embraces the contiguous provinces of India. It thus presents at one view all the geographical knowledge which the British Government has succeeded in obtaining of these unknown regions, by availing itself of the opportunities of visiting them, which have been presented during the last twelve years, by our relations to the eastward. By this accession to our geographical knowledge of the Indo-Chinese nations, Government has laid the scientific world under no small obligations. In a political point of view, the information which is presented in this splendid Map, cannot but be considered as of the highest importance. In our last struggle with Burmah, our total ignorance of the localities of that empire protracted the war, and entailed upon us an expensive totally unexampled in Indian warfare. It is no hyperbole to say, that it, in 1823, we had possessed such a Map as that which Mr. Tassie has now completed. Government would have been several millions sterling into pocket. We are now on the eve of our second, and final war, with the King of Burmah, and it is in a great measure through the accurate geographical information embodied in the present Map, that we look for its termination in a single campaign.

RELIEF OF THE SUFFERERS BY THE FAMINE OF LAST YEAR.—The Agra Relief Society, established to mitigate the horrors of famine in that neighbourhood, was happily enabled some time since to bring its labours to a close, by the return of those genial showers, the absence of which for two seasons had covered the face of the country with desolation. A final report of its transactions has now been published in the Agra papers. The whole amount of relief which this Society was enabled to extend to the starving multitude, through the exertions of private benevolence, was not less than two lakhs and a half of Rupees, or twenty-five thousand pounds sterling. Of this sum, we think it will be found on a general emancipation, that about one-sixth was contributed by the Native community; the remainder, was the result of those feelings of Christian benevolence which pervade the limited European residents of the country.

We re-publish the official letter, addressed by the Secretary to Government, in attendance on Lord Auckland, to the local Authorities in the district of Agra, conveying His Lordship's acknowledgments to the local officers for their cordial and active co-operation in those plans which were adopted to relieve the horrors of famine. The number of individuals to whom this reasonable relief was extended, amounted to about two hundred and fifty thousand, and the amount expended by Government, in this labour of benevolence, in the five districts connected with Agra, partly by actual payments from the Treasury, partly by remissions of Revenue, amounts to the large sum of nearly forty lakhs of Rupees, or four hundred thousand pounds. To those who are fond of representing the Government of British India as an iron despotism, actuated by one sole master feeling, that of extracting as much as possible from its wretched population, without any sympathy with their sufferings; to those who are fain to represent the British residents in India, as eager only to amass fortunes, and devoid to every feeling of generosity towards the Natives, we recommend, for their consideration these splendid tokens of private and public liberality. Even Mr. O'Connell, the great patron of "justice," will admit, upon a view of this benevolent expenditure, that if the desolation of famine was brought on the country solely through the villainous oppression of Government, that Government has not failed to employ the most spirited exertions to remove it. Perhaps his sense of justice may lead him to the farther conclusion, that a Government which was prepared to sacrifice so large a portion of its revenue to mitigate these miseries was not likely to have been so eager to bring them on the country by their measures, as the Member for Dublin has been led to suppose.

TWELFTH REINVEST OF THE CALCUTTA SEAMEN'S FRIEND SOCIETY, 1838.—We are happy to find this excellent institution increasing in usefulness. Its great object is to afford the benefits of religious worship and instruction to the Sailors visiting the port of Calcutta; and the object is one that must commend itself to every benevolent mind. The Society seek to effect their object, first by the preaching of the gospel in their Floating Chapel, twice every Lord's Day, and every Wednesday evening, and also occasionally on board such vessels as are favoured with pious commanders. The attendance on these occasions has been greater during the past than in any preceding year. As many as 3,560 have thus heard the gospel during the year; and the congregation usually assembled is about forty. A new Floating Chapel has been constructed for the use of Seamen this year, which has cost, with the furniture and libraries, upwards of 7,000 Rs. This sum is all paid off through the public liberality. One friend of the Society alone contributed more than 2,500 Rs. to the object, and set an example well worthy of imitation by those who enjoy the means of doing good. The services in the Chapel have been conducted chiefly by Mr. Pannoy, the almost gratuitous Minister to the Seamen, with the assistance of other Ministers, and particularly of Mr. Munro, of the Scottish Mission. A second means of usefulness adopted by the Society consists of daily visits to the shipping, both for immediate good in religious conversation and worship, and to draw the crews to attendance at the Chapel. This service is performed, and that with great assiduity and interest, by Mr. Roberts, who is engaged by the Society for the purpose. The Report contains a number of interesting extracts from his journal of visitation. To these modes of doing good the Society have added the distribution of Bibles and Tracts; the formation of Loan Libraries, containing from 12 to 50 volumes of religious and instructive works; and the institution of a general library kept in the Floating Chapel, for the use of Seamen whilst in port. The Loan Libraries are given to crews going to sea, but connected with the port.

Of general endeavours to promote the welfare of Seamen, the Committee state, "That in Britain, the ports of the continents of Europe and America, in Australia, the South Seas, the West Indies, and in Africa, the efforts to redeem and bless our brave tars have not only become more regular, but much more extensive. The establishment of Sailors' Homes in distant parts of the world is matter of rejoicing; but that which affords the Committee the sincerest pleasure in this matter, is that within the short space of twelve months, Homes have been established at Bombay, Madras, Singapore and Canton, the chief ports in our seas. May the Lord increase them a hundred fold, and make them the means of hindering the friends of Seamen more closely together, and of giving a higher tone of morals, and a more sincere desire for the things of God to the Seamen themselves. The Committee, in conclusion, feel warranted in stating, that the immoralities of the Seamen visiting this port have been enriched upon - that the horrid system of crimping has, they hope, received its death blow, and that the prejudices both of Captains and Officers against religion generally, have been weakened, both by the labours of this, and similar co-operating institutions, in different parts of the world, and also by the upright lives of pious captains, officers and men."

Since this Report issued from the press, the Society have sustained a great loss in the sudden death of Mr. Penney, the Seamen's Minister. He was cut off by cholera in the midst of his days and his usefulness. He occupied a place peculiarly his own in the work of benevolence; for which it will not be easy to find his equal successor. His commission was to the young and the poor. Since the year 1817, he has been the Master of the Benevolent Institution, in the Bow Bazar, where many successive generations of poor Christian children have received from him a useful and religious education, the means of honourable support in this life, and, in numerous cases, of a better portion in the world to come. By a union of authority with kindness, and even playfulness, he had the ingenuity of powerfully attaching his scholars to himself, and the duties of the school. His dominion there was the source of constant enjoyment to his own mind, and, therefore, was sure to be beneficial to his pupils. Whilst they were under his care, he, in a manner, adopted them as his own; and when they had gone out into life, he continued their friend and patron. His interest in them brought him also into acquaintance with their families; and no man has been so great a benefactor to the poorer portions of the Portuguese and East Indian people. This sort of intercourse fitted him likewise to be the friend of the European poor; and, therefore, he laid himself out for years to do good both to our soldiers and sailors. His sudden removal, therefore, has excited general lamentation.

MANUFACTURED MENDEICITY.—It was to have been hoped, that after the District Charitable Society had fairly and fully met the necessities of the poor of Calcutta, the community would have been delivered from the persecution of beggary in its many forms. Yet the love of that idleness and profligacy which are so easily and almost necessarily associated with beggary, was not to be cured by such means. The only hope was, that it would die a natural death from want of indulgence. And the infliction of such a death upon it rested with the community themselves. The District Charitable Society refuses adequate relief to no case of real necessity; and its agents carefully examine into the merits of every case that is brought before them. In the knowledge of these facts, it became every one, not only to uphold the Society by liberal contributions to its funds, but, to turn a deaf ear to every mendicant that came to the door, except so far as to ascertain, whether he knew of the existence of the Society, and the way of making application for its assistance, and to inform him if he did not. But enmity and pitifulness of disposition have, in too many instances, prevented the practice of such firmness. A well played part of innocent looking children, or tottering old men, or ragged, sickly, miserable objects of any age, has continued to have its power; and multitudes have found a grateful relief from its influence in the old way of opening the purse generously, and without further thought. Imposition has been encouraged as of old. The District Charitable Society may have the satisfaction of knowing, that the really necessitous and deserving are preserved from perishing, and often altogether rescued from misery through its means; but the system of profligate beggary is, we fear, where it

A friend of ours has handed to us the following elegant epistle, addressed to him last week:

"Honoured Sir,—I most humbly beg your Lordship will pardon me of my writing to your Lordship this few lines, and make it into your kind consideration, Sir, I am so unfortunate that I have a very large families to support; so help me God, we are starving to death since yesterday, and dying through in hunger, I, therefore, in my great hopes, begs to beg my head at your charitable Lordships blessed feet, to bestow on me some relief in the name of God, and for the sake of Christ, then through your relief we will be save from our present distress and starvation. May our good God will reward you, and your families long life and prosperity.

I remain, Honoured Sir,
Yours obedient and very distressed servant,
JOS. HONKINS.

P. S.—Please to favour me any old cloze which is no use to you, as we are almost naked and dying through in cold season.
J. H."

Another gentleman tells us that the writer of this moving appeal, called upon him lately with another story equally distressing, if true. But it was urged after a manner that betrayed its falsehood, and, therefore, it was unsuccessfull. We have heard of his acquaintance before a third party previous to these appeals, and then his wife, now daily starving with the "large families," was actually dead, and a part of the best wax candles was wanted, with which she could not possibly be buried. The man, it is said, is no such ignorant as the above production would lead us to believe; but it is part of the policy of such creatures to adopt this philosophy of ignorance. There is in fact no sort of incapacity and helplessness which they will not assume on occasion of need.

Only last Sabbath morning, one of our friends was surprised to find a little East Indian child creeping up stairs to his hall. When addressed, it looked up with the most winning air of infantile importunition, and began inquiring where was papa. On examination a fellow was found standing behind the pillar of the gate, who had sent the child in; and it turned out that he had hired the poor little creature from its mother, a woman of the town, and was making his profit of the speculation.

Another case we have heard of, not less affecting. A fine East Indian boy, who attends one of the Charity Schools of Calcutta, was observed haggling for a few pice at different houses, on the plea that he could not otherwise obtain a dinner; and when the Master of the School was inquired of respecting him, he said the boy was a good scholar, and anxious to improve, but his mother, since her widowhood, had fallen into a profligate course of life, and required him soon to bring home a certain sum every day, by any means of theft or haggling, on pain of punishment and starvation.

These are but specimens of the general system of mendacity. We have brought them to notice, that our friends may be aware how much, by the indulgence of their compassionate feelings, they may be aiding and abetting the progress and triumphs of vice. For conscience sake every beggar at the door should be refused the smallest contribution. It requires, we confess, a strong compulsion on the charitable feelings, to make a public Society the channel of our bounty to the poor and needy. To make it entirely such, would be unnatural. It would be done at the cost of suppressing some of the best principles of our nature. We are no advocates for merging all individuality of virtue and goodness in the great combinations of Societies. It is destructive to personal worth, and virtuous enjoyment. But beggars are a sort of public poor, and they can be advantageously dealt with only by the agency of a public Society. When we have left them to the cure of such an institution, and done our part in enabling that institution to fulfil its charge, we have yet full scope for our con-passion and bounty in our individual character in the private circle of our relatives, dependents, and the unobtrusive necessities, with the claims of many of whom we cannot fail to be acquainted, if we have not willfully hardened our hearts against the cry of misery.

GREENWAY'S AGRA JOURNAL.—We observe with satisfaction this addition to our Indian Journals. The three Presidencies have been supplied with a sufficient number of papers for many years past; but it is only since the administration of Lord W. Bentinck, and the last renewal of the Charter, that the Provinces have begun to obtain their own channels of public communication, respecting provincial as well as general matters of interest; and he must be either very obtuse or very prejudiced in judgment, who is not convinced of the advantages at this new characteristic of our times. These local journals foster public spirit throughout their several districts, fix attention upon local affairs, and gather in information for the State with a great increase of activity and accuracy. They are an indication of the maturing growth of our Indian empire, as well as of our increasing fitness to hold it. They are daily adding to the moral influence by which it is requisite our power should be tempered and sustained. In many respects, therefore, they deserve the attention and favour of every friend of India. Of Mr. Greenway's paper it is too early to express a very decided opinion. It promises fair. It shows liberal opinions, and a determination to maintain courtesy in discussion. It remains to be seen what sources of information it may have to open up, and what ability it may possess for enlightened argument. In the meantime it has our best wishes for its success.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 7.

Private letters from England state, that the first of Sir John Ross's steamers, which are intended to be sent to India by the Cape of Good Hope, would be ready to start in February, and that no fewer than eighty passengers had engaged themselves for Madras and Calcutta. The vessel was to be of 1200 tons burden, with engines of 324 horse power, and a capacity for 700 tons of coal. A second steamer, it is said, was nearly ready at Leth, and four more were to be built in London.—Moor Mohamed Khan, the Sirdar of Seinde, is said to have sent two pearls, worth ten thousand Rupees each, to the King of Persia, as a token of his allegiance to that Monarch.—Reports have been received of the samples of wool, obtained from lambs, the progeny of Merino rams and Indian ewes, which were sent home. The report is highly encouraging; and there can be little doubt that the Government possesses peculiar advantages for furnishing a very good supply of wool for the English market.—The Ganges Steamer starts this day for Montreuil, but she is to call at Raougan on her way down, with despatches for Col. Bérson.—Mr. C. W. Smith, member of the Board of Revenue, has returned from the Cape to his duties at the Board, which will shortly be deprived of the eminent services of Mr. R. D. Mangles.—Mr. G. W. Johnston has just arrived in the Thames Grenville, and the Evangelist announces that the Editorial duties of that paper will be conducted conjointly by that gentleman and Mr. Suesqueler.—The enterprising David Wilson is about to depart for Darjeeling immediately, to make final arrangements for the Hotel at that Sanatorium. He expects that all the Hotel apartments will be soon appropriated, and that other chambers will require to be built.—The Lord Bishop and the Archbishop are understood to have communicated to Government in regard to the burial rate for Rs. to 25, and the proposal is said to have passed Council.—The Agro Bank has just given a dividend of 11 per cent.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 8.

The Rajah of Nagpore, now on pilgrimage to the various shrines in the northern provinces, has reached Gyal, with a retinue of between three and four thousand troops and followers. He is said to have been attended by his money. At Allahabad, the Brahmins brought him with representations that Venack Row, filled a sacred reservoir with Rupees, to the amount of a hundred, and twenty-five thousand. The Rajah wisely put down one gold mohur!—A meeting was held yesterday of a number of mercantile gentlemen in Calcutta, to take the preliminary steps for building the projected Steamer of 1200 tons, the Great Eastern, which is intended to ply between Calcutta and Su-

ex. As soon as we put our own shoulders to the wheel, and help ourselves, we shall be sure to be encumbered with assistance.—At a meeting of the Asiatic Society on Wednesday evening last, it was resolved to appropriate 7000 Rupees to the erection of four additional rooms to accommodate the rapidly increasing Museum and Library of the Society. Mr. H. T. Prinsep presented a magnificent pattern of silver gilt, obtained by Dr. Lord, in Bholsukan, and on which the procession of Hercules is represented in bold and original relief. Professor Malin is constrained, from the weak state of his sight, to proceed immediately to China. Mr. J. C. C. Sutherland has engaged to undertake the duties of Secretary.—Letters published in the Englishman state, that not only are Russian officers fortifying Calcut and Candahar, but that Russian gold is profusely scattered through Afghanistan, to stimulate opposition to us.—Major Hattelsbom, who has so ably superintended the foundry at Calcutta, which, indeed, may be said to owe its existence to him, is obliged to go home. Col. Presgrave has been appointed to succeed him.—A new road is now in progress through a populous and fertile country, from Chinsurah to Dhannical. A wealthy native of Chinsurah, who deserves to be held up to the admiration and imitation of his country, Kader Kishor Vaidia, has erected bridges over two streams which intersect it, at an expense of six thousand Rupees.—Dr. Carey, the confessor of Dr. O'Connor, the Vicar Apostolic of Madras, has arrived at that Presidency in the Lady Flora, with a very considerable number of Roman Catholic Priests.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 9.

Sir John Aulley has been appointed Chief Justice of Bombay, in the room of Sir Herbert Compton, who has gone home by way of Egypt.—The Bombay Times republishes from the Asiatic Magazine the report of a magnificent Steam Vessel, which has been projected to ply between Falmouth and Calcutta, in thirty days, by way of the Cape, we suppose. She is to be styled the Queen of the East; the Empress of the East would have been a more appropriate term. She is to be built of iron, 2014 tons dimension, with engines of 600 horse power.—Sir Alexander Burnes has left Shikarpore and joined Shah Soojah's contingent. The Amirs of Sind, it is said, continue to refuse to pass a passage through their country, and, it is all but certain, that the passage must be forced, and that the first sword drawn in this campaign will be within the Indus.—A number of Native gentlemen have associated themselves together, to form a Public Library. A thousand volumes have been collected, and it only remains to select a good situation for the building.—Major Sirrman has been appointed Commissioner for the suppression of Daocity, as well as Thuggee, in the Western Provinces. The same energetic system, therefore, by which Thuggee has been almost exterminated, will now be applied to the extinction of Daocity.—The Madras papers complain of the very abject treatment they receive from the Bombay Post Office, relative to the dispatch of the Overland Mail. As it is scarcely possible for masters to be worse, why do not the merchants of Calcutta and the community generally, petition the Supreme authority?—A meeting of our insider public, and others, who had at one time or another enjoyed the advantage of Mr. Penney's useful instruction, or had been recipients of his kind advice, was held last evening at the Benevolent Institution: the Reverend Mr. Boaz in the chair; when it was resolved "that subscriptions be raised for procuring a neat tablet, with a suitable epigraph, denotatory of the virtues of our departed friend; and that the Members of the Church, meeting at the Circular Road, be solicited to allow the same to be erected in some conspicuous part of the building; and that a discretionary power be vested in the Committee of placing it by the side of a similar tablet, about to be erected in the Benevolent Institution to the memory of the Rev. Drs. Carey, Marshman and Ward, founders of the Institution; and that the residue of the funds raised, after defraying the expenses, be disposed of as the Committee may deem most advisable, consistently with the views of the subscribers."

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 11.

The most important intelligence has just been received from the Persian Gulf, which was brought to Bombay by the Fortfield. It appears that the King of Persia was induced to raise the siege of Herat, in consequence of having received a letter from the highest ecclesiastical authority in Persia, stating that the English had assembled a very large fleet in the Gulf, and had invaded his territories with a large army. Finding on his return that these accounts had been exaggerated, he declared his determination to return to the siege of Herat, as soon as the season permitted. It is, however, stated in another account, that Russia had contrived to effect a reconciliation between Prince Kamran at Herat, and the King of Persia, and had also formed a triple alliance of these two princes and Dow Nisshoud to oppose our advance into Afghanistan. Dr. McNeill's officers who waited on the Shah on his return, had been treated by him very ignominiously; the political functions of the envoy at the Persian Court had ceased, and he is stated to be now on his way to England. Intelligence has also been received from Sind. The Amers are determined not to allow a free passage to the British troops, and it was expected that Sir John Keane would immediately invest Hyderabad, which was garrisoned by a large bu-ly for the protection he had afforded them during their residence in that country. It is, indeed, a high tribute not less to the extent of our influence in Persia than to the object to which it is directed; and we hail it at this moment with peculiar satisfaction as emanating from American citizens.

To His Excellency John McNeill, Her Britannic Majesty's Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of Persia.

"Sir,—Permit me to express to you the sincere regret we feel that we are unable to do ourselves the pleasure of seeing your Excellency before you may leave this country.

"One of my colleagues, as well as myself, went to Tabriz, soon after we heard of your expedient departure, in the hope that one of us, at least, might meet you there; but circumstance, beyond our control, compelled us to return before your arrival, and we now find it hardly practicable to leave our families and to repeat the journey.

"Permit me, therefore, to take this method of expressing to you, in behalf of myself and our mission, our very deep sense of obligation to your Excellency, alike for personal and official favours—to the gentleness of your suit and detachment, with the most of whom we have the pleasure of acquaintance for their many kind and polite attentions—and to the very powerful and reserved government which you represent, for the efficient protection which it has afforded us and our object during our residence in this country.

"We should most heartily regret your intended departure, did we not confidently hope and expect that, as a consequence of this and attendant mission, British influence will soon be re-established in this country, on a firm and advantageous basis; and while we would not meddle with petty parties, yet, as philanthropists and as Christians, we do rejoice to have ever behold the extension of English influence in Asia; for we feel confident that such indications present the surest of human pledges of the amelioration of both the temporal and eternal prospects of men in any country thus effected.

"Were we to reside at Tabriz, we believe that, it having been known that we have enjoyed English protection, the moral influence of the English name might be sufficient still to prosper us. But situated as we are in this remote town which has never been the residence of Europeans for any considerable period, and is fearfully infested with lawless Kurds, it is our decided opinion that presence requires us to make some arrangement for additional security for ourselves and families on the departure of your mission. And we beg you to suggest to the Rev. Mr. Merrick, who hopes to meet you in Tabriz, and will act as our agent in the case, any measures which you may deem proper to be taken, and afford him all the assistance which may be found necessary to secure success.

"Fervently praying that abundant blessings may rest on you personally, and complete success may attend your Excellency's official measures, and with sentiments of unfeigned gratitude and respect,

"I beg to remain, Sir,

"Your very obedient servant,

FORGERY.

On the 1st instant a cheque for Rs. 6,638-4 was presented at the Union Bank by a Jew, purporting to have been given by a respectable man of his class, for the purpose of discounting. The document was forwarded to the Directors of the Bank in the usual manner, and passed by them. The next day the Jew returned to the Bank, when after they had got into the boat, he stated to him, it was customary with the Bank, when they had to deal with a stranger, to ascertain the genuineness of the security presented by him. The man said, it was very right to do so; when the official in question sent a trust-worthy scribe with the Jew, for that purpose. They proceeded together, and took a boat at Chandpur Ghant, to go to Garden Reach, where he stated the drawer of the bill lived. Just after they had got into the boat, the Jew proposed to make the scribe a present of two hundred rupees, if he would refrain from troubling his friend. The scribe insisted upon seeing the gentleman, whose signature the paper bore. They landed at a house at Garden Reach, which he stated to be the residence of the Jewish gentleman; but as the scribe returned the house, he told the scribe to wait outside, which he did. After the scribe had waited more than half an hour, he discovered that the man had made his escape at the back door. The business saw him going in another boat, which they attempted to overtake, but were unsuccessful.

The document appears to be a forged one, which the Jew attempted to pass in the Bank. The scribe says, that he would know the man if he saw him again, but we don't see what could be done with him, when he managed not to leave the paper behind.

A forgery was detected at Messrs. Carr, Tagore and Co., on Friday last. It appears, that a man calling himself John Christian Miller, had lately set himself up as a merchant and agent in Bangalore (Guz.) and on the day in question, he sent to be discounted two drafts drawn by himself, at his own favour, on Messrs. Carr, Tagore and Co., the one for 5,000 rupees and the other for 2,500 rupees, payable three months after date, purporting to have been accepted by the drawer. The parties to whom the drafts were offered, sent them to Messrs. Carr, Tagore and Co.'s, to ascertain whether they had been bona fide accepted, when they were discovered to be forged. The affair being brought to the notice of the Police authorities, Messrs. Carr, Tagore and Co., and necessary depositions being taken before the Chief Magistrate, committed to take his trial at the next Sessions.

AUSTRALIA.

To the Editors of the Colaba Christian Observer.

SIR,—As the Australian colonies have assumed considerable importance among the dependencies of the British empire, and as the intercourse between them and British India annually increases, it may not be unacceptable to the subscribers of the Christian Observer if a paper or two in respect to them, appear in your periodical. The opinion of the writer is strengthened from the consideration, that, in India, very little is known of the real state of the colonies founded on the Coast of New Holland, and that much of the information which has been received, has been communicated by persons who, from various circumstances, were either incompetent, or disinclined, to furnish an impartial and particular account of them. For it is not to be expected, that during a short visit for the benefit of their health, or for information could be obtained, or that the general remarks, habits, and circumstances of visitors would qualify them for the work, much less that mere commercial men whose attention is confined chiefly to what is conducive to their pecuniary advantage, could have views sufficiently impartial, to render their accounts of general importance, as matter of direction to the emigrant. With these impressions on the subject I shall proceed to execute my present purpose. In the execution of this work the history of New South Wales, claims our attention. This is the oldest, the largest, and the most flourishing of the Australian colonies. It is situated on the south-east coast of the continent of New Holland; it has existed fifty years, and the population has increased to about one hundred thousand. Here, half a century ago, a penal settlement was established at a place, named by the aboriginals Cook, Botany Bay, but it was situated at a distance from any more convenient locality of Port Jackson. The entrance to this Port is between what are called Sydney Heads, one being designated the South Head, and the other the North Head. The entrance between the Heads is, I presume, not more than half a mile; and about six miles from the entrance stands the town of Sydney. The cove forms a safe and extensive harbour for shipping, and a large number of beautiful bays, containing numerous creeks, are formed on both the north and south sides of the cove. Sydney occupies a central position at the head of the cove, and it contains, with its environs, a population of between twenty and thirty thousand. Though the soil in the vicinity of Sydney is very rocky, there are many picturesque spots, adorned with elegant cottages and beautiful villas. The distant view of the buildings on the north and south sides of the cove scattered among the rocks, which are considerably elevated above the water, is of the most pleasing description. One of the most favourable situations for viewing the port of Sydney is from the flag-staff. Thence may be obtained a sight of the whole town, the cove, and some of the bays, the north and south shores, with country residences, interspersed, on the sides; the fleets, shipping and light-house. The houses occupied by the tradesmen of Sydney have an English appearance, and the private dwellings are in general neat, and sometimes elegant. The trade of the colony of Sydney contains about ten streets, some of them a mile in length, running from south to north, i.e. a parallel direction, and those are intersected at right angles, by another parallel line of streets. Till lately these streets were in a very bad state, but his late Excellency, Sir Richard Bourke, commenced improvements, which when completed, will supply Sydney with good macadamized streets, and stone causeways. The trade of Sydney is of no inconsiderable extent. Its principal exports to England are Australian wool, and sperm oil, both of which articles are of first-rate quality, and realize for the owners high prices. In the interior of New South Wales, there are numerous and extensive stations, where there are large herds of cattle and flocks of sheep: the breed of many of them is of a very superior kind. Horses also of various kinds are bred in considerable numbers, not merely for domestic purposes, but also for exportation. From the herds, the richer colony of Van Diemen's Land is annually supplied with large quantities of beef, and the new settlements of Port Phillip and South Australia are furnished with sheep, horses and cattle. It is probable that during the past year, there have arrived in the Port of Sydney, from various parts of Great Britain, about seventy vessels containing prisoners, and emigrants of both sexes, and cargoes of general merchandise. Sydney maintains a regular trade also with New Zealand and Van Diemen's

Land; with China and India; with the Isle of France and the United States. New Zealand supplies her with spars, flax, pork, and potatoes; Van Diemen's Land with fine wheat and potatoes of superior quality; China with tea and Chinese manufactures; Mauritius with sugar; India with rice, and other Indian produce; and America with tobacco, fruits, furniture, and other commodities. New South Wales is not distinguished for the general fertility of its soil, for though there are some fertile flats of alluvial soil on the banks of the Hawkesbury, and the Hunter, and also in the vicinity of some other rivers of more importance, yet, by far the greater part of the surface of the country is characterized by a sandy and rocky soil, extensive tracts of mountains and numerous gullies, of considerable depth. None of the rivers that have been hitherto discovered extend far into the interior of the country, and several of these are often, if not entirely, partially dry. The fall of rain in Australia is very uncertain, and the continuance of drought has been on several occasions, within the last ten years, so long, that not only the harvest has failed, but there have perished many thousands of head of cattle. The grain generally cultivated in New South Wales are English wheat, and maize of a superior quality; in some also grows in several districts; and English vegetables have been introduced, but in many places these are an uncertain crop. The principal native fruit, which grows in great abundance in peaches. The general aspect of the country is very monotonous; the trees are not remarkable for their magnitude, their variety, or the luxuriance of their foliage. You may travel for fifty miles without seeing scarcely an object to diversify the scene. In one direction there are the mountain ridges, and the succession of gullies; in another a disagreeable scrub, and in another an insignificant forest of gum trees. The territory is divided into districts, and the two most wealthy country districts are those of the Hunter, and Bathurst; there are also in the interior some extensive plains, the most important of these are Liverpool, Jerres and Bathurst plains: these form the chief stations for the heads of cattle, and the stock sheep. At some of these stations reside officers to whom the flocks and herds belong; at others, settlements and convict servants, the proprietors residing in Sydney, and other towns in the colony. Many of the proprietors visit their stations two or three times a year, and the object of these periodical visits is to superintend the handling of cattle, to dispose of sheep, or the washing of wool. In many districts the native grasses are very inferior, so that the horses, which are best adapted to the soil, will pass twenty in a day to the daily maintenance, by a substitute obtained chiefly from straw.

The natural history of Australia is not destitute of interest. The feathered tribes are numerous, and are decked with the most beautiful and various plumage. This is pre-eminently the country for the parrot species. Some of the Australian birds have a covering as soft as silk, and others as rich as velvet. The parrots are destructive to the fruits and grain. The plains of Australia where Europeans do not reside, abound with kangaroos, which are a gregarious race, and when undisturbed, graze in large flocks; but in European settlements, or even along tracts frequented by white men, they are seldom seen, some of them having been successfully hunted for food, and others having retreated farther into the interior. Australia is much infested by an animal of the canine species, called the native dog, but the habits of it are so predatory, that with more propriety, it may be designated the native wolf. Its ravages extend to the poultry-yard, and the sheepfold. The fissure of the mountain ridges is chosen by it for a kennel, whence during the night and especially when in darkness is diminished by the light of the moon, it descends to the settlement on the rivers bank, and to the stations on the plain. When a body of these predaceous animals, which some times amount to thirty in number, attack without molestation, a flock of sheep, few of them escape either destruction, or severe mutilation. The helpless prey is seized by the hind-quarter and the extremities, and a succession of bites are made till the thigh bone is laid bare, and the entrails exposed. The operation is performed, while the inoffensive victim in vain darts from its ravenous pursuer. When the hunger of the ravagers has been satisfied, and they have retired to their rocky kennels, what a few hours previously, comprised a fine flock of sheep, includes but a number of mangled carcases. A stock of domestic dogs, offered to the settlers the best and principal means of defence against their depredations. For though the native dog has fangs of extraneous sharpness, and admirably adapted for the work of destruction, it is, however, much inferior to a well bred domestic dog, in mind, strength, and courage. There are, indeed, in Australia, not a few of these invaluable domestics, but still in single combat kill the mountain aggressor.

The climate of New South Wales is highly salubrious, and is adapted both to the European and Asiatic constitution. The atmosphere is exceedingly pure, and the sky in general exhibits an extraordinary brightness. The heat of the district of Sydney, and to the north of the metropolis, is sometimes intense, the thermometer rising to one hundred and twenty degrees. It is, however, of short duration, and is succeeded by a southerly breeze which cools the air, so much as to diminish the temperature forty, and not unfrequently fifty degrees. The district of Bathurst being considerably elevated above the sea, though it is only a hundred and twenty miles west of Sydney, possesses entirely a different climate. Here is high table-land, and comparatively little timber; in the winter, snow is not uncommon; the frosts are sharp, the air is very bracing, and congealed to the conformation of Europeans.

In this paper, an attempt has been made to point out the geographical position, and to describe some of the natural features of the territory of New South Wales; the number of its inhabitants, and the nature and extent of its commerce; the general character of the soil, and the internal resources; the aspect of the country, and the salubrity of the atmosphere. In a future paper it is my intention to view Australia as a place for emigration, and to examine the merits of the convict system; in addition to which an attempt will be made to delineate the character of Australians in their social, political, moral, and religious relations.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

"If many can obtain their livelihood and rich incomes—if others can secure for future use their pensions or their fortunes—if the majority can but return to their homes with the sheaves of their own harvest, and say, 'Soul, take thine ease, eat, drink and be merry; thou hast much store laid up for many years—let those whose calling it is, mind the wants of India, and build the Lord's house when we are gone!' If they can say this, they are entitled. And this is gratitude! gratitude for all God's mercy and Christ's love! this is the return made to him who hath given all to them, and done all for them!"—Sermon by J. M. D. in the Christian Observer, for February, 1839.

SIR,—It has often been a source of melancholy reflection to me, to notice the number of Christians annually leaving India to return to their native country for the remainder of their lives, and some of them "the salt of the earth," leaving behind no mark of remembrance of that land, in which God had placed them, to do it good, during the best portion of their existence. In this they are unlike those rivers which, after spreading their waters over the adjoining lands, retire within their natural boundaries, leaving a fertilizing deposit behind. They depart from us, good men, as many of them are, with their earnest and pensive: some moderate, and some which may well be termed handsome, to spend them elsewhere. But they say we shall do good where we go to reside; in the place where we take up our abode, we will devote a portion of our incomes to religious and charitable works. Of such I would in love ask, is this fair to India? to the source to which you must trace the comforts and luxuries you will continue to enjoy, until your lives' end? Your pensions or incomes will be regularly received, but the country which furnished them be unbenefited. Will you carry away the riches of the Gentiles, and do nothing more for those who remain behind, "sitting in the region of the shadow of death?" Will you take no more interest in them, than by occasionally looking into the contents of some religious periodical, treating of India? What a link of union; what a powerful stimulant it would be to the poor Native as well as to the faithful labourer who remains behind, in this corner of the vineyard, labouring amid discouragements, were Christians when they leave the country for good, carrying their sheaves with them, to leave behind some token of their love for India,—an extra Missionary, properly endowed, European, East Indian, or Native, as means might enable,—funds for the maintenance of a school or a continuation of their subscriptions to some of the excellent Institutions which, with God's blessing, will continue to dispense light and life to their benighted fellow subjects. May God stir up British men and Christians to do more for poor India than they have yet done, both when they are in it, and when they have left it, is the prayer of,

Sir,
Yours faithfully,

ANABEL.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

Sirs,—In a recent number you remark, that the constabulary force should not be put under the village authorities, because the latter are “a fluctuating, undefined and irresponsible body.”

Might not the most substantial of the above objections be removed, by making the said authorities a responsible body?

You observe most correctly, that a Police controlled by the municipal body has been found to fail in London: but the reason of this is, that the responsibility of the Corporators for so large a city as London, is necessarily so diluted, as to be inefficacious; and in this I may add on the other hand, that the elective principle could not be introduced with good effect into a very small village: it would not be applicable either to the City of Palacca or to a village of mud huts.

But I submit that it is only by uniting the Police to the communities they are to defend, by some such actuating link of responsibility as I am indicating, that we can make the Police act with the people and for the people, instead of against the people, as at present.

I am heartily glad that you seem to concur in condemning the vile, I had almost said, incestuous, connection between Revenue and Police; and I should be proud if I could obtain your advocacy to the proposal I have for five years been urging, that we should, through means of the elective principle and primary education, endeavour to consolidate and condense the provincial municipalities into a strong and defensive coorg; and it is with this view that I venture to submit a quotation, bearing on the subject which your Editorial above referred to suggests.

“The course I would briefly and generally indicate is, firstly, to place the constabulary force, including these now dissipated village watchmen, into the hands of the municipalities: they should respectively protect, and who should pay them by a self-raised tax; to which end the municipalities should submit for the approval of the present controlling European authorities, prospective lists of their constabulary establishment. But to graduate the innovation, they should be required to include at least four-fifths of the present incumbents in the first batch; all, however, being in future liable to removal by a majority of two-thirds of the constituency, who, at the same time, should for some time be liable in this matter to more or less interference on the part of our European authority, until such interference was found unnecessary.”

“In the same manner I would wish the heads of villages to be elective and liable to rotatory removal—and in the same manner also, I would graduate the innovation, by including all the present incumbents in the first list of municipal corporators: this, and indeed the whole working of the system being for, at least, some time liable to the interference of European authority.”

“The introduction of the elective system with the downward responsibility it includes, is most urgently required in the constabulary and watching department of an Indian community: the watches in particular enjoy the full benefit of prescriptive and hereditary irresponsibility: they, indeed, are almost as irresponsible as a member of the House of Lords, and, therefore, the only activity they ever show is, when they themselves take part with the squire against those they ought to protect from robbery: so entirely, indeed, is the idea of responsible service separated from the office, that old women sometimes urge their hereditary claim to the office, and, perhaps, they would fill the offices well as many of those watches now produced by the hereditary and irresponsible system. The above circumstance may call to mind the gentleman referred to in one of Goldsmith’s comedies, as saying that his aunt was an Alderman, and his mother a Justice of Peace; but the real case is the most farcical of the two. It is absolutely necessary to make the Police force of a community responsible to the community, and in doing this, the Government would be introducing a principle of self-defence and co-operation with the laws, without which, all judicial laws must, of course, be but as weapons bestowed on a peltro or a paralytic. To illustrate the absence of all aide-tai principle in the present system, I mention that when a gang robbery takes place in an Indian town, the practice is for every one, and particularly the Police, to stand about till it is all over, and then to get up false evidence against all such as are rather likely to have been engaged in the robbery, in the hope that they thus may,—on the principle of Herod’s massacre,—include the proper victims: the Mahomedan Law Officer counts up such evidence on his fingers, and—It surely would be better to arise than to meet so clumsily the demands for justice.”

But the diffusion of education (I mean primary education, which leads to all other) must go hand and hand in the work I contemplate: the whole social system,—the masses, as they are called,—must be permeated with this. We must, as far as possible, make a knowledge to read and write, a condition of even the lowest service, and no one should be allowed a vote in local matters till he could do so—it is motives and not means the people want, and to these motives we should even add gentle exertion, (my liability to correct,) and thus, as Dr. Smith recommends, “impose” such education on the masses.

Yours,

CASSANDRA.

Extract of a letter from a Correspondent in Orissa.

The editorial articles which have recently appeared in your paper, on the Police, I have read with much interest; and I now anxiously await the time when Government will announce to the public, that this new piece of machinery has been put into motion. An article in a recent number of the Friend says, that “Mr. Halliday proposes to continue the control of the village constables upon the system which has now been in vogue for forty-five years.” Does this mean, that the Chowkedars are still to be subject to the control and check of the Zemindar, and the inhabitants of the village? If it does, my opinion is, that the plan is a bad one. In order to have an efficient Police, the Zemindars should not be permitted to exercise any control over the Chowkedars attached to their villages; they are at present called upon by the heads of villages to perform duties of every description; and it frequently occurs that they are sent on errands at such a distance, that they cannot return home till next day; the consequence is, that the village is without a watchman for one night.

Mr. Halliday proposes, in order to keep up this immense establishment, to levy a tax of 3 Rs. per month from the Zemindar for every man employed, as a Chowkedar, in his Zemindarie; this is carrying the matter too far, when you come to consider that landholders are but allowed thirty per cent. from what their estates yield; Government takes security. This system does not stop even here; for under all former Governments, the Zemindars have been permitted to hold the land on which their houses stand, rent free; and so they have in this district under the British rule, until a few months ago, when an order came down from the Board, ordering all such lands to be assessed for the future. Can it, then, be supposed, that they will willingly submit to a farther reduction from their allowance? Imagine the loss it will be to those who have 10 and 20 villages, and each village to entertain one, and in some instances, two, Chowkedars! The present system of granting jaghires to Chowkedars is not a bad one. They are at present allowed 3, 4 and 5 bheeghs; increase the quantity, to do which there is an abundance of waste land, and I think all parties will be satisfied. Probably you will ask how this land can be of any use to those who have neither bullocks nor agricultural implements with which to cultivate it? What is called the bang system prevails to a great extent in this district; that is, our ryot makes over his land to his neighbour for the season; the latter ploughs and sows it, and for his trouble receives a moiety of the produce. This plan may be adopted by the Chowkedars. In addition to the jaghire, a Chowkedar collects from each ryot at harvest time, ten and twelve seers of paddy, and from Chahdewah ryots, i. e. ryots engaged in petty traffic, who also reside in the villages, 10 and 12 pangs of cowries; some of them make baskets and keep fowls, so that if they choose they can secure to themselves a very comfortable livelihood.

* Ed.—No.

The central division of Cuttack is supposed to contain 3,150 square miles; the number of Thannahs in it, exclusive of the one in town, is eight; to each of the Mofussil Thannahs is attached one Darogah, one Jemadar, one Mohurrer and ten Peons. The Station Thannah establishment is, one Darogah, five Jemadars, one Mohurrer and seventy Peons. The area above mentioned gives to each Thannah an average jurisdiction of 392½ square miles. Sixty-four Assistant Magistrates will allow but two to each district; there ought to be four at least to reside in the interior, besides the Magistrate at the Station. The Natives would rejoice to have European Officers stationed among them. About this time last year I was encamped at the town of —, a town with about the same population as Cuttack, and repeatedly was I asked why a Magistrate Shahib did not take up his residence among them; they complained of the oppression of the Darogah; he turned a deaf ear to their complaints, unless they were accompanied with a bribe; and where, they said, are we poor people to get the money; we cannot go to the Station with complaints, it is too far, and we shall be absent too long from our houses, and our families are liable to be mal-treated by those against whom we prefer complaints.

EUROPE.

RELIGIOUS.

PRUSSIA.—The persecutions in Prussia against the pure Lutherans, who oppose the union of their church with the Reformed Church, continue. More than one hundred families of Silesia and Poland have become exiles from their native land rather than submit to the spiritual yoke which the King would put upon them. On the other hand, the King of Prussia has received the families which have been expelled by Roman intolerance to quit the Tyrol. We are assured, and we can readily believe, that these persecutions serve only to propagate the sentiments against which they are levelled. It is said to have received Protestant persecutions for the cause of religion. Archives des Christianismes.

WHITEFIELD.—His LABOUR AND COMMAND OVER HIS UNIVERSE.—It was the statement of one who knew him well, and who was incapable of wilful exaggeration—and he is confirmed by his letters, journals, and a whole choir of witnesses,—that "in the course of a single week, and that far years, he spoke in general forty hours, and in very many sixty, and that to thousands; and after 1½ hours, instead of taking any rest, he was engaged in offering prayers and intercessions, with hymns and spiritual songs, as his manner was, in every house to which he was invited." Given, as he is, who during the passage of the sun through the ecliptic, crosses his sphere every seventh day in twice six arcs of the dazzling star to which sermons attain in this degenerate age, and multiply his efforts by forty, and you do not reach the standard by which for thirty-five successive years Whitefield regulated this single branch of his exertions. Combine this with the fervour with which he habitually spoke, the want of all aids to the voice in the fields and the thoroughfares he frequented, and the toll of becoming distinctly audible to thousands and tens of thousands, and considered merely as a physical phenomenon, the result is amongst the most curious of all well authenticated marvels. If the time spent in travelling from place to place and some brief intervals of repose he subtracted, his whole life may be said to have been consumed in the delivery of one continuous or scarcely interrupted sermon. Strange as is such an example of bodily and mental energy, still stranger is the nature and the power of fascinating the attention of hearers of every rank of life, and of every variety of understanding. Not only were the loom, the forge, the plough, the collieries, and the workshops deserted at his approach, but the spell was acknowledged by Hume and Franklin by Fulton, Bollingbroke, and Chesterfield—by maids of honour, and lords of the bed chamber. Such indeed was its force, that when the secular crowd he condescended to and a well-attended "caveau" audience "to a cold red head." Neither English reserve, nor the theological discrimination of the Scotch, nor the callous nerves of the Slave-dealers of America, nor the stately self-possession of her aborigines, could resist the enchantment. Never was mortal man gifted with such an incapacity of fatiguing or being fatigued.—Edinburgh Review.

BISHOPRIC OF MANCHESTER.—In Tuesday night's Gazette appears an Order in Council, pursuant to recommendations of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, that the sees and dioceses of St. Asaph and Bangor, on the next vacancy to either one, shall be united, the surviving Bishop of either one to be confirmed in the new bishopric; either one to be exempt from the payment of first fruits, &c., on that occasion. The new bishop to receive an income of 5,200*l.* Arrangements are also made for newly apportioning the Bishops of St. Asaph, St. David's, and Llandaff, who are to receive, respectively, a yearly income of 4,500*l.*, and 4,200*l.* Also, that when the union of the sees of St. Asaph and Bangor shall take effect, the Collegiate Church of Manchester shall forthwith become a Cathedral Church, and seat of bishop within the province of York; and the wardens and fellows thereof to be called Dean and Canon, to be the Dean and Chapter of the said church; the county of Lancaster, except the Deanery of Furness, to be detached from the diocese of Chester, and to constitute the diocese of Manchester; the new bishop to receive an average annual income of 4,500*l.*, and to be provided with an episcopal residence. The order appears in the Gazette of Tuesday, the same day on which the charter for incorporating Manchester is dated.—Pat.

THE LATE LAMINGRAVE OF HESSE.

Extract from the monthly extracts of the British and Foreign Bible Society's Correspondence, Oct. 31.

(From the "Twenty-first and Twenty-second Annual Reports of the Sleswick-Holstein Bible Society, for 1836 and 1837.")
The usual intimation of the Society's gracious exertions for the Sleswick-Holstein Bible Society's report (being the Twenty-first) was communicated by our illustrious President, the Landgrave of Hesse, to the committee, in a letter given at the royal residence of Copenhagen, and signed by the King himself, under date of April 30, 1836. It was the last time that his serene highness enjoyed this pleasure; for on the 17th of August, the venerable prince was called away from his earthly labours; and on the 30th of the same month his remains were deposited in the family vault in the Cathedral of Sleswick, on the day of his marriage with his angelic consort, exactly seventy years before.

The age of the late venerable prince had greatly exceeded the general period allotted to man; and his end was peaceful, and free from pain. The whole life was marked by the most intellectual and moral exertions for the benefit of mankind, and science; but the favorite object of his labours was, to promote an extension of the Kingdom of God on earth. He confessed the name of Jesus both privately and publicly; and never was he ashamed to own that he acknowledged Him as his Redeemer and Saviour; neither did he flinch from his testimony in behalf of the Gospel, even though he was attacked, and frequently misrepresented, by his infidel contemporaries. Though he considered his one of the happiest moments of his life, when in early youth he had an opportunity at the Court of Frederick the Great, to declare, before a royal assembly, that he knew no higher happiness on earth than to be a humble believer in the Lord Jesus Christ. The King of Prussia was silenced by the animated testimony of the young prince, then attached to his service; and it is remarkable, that after a life devoted to the Gospel, he was called away to see him face to face, on whom his soul believed, in the very day on which that monarch preceded him in death fifty years before. To the latest period of his existence, he considered it his highest privilege to labour for the glory of the Redeemer; and whenever opportunities occurred, he was not remiss in seeking to engage the co-operation of his high and influential friends. He was found in his last moments, seated at his writing-table, with his eyes half closed, and broken in death, apparently gazing on a painting of the Saviour, which adorned his study.

What he did, and what he projected for the benefit of the country, is matter of record to history; the remembrance of his zeal, in promoting the dissemination of the word of God, and the interests of the Sleswick-Holstein Bible Society, will ever be affectionately cherished in the hearts of all who had the privilege of being united with him in the same holy work.

DEATH.

Oct. 17, in the 35th year of his age, Mr. John Hawkins, of Nailsworth, Gloucestershire. In the Baptist church at Shortwood, he had for thirty-one years held the office of deacon, uniting in the discharge of his important duties mildness and sagacity, with unwearied constancy and zeal; the warmth and sincerity of his affection towards an extensive circle of relatives and friends, together with the beautiful and uniform exhibition of the Christian citizen, in his intercourse with the world, have left a deep impression of the magnitude of the loss sustained by the church, the family, and the neighbourhood in which he lived. His remains were interred in the burial-ground at Shortwood, on the Wednesday after his decease; many of the shops near which the procession passed, were closed, and the attendance of a large concourse of his neighbours and friends, who followed his remains to the grave, testified to the high esteem in which his character was held by all classes.

Encke's Comet has been very distinctly seen by Sir James South. He says, "its light is considerably condensed towards its centre. It is in a very rich part of the heavens: more than 40 stars are in the field with it. I have seen it pass over several, and some of the 12th magnitude are visible through it, even within 20 second of its most condensed part. At 9 hours,

THE AGRA SCHOOL BOOK SOCIETY.—We re-publish in another column, a Report on the First Annual Meeting of the Agra School Book Society. Of the Report itself, we shall speak in due season, as soon as we are furnished with it. We congratulate the community in the Western Provinces on the establishment and vigorous operation of this useful Institution; and we trust that its exertions will be successful in the great field of usefulness which lies before it, unoccupied and untilled.

For many years past, the general progress of education and knowledge in India, has called impatiently for the establishment of such an Association. It could not but be felt as a glaring anomaly, that the Western Provinces, so rich in the resources for the means of intellectual culture, on the operations of a body like the Calcutta School Book Society, nearly a thousand miles distant. It was not simply something like a redoubt on the enlightened community of the West, but translations of elementary works, instead of being executed in the heart of those Provinces, could be made in a different province, in which their languages were spoken. But the aspirations of those who took interest in the cause of education in the West, were not satisfied by the want of all mechanical facilities for printing. During the administration of Lord Willoughby, the practical freedom of the Press which he secured to the country, called the Press of the Western Provinces into existence. That Press has been annually acquiring fresh efficiency, and is now prepared to carry into execution the largest views of the benevolent. An Association was formed last year, for the establishment of a School Book Society, in order to concentrate and direct the efforts of those who are anxious to diffuse knowledge among the people. Contributions have since poured in upon the infant Society, not only of money, but what is, perhaps, of more importance, of translated works. It is gratifying to perceive, that the Institution has thus, from the very commencement, determined to devote its chief attention to the translation and printing of works in the vernacular languages. This is to begin at the right point, and in a measure to command success; for we are convinced, that new facilities will daily present themselves for the acquisition of valuable translations. The reason why nothing has been done in this department of labour in Bengal, is, because no encouragement has been held out. The community in the West have practically repudiated the doctrine, that a hundred years is necessary to the formation of such an indigenous literature, as might become the means of education; and, indeed, those to whom we were indebted for this assertion, made so little effort to shorten the century, that we could not but conclude their wishes to have been father to the thought. The Agra School Book Society, taking for its model the plan of the Bombay Society, has at once entered on the field of vernacular translation, and in taking the languages as they are, has determined to draw from them, even in their present crude state, the means of national improvement. We do not think that it will be a good in creating want has been called for. But, if we do not expect from its scholars, the most classical poems, the most nervous orations, or the most philosophical or historical histories. Neither, indeed, is such a measure the first and immediate want of the half-civilized people who sit poring to elevate. When the intellectual office mentioned is accomplished, it will be time enough to think of the embellishments of the epics; of the well-proportioned sonnets, and the rich enunciations. But we think the Society will find the languages of Western India, even at the present moment, sufficiently copious and exact for the incalculable of the leading truths in history, geography, astronomy, natural philosophy, and other branches of knowledge. Those languages have been found adequate to the incalculable of false ideas on these various subjects, and cannot, therefore, be so very deficient, as to be unequal to the dissemination of those which are true. If the Committee should succeed in creating thirty or forty works in simple, elegant and idiomatic language, calculated to dispel that gross ignorance which envelops the Native mind, it will have done, and done well, the work of one generation of educators.

An application has, we find, been made to Government for support. We hope it will be given heartily, in addition to that which has already been afforded to the Calcutta School Book Society. The objects which these Societies undertake is one of the main objects for which the British Government itself exists in India; for which it raises revenue, and for which it wields machinery of the most powerful. We can conceive no higher object for our civil and military establishment, than to prosecute internal peace, and prevent foreign aggression, while the foremost of civilized nations is engaged in carrying forward the great process of civilization in this huge empire. The auxiliary means must not, therefore, be allowed to go unattended, as to cast the object itself into the shade.

CHANDRY HOUSE.—We learn from the papers, that Cliverty House, which is now a ruin, and its adjoining park, which is a jungle, are about to be brought to the hammer. It is difficult to contemplate the transfer of this property, without a train of reflections upon the instability of every thing human. This House, which was the country residence of the Governor of Chanderagore, was erected, as we have heard, soon after Dupleix, the Clive of his age, had given so extraordinary an impulse to the trade of Chanderagore, as to induce the erection of twelve hundred brick houses, and had developed the ambitious plan of raising his own nation to that political eminence which his more successful rivals have now attained. When the line of the river from Ishora to Houghly was instinct with commercial life, and the vessels anchored above Calcutta at the three foreign settlements, exceeded those which lay in its port, this fine edifice was the centre of elegance and gaiety. The noble hall, one of the most magnificent in India, was filled with a brilliant and diversified assembly of French, Dutch, Dutch and English. In the ancient avenue of trees which routes the entrance, two hundred carriages have often been standing at one time. It was in this mansion that the Governor of Chanderagore successively entertained Lord Clive, Sir W.

* Since this was written, we find it published in the Journal of our correspondence.

Jones and Mr. Hastings. Nor is the House which is about to be consigned to the hammer, without its historical, as well as its convivial, recollections. When the French community of Chandernagore got up a Revolution on a small scale, in imitation of the terrific original in Europe, the Governor was constrained to fly to Ghiretty. And when intelligence of the 5th of October reached that Settlement, its sans culotterie proceeded to the Chateau of Ghiretty to bring back the Governor, in imitation of the revolutionary procession from the Chateau of Versailles. The House, which rose with the glory and fell with the decay of Chandernagore, will now pass into the hands of strangers, and all its ancient recollections will soon be buried in oblivion.

THE BOMBAY BANK.—The Western Metropolis of Hindoostan, the principal sea port of India, the only outlet of many of her richest provinces, that city which has become the actual point of commercial and political contact with the mother country, and which a few years more must constitute the emporium of that vast commerce already opening to us along the Indus, and throughout the boundless plains of Central India,*—we mean Bombay,—is at the present time labouring under so violent a paroxysm of excitement, that we question whether the descent of a hundred thousand Russians upon the Island, with all the rabble of Central Asia at their heels, could produce any thing to equal it. One imperious idea appears to fill the mind of the community, to the exclusion of all others. The stirring events in Scinde, the advance of the Army of the Indus, the movements in Affghanistan, the intrigues of Russia, from the Caspian Sea to the Indus, are all forgotten in that great domestic grievance which absorbs universal attention. "The Supreme Government," its Secretary, Mr. "Tulden" (Prinsep), have adopted a tone of insolence to the Bombay Government; they have arbitrarily violated the rights of the community; they have been guilty of "arrogant effrontery," and "arbitrary tyranny." They have "peined a despatch, which our minister of despotism, who would the knight in Siberia, would have had the presumption to pen." Such is the language adopted in reference to the Supreme Government, on the Bombay Bank question, by a journal distinguished for the general moderation of its tone, and the unquestionable talent of its editorial observations. So deep a commotion, we calculate, has not been known in that Island since the King of Portugal transferred it, with his daughter, to the crown of England. To us, and others, at this eastern extremity of India, who have never dreamt of speculating in Bombay Bank Shares, and are privileged from the distance of our position, to look across the continent of India, upon the ferment raised in its Western Metropolis, with calm and sober feelings, this effervescence presents the subject of smug observation. Unable to enter into those views which have raised so unusual a tempest in the Island, we are naturally led to contemplate with serenity those dire spectres which a disappointed imagination has conjured up. We shall endeavour, therefore, to collect together the facts, which are presented to us by Mr. Prinsep's public letter, and by the article in the Times, and to present an unimpassioned representation of the circumstances connected with the Bombay Bank.

About two years ago, the inhabitants at Bombay adopted the wish of having a Bank upon the model of the Bank in the city of Palooce, and a movement was made to establish one, in which the whole of the community, civil, military and mercantile, high and low, Parsees and Christians, unanimously joined. A gentleman was deputed to England to urge the matter, by personal representations, on the Home Authorities. The Bombay Times states, that the three senior firms at that Presidency, though they entered with warmth into the original scheme, subsequently cooled upon it; and not content with abstracting their support, manifested the most bitter hostility to it, not only in Bombay, but through their correspondents in London. The Bombay 'public' was, therefore, obliged to go on, not only without them, but in spite of them. The envoy in England found greater obstacles in his way than he had calculated on; and the Bombay 'public,' fearing that the consent of the Court of Directors and the Board of Control would not be granted to the project of a Chartered Bank, made another move for the establishment of a Private Joint Stock Bank, from which the three firms and seventy-two persons of merited stability voluntarily withheld themselves. At length, after nearly two years of exertion, the Home Authorities unexpectedly became propitious, and orders were issued by the Government of India, to prepare an Act for incorporating a New Bank at Bombay.

The main question, then, arose, to whom the duty of subscribing for shares in the New Bank should be devolved. It was very evident, that a Bank, under the guarantee of the State, and which opened its doors freely to the funds of the whole of the public service, must, independently of the issue of its notes, which Government had agreed to accept as money, rise into very high credit; that its shares would immediately bear a premium of 10, 20 or 30 per cent.; and that at the moment of breaking cover, there would be a profit of five lakhs, at the lowest, and fifteen lakhs, at a superior calculation, ready for distribution. It appears that the Government and the community of Bombay recommended to the Supreme Government to accept it out of the list of the proposed shareholders in the Private Joint Stock Bank, and to confer the shares of the New Chartered Bank on them, together with all the profit of premium which would accrue on the sale of them.

Totally correct there appeared to the Supreme Government several weighty objections. First. The subscribers had not been taken upon a public notification of a public offer, so as to secure an impartial adjustment of the claims of the whole community. Secondly. By the direct orders of the Court of Directors, the public servants of Government were forbidden to form any connection with private Banks; it was supposed, therefore, that in obedience to those orders, a servant of the State had taken a share in the transactions of the Private Joint Stock Bank; and hence, that the introduction of its list would exclude from the immediate business of the Chartered Bank, all the functionaries of Government; which would have been unjust. Thirdly. That forty individuals had represented to Government, that altho' they had subscribed to the original plan of an association Bank, they had not enrolled their names in the list of the Private Joint Stock Bank, which it had been proposed to establish, independently of Government; and it appeared that seventy-two individuals, who would be entitled to hundred and fifty-two shares, stood in the same predicament. Lastly. That the Court of Directors having all these circumstances before them; that in having a full knowledge of the upper and under currents of commercial jealousy at Bombay, had not directed that the Bank should be constituted in the names of any exclusive individuals, but be ordained in general terms, that an Act should be prepared forthwith for the incorporation of a Bank. The Government of India was, therefore, fully convinced of the necessity of opening a new subscription list for the Chartered Bank, and being unable to adjust the conflicting interests which divide the community of Bombay, adopted the plain, or common sense project of putting up the shares to auction, to be knocked down to the highest bidder, "as the method of disposing of the privilege of subscribing, that would most prevent abuse, and best obviate the complaint of unfairness in the distribution of shares."

In reference to what should be done with the proceeds of the sale, the President in Council proposed, first, that all the expenses which had been incurred by the Bank Committee, or by any other parties in presenting their application for the acquisition of the Bank Charter, should be refunded; secondly, that one lakh of Rupees should be devoted to the erection of suitable buildings for the office of the Bank; and, lastly, that the remainder should continue in deposit, to abide the decision of the Directors; but he stated at the same time that it was his intention to recommend that it be employed in some public work of essential benefit to the Island and Presidency of Bombay.

The question at issue, then, between the party whose cause the Bombay Times advocates, and the Government of British India, refers exclusively to the profits which may arise from the distribution of the shares of the New Bank, to which it is the sanction of Government which gives its pecuniary value. The violation of rights, the insult, the presumption, the effrontery, the tyranny, is after all a matter of the breeches pocket, and turns upon no higher question than this: shall the ten, twelve or fourteen lakhs of Rupees, arising from the shares of the New Bank, pass into the pockets of the 'public' of Bombay; meaning thereby those who had drawn up the sketch of a Private Joint Stock Bank, to the exclusion of those who had subscribed for six hundred and fifty-two shares of an Incorporated Bank, and to the exclusion also of all the servants of that Government, which gave to the Bank all its pecuniary importance; or shall the whole community share and abuse alike; and shall the profits be devoted to objects of public utility. You are too distant, untouched by the strife of local interests, it appears that the proposal of Government is fair, equitable and patriotic. And we are the more confirmed in this opinion, when we find that the whole line of argumentation, for which Mr. Prince's letter is so eminently distinguished, is not met by its most strenuous opponents with any substance of countervailing arguments; and that the only weapons which have been used to combat it, are of a nature calculated to do more harm to the cause, than to the City.

LORD WILLIAM BENTINCK.—We regret much to perceive the following remarks on Lord William Bentinck, in a recent number of the Englishman.

"We gather the following from a late number of the Chronicle :—

"On Wednesday, the New York and Rugby coach was driven by a new whip, who not knowing the road, drove the coach to Melton, sixteen miles out of the way! Post-horses were put to the coach at Cheetham Town, and all dispatch used to reach Rugby, but it did not arrive until the train had started, greatly to the annoyance of the passengers, amongst whom was Lord W. Bentinck."

To our fancy there is something particularly refreshing in the last two lines. Imagine the ex-ruler of the uncounted hundred millions,—the platinated noble of Dutch descent, who no tale of suffering could move to pity,—to whom the cries and appeals of the wronged and impoverished were a species of soft music, but not so melting; imagine fat little Lord William Cavendish Bentinck walking about the inn-yard, or the sanded floor of the inn parlour, at Rugby, on a cold, raw, foggy November day, anxious for his dinner, and entertaining a tolerable presentiment that he will be 'found missing' at the table to which he had been most particularly invited! A half-battled Sub could scarcely have devised a more piquant mode of ignominious tormenting."

As to the fun of Lord William Bentinck's walking about the inn yard, or on the sanded floor of the inn at Rugby, on so ludicrous an occasion, we are quite sure that His Lordship enjoyed the novelty of his position quite as much as the Editor of the Englishman could have done. We can easily fancy the noble Dictator, after he had laid down his flowers and axes, contracting, much to his own amusement, the stable yard at Rugby, and the gorgeous assembly at Ramgar, with an army for his escort, and the chivalry of the Punjab as spectators. It was a contrast which no man could have borne with greater equanimity and good humour than our late Governor General. But to describe Lord William Bentinck as a man whom no tale of suffering could move with pity, and as one to whom the cries and appeals of the wronged and the impoverished were a species of soft music, is to say the least of it, in bad taste, if for no other reason, because it wounds the appetite of truth. Lord William Bentinck was quite as lavish of his own money, as he was economical of that with which the State had entrusted him. His parsimony in the expenditure of public funds, was not a more marked feature in his character, than the open-handed liberality with which he dispensed those over which he had an absolute control. No tale of misery reached him which he did not hasten to relieve. His extensive charities were conferred with so little ostentation, that they were seldom known beyond the circle to which they ministered relief; and in the great majority of instances, the alms, so far from being a source of mortification to the recipients, enhanced their value by the charm of her own sweetness and co-operation. To speak of such a man as one to whom the cries of the impoverished were as soft music, is a mere perversion of the use of language.

As to regards those measures of severe economy which the exigencies of the State and the commands of his superiors imposed on him, and more especially in reference to the halt batta order, we for our part feel convinced, that the recent disclosure of His Lordship's correspondence, must long since have restored him to the good graces of every man of right and generous feeling in the army. When His Lordship declared that, as the servant of the Court, he had deemed obedience, on principle alone, to be a paramount duty under the given circumstances; and that and not this case had been more than once under consideration and returned for execution, he should have assumed the utmost discretion, we think that with every noble mind the halt batta question, so far as His Lordship's character is involved, is for ever settled. But there is a fashion in shame as well as in adulation; and it must be allowed its hour of dominion. The tide of public opinion has no summer nor winter, but it begins to ebb. In India, each generation of sojourners appears anxious to leanness to its successor the task of clearing up the mire of its prejudices, just as it had been employed in disposing of the legacy of prejudices, which it received from preceding generations. We feel so confident that when the passions and the disappointments of the present age have been entombed in its grave, the character of Lord William will stand forth bright in the galaxy of Indian Statesmen, by whom this empire has been civilised, as we are convinced of this fact that the clouds which prejudice had gathered round the name of Clive, and Warren Hastings, and Wellesley, have been dispersed by the impartial judgement of the present age. In the case of Lord William Bentinck, indeed, the present age may be said to have anticipated, in a great measure, the judgement of posterity. Sir Charles Metcalfe whom we extol, and justly, to the skies, was not more conspicuous for treading in the steps of Lord William Bentinck in the path of private benevolence, than for following him in the broad line of his public measures. Sir Charles cordially co-operated with the Governor General in all those measures of economy, which the boundless extravagance of a previous administration had forced on the existing government. In the matter of the half batta, the head and front of Lord Bentinck's military officers, Sir Charles fully concurred in the opinion, that no course was left to the local authorities, but that of obedience. The principle upon which His Lordship conducted his economical measures is thus fully sanctioned by the general voice, which awards the meed of praise to his colleague. Nothing is wanting, therefore, to clear off the stain which passion and prejudice have cast on his execution, but time.

CHINA—THE OPIUM TRADE.—The intelligence of the past week from China is of the deepest interest. To Government, and the mercantile community, it threatens very serious loss. To all considerate persons, it must be at once gratifying and humiliating. But before indulging in any reflections on the subject, we shall endeavour to place the substance of the intelligence distinctly before our readers. The Opium trade, like every thing of the sort, under similar circumstances, has been rapidly growing in all that characterizes contraband traffic. At the same time its pernicious effects on the population of China have become so general and ruinous, that the Government could no longer be indifferent to its existence, or wink at its enormities. Of late, therefore, it has been curried on by grossly multiplied agents, of bold and reckless character, who have introduced their craft into the river itself, and come into the closest collision with the Native Preventive Service, who, on the other hand, have been stimulated to the utmost courage they are capable of, by the determination of the Government. The outrages necessarily arising out of such a state of things became at last so great, that the Chinese, rather than allow of their continuance, justly and wisely determined to have no commerce with the British nation at all. The Trade was stopped. The intelligence now is, that the general trade has been reversed, at the sacrifice of the European smugglers.

The public papers furnish us with the series of official documents on the subject, by which the business has been adjusted. The first in the series is a Public Notice issued on the 18th December, by Captain Elliott, Chief Superintendent of the trade of the British subjects in China; in which it is required, that all the British owned schooners, and other small craft, habitually or occasionally engaged in the illicit Opium traffic within the Bocca Tigris, should proceed out of the same within the space of three days from the date of the notice, and not return within the Bocca Tigris in the same traffic—all Her Majesty's subjects engaged in the traffic are warned, that, if any Native of China come to die by any wound inflicted by them, on due conviction, they are liable to capital punishment, just as if the crime had been committed within the jurisdiction of Her Majesty's Courts at Westminster—that Her Majesty's Government will in no way interpose if the Chinese Government think fit to seize and confiscate the craft engaged in the trade—that the forcible resisting of the officers of the Chinese Government in searching and seizing is a heinous act, and its perpetrators are liable to consequences and penalties, in the same manner as if the resistance were offered to the officers of their own or any other Government, in their own or any other foreign country.

After the publication of this notice, on the 23d December, Captain Elliott sent an Address to the Governor of Canton; in which, after noticing the evils attending the illicit Opium traffic within the River, and the still greater aggravation of them to be anticipated if it be allowed to continue, he declares that the British Government will regard such evil practices with no feelings of leniency, but, on the contrary, with severity and continual anxiety; in proof of which,

His Excellency is informed of the publication of the notice of the 18th, requiring the smuggling craft to leave the river, and is requested to signify his pleasure on the subject, that he concerned may know that the Superintendent has received His Excellency's authority for the notice. Assurance is given by the Superintendent that his gracious Sovereign will not interfere for the protection of the property of those of her subjects who continue to practice such dangerous disorders; and it is desired that His Excellency would command his officers employed on this occasion to proceed with the Superintendent to the station of the boats.

The reply of the Governor to this Address is dated the 26th December. He considers that, as the Superintendent has commands from his Sovereign, he must needs also have powers; and, therefore, it is inexplicable that he should find it difficult to send out the boats again. Yet it is clear he has a distinct understanding of his duty as a repressor of the evil and protector of the good; nor has he sought to excuse the difficulty he meets with, by pleading inability. It is not then hesitating in me (says the Governor) to interfere obstinately to the letter of the law, and so to isolate him from the object for which he has come. The request is, therefore, granted; and the prefect and commandant will be directed in the adoption of modified measures, suited to the occasion. The Superintendent must faithfully order away the boats; and should any dare to disobey, he is authorized instantly to represent the case, that proceedings may be thereon taken. The Governor having under his sway the whole head of Yac, it may well be conceived that these boats would not trouble him in the least. As soon as the boats shall have sailed, the merchant ships may at once have their trade reopened as usual.

The prefect and commandant having received this document, proceed to give commands as above.

On the 31st December this correspondence is published by Captain Elliott, accompanied by an official Notice to British Subjects, in which he announces that public intercourse is resumed, and states the reasons of his conduct. (Of the former now suppressed, and which he heartily laments has reason for error, he declares his opinion, that in its general effects it was intensely mischievous to every branch of the trade, that it was rapidly staining the British character with deep disrepute, and that it exposed the vast public and private interests involved in the peaceful maintenance of our regular commercial intercourse with China to imminent jeopardy. He feels, therefore, he should have betrayed his duty, had he hesitated longer to separate Her Majesty's Government from any direct or implied countenance of this dangerous irregularity. He had resolved to shrink from no responsibility in drawing it to a conclusion, and will as firmly use all lawful means to prevent its recurrence. The community settled at Canton generally concur strongly with him in the depreciation of this peculiar mischief, of which fact he has informed the Hmoo Government. He takes occasion to republish that part of the Act of Parliament, and the Orders in Council upon which his instructions are founded. His instructions he cannot publish. If any persons feel aggrieved by his measures, they have a legal remedy in a representation to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

It appears that in consequence of these transactions, the general trade, which had been suspended for three weeks, was resumed on the first day of the new year. The Opium boats had all left the river; and it may be considered a settled thing, that that branch of the trade is at an end. There are few of the Custom merchants disposed to murmur at this, as an evil in itself. But grave consequences are anticipated from it. To understand the justice of the anticipation, a few words of explanation are necessary. The system of the Opi-

the trade in China is composed of two portions, analogous to the two great departments in any mercantile establishment—the counting-house and the ware-house. Canton is the counting-house of the Opium trade. There the sales are effected. At Linin, the drug is kept in store, in armed ships, instead of godowns; and the purchasers receive in Canton, from the merchants, in return for their money, orders on the storekeepers in the ships for delivery of the Opium. The risk of the smuggling, from the time the article is delivered at the ships, falls on the native merchant. The competition of the trade, however, could not bear the check, interposed by the simple opposition of Chinese smugglers to Chinese revenue officers. The increased activity of the Chinese officers required to be met by the greater daring and skill of European contrabandists; and this has been done for the last two or three years in the schooners and other small craft now banished from the river. The present movement, then, merely brings back the trade to its state, when the late activity of Chinese Government in suppressing the sale and use of Opium began.

But it is to be remembered, that the activity of the Chinese Government preceded the river smuggling, and was rather its cause than its effect. There is no reason, therefore, to imagine, that the cessation of this branch of the trade, will suppose the deep and strongly excited hostility to the traffic altogether. The Chinese have the strongest arguments both financial and moral for their hostility. As far back as 1839 they had come to this pass, that China paid 11,618,167 dollars for her Tea, whilst she received only 9,133,749 dollars for her Tea—an astonishing fact in which she cannot be indifferent. And, to the credit of the Chinese Government, they exhibit still greater regard to the moral considerations by which it is right they should be actuated, than to this point of finance. We find there as at Canton, English public writers who can speak of the present measures of Captain Elliott, as “attesting the property and disigning the character of British subjects to this lying, corrupt, and unjust Government.” Yet this very “lying, corrupt, and unjust Government,” is the only one concerned in the business that exhibits either humane principle or conduct. The Christian people of Europe, and of England particularly, stand reprobated before all the world, by a Heathen state, which it has been the fashion to scorn as all that was base and contemptible. They are the people who give the Opium trade and revenue its true character; and they alone have the manly consistency of refusing to make a gain from so polluted a source. A stroke of the Emperor’s pencil—for we believe he uses no pen—could have taken away our iniquitous gain and turned them into his own coffers at once, by merely authorizing the growth of the poppy within the Celestial Empire itself. But he had too much magnanimity to make a gain of the continued ruin of his people. And now we are in the position of the pestilent, greedy, persevering corrupters of his subject; whilst he is straining every nerve to move them from our destructive influence. He has humbled the British name and honour beyond all expression.

The hostility of the Chinese Government to the whole Opium trade, then, will not be diminished by the destruction of the river smuggling. They will not be a whit the more reconciled to the outside traffic. Nay, the people at Canton argue, that the success just obtained within the river, will both encourage them to proceed further, and show the means by which success may equally be secured there. Their present victory has been obtained through the Superintendent appointed by Her Britannic Majesty, and his assistance was compelled by the suspension of the general trade. If he had authority and power to suppress the malpractices of Her Majesty’s subjects within the Boucha Tien, why should he not have the same beyond that point. The Chinese may soon be able to make both him and his Government understand that he must have it; and then he will have it, and exercise it too. So are they foreboding at Canton. And God grant they may be true prophets. We too shall share the credit of their vaticinations; for it is some time since we foretold, that Tea would assuredly swamp Opium.

To those who are anxious about the loss to be entailed on our Indian revenues by this change, it may be some consolation to think, that the fall of the Opium trade is likely to be preceded by a gradual decline; and in its progress the consequent difficulties of our Government may be provided for, either by retrenchment or from new sources of income. Perhaps it is too much to expect of the faith of a Christian Government, that they should believe there is a God existing, to whom good and evil is not indifferent—who has power sufficient in the world to see that loss sustained in doing what is good in his sight shall be compensated, as well as that profit made by disobedience to Him shall be useless.

MADRAS NEW ALMANAC.—We have just received a copy of this valuable publication; and little as it may seem to belong to our own Presidency, we deem it well worthy of a brief notice. We have seen an Indian Almanac to be compared, with it in its Astronomical department; which, if it be more accurate as it is ample in its details, (and we have no reason to suppose it is not) is sufficient to make it a very tolerable substitute for the Nautical Almanac for ordinary purposes. Its superiority in this respect is to be imputed, we imagine, to the influence, if not the assistance, of the Madras Observatory—an institution of which we certainly ought to have the fellow in Calcutta. But the superiority of Mr. Marshall’s Almanac is still more conspicuous in Statistics. It contains an excellent digest of the most important Statistical facts of the whole world, besides a map, and geographical and statistical report, of each of the Collectories into which the Madras Presidency is divided. Some of these reports are full and highly interesting; others of them are meagre; and the maps, although valuable, will admit of considerable improvement. But Mr. Marshall has done in respect of them what he could, with the hope of thus drawing, from those who have it in their power to give them, more accurate and enlarged details. His object, indeed, is thus to accumulate materials for a Madras Gazetteer, which it is his desire to publish as soon as possible. The project deserves every encouragement. It deserves likewise imitation; and it is to be hoped the compilers of Almanacs in Calcutta and Bombay will lose no time in seeking, at least, an equality with this excellence of the benighted Presidency. It is strange that we have no map of our Presidencies with the limits of the different Zillahs or Collectories, and their several Perganahs, defined. It is surely worth the attention of Mr. Tassie.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 14.

Intelligence has been received from China to the 5th of January. It is most important in its bearing on the interests of the merchants at Bombay, Calcutta and Canton, and of the general government of India. In consequence of the detection of the attempt to smuggle Opium on shore, the Chinese authorities put an entire stop to all British trade at Canton. The British Superintendent on this issued a Proclamation, stating that, urged by considerations immediately affecting the lives and property of Her Majesty’s subjects engaged in trade in China, he ordered all small rigged craft, carrying British colours, and now employed in smuggling Opium on shore, to quit the river within three days. Thus the British Consul in China has identified himself with the Chinese authorities, to put down the Opium trade. The Governor of Canton has, in consequence, permitted the registranate trade to be again carried on. The conduct of Capt. Elliott has necessarily created the greatest excitement among the European merchants at Canton, who are interested in the sale of this drug; and we fancy the excitement it will create in Lenden-Lall Street, will be no less extraordinary. It lays the axe at the root of a revenue of between one and two millions a year, at a moment when the rail for money is likely to be of no ordinary urgency.—Col. Sigbee, Mr. Fraser and Capt. Ross have been appointed a Commission to adjust the dispute which led to the late expensive demonstration at Jhansi.—Letters from Suddiya confirm the fatal intelligence of Col. White's death. He had rather unwisely taken up his residence at a bungalow, at a little distance from Suddiya, without the protection of a guard. A body of five hundred savage Singphos came down unexpectedly at night upon him, and put him to death. The building was destroyed, and the few soldiers with the Colonel were driven back. Troops and ammunition were despatched to the station, as soon as intelligence reached Head Quarters, in Assam.—In consequence of the return of Mr. C. W. Smith from the Cape to his duties at the Revenue Board, Mr. C. Tucker, the Acting Member, has taken his seat as one of the Judges of the Sudder Dewanny Adalat. Rumour gives the post at the Board, about to be vacated by Mr. Mangley, to Mr. Lewis.—The Bombay papers state, that the next Overland Mail may be expected at that place between the 15th and the 16th of the present month.—Major Wilkinson, Political Agent of the South West Frontier, has been appointed temporarily to Nagpore. His departure is regretted equally by the people to whom his benevolent efforts have been devoted, and by his own subordinates.—Mr. Macnair, who has just returned from the Cape, to which he had proceeded for the benefit of his health, is constrained to return for the same object to England.

ENGLAND, FEBRUARY 13.

The Herkara publishes a letter from Feroz-pore, the post-office of which states, that a report had just reached that station, that Hyderabad had fallen, with considerable loss.—The intelligence from Seinde by way of Bombay, of an earlier date, states that the Amers had made an attack on Sir John Keane, and had been driven back; that Sir Henry Fane had resumed the command of the army, and intended to push on with the British, to which 150,000 rounds of ammunition had been sent. The Third Brigade, which was ordered to be broken up, is now commanded to stand fast at Feroz-pore.—The Governor General's Camp was at hand, on the 31st instant.—Letters have been received from Harjool station, that snow had fallen at our new Sanatorium, at the end of January. The building of the Hotel was, in consequence, stopped for a time, but it was confidently expected that it would be completed in April. We learn that all the rooms are engaged.—The South West Englishman has been incorporated with the Delhi Gazette.—A letter from Assam, published in the Englishman of this day, describes the extreme unhealthiness which has this year prevailed in Upper Assam, and recapitulates the names of some able public servants whose career has been cut short by death.—When the Chinese Government gave permission, on the first day of the present year, for the re-opening of the British trade at Canton, the number of vessels at the various stations on the Canton river was not less than ninety-two; of which the British vessels numbered sixty-seven; American vessels, eighteen; French, one; Dutch, two; Spanish, one; and Portuguese, three.

BOMBAY, FEBRUARY 16.

At a meeting of the Proprietors of the Bengal Bank yesterday, it was agreed to accept the New Charter proposed by Government, with this single proviso. That it be provided, as in the case of the existing Bank, that the Governor General be empowered with the power of authorizing an increase of the amount to which the Bank may make advances to a single firm or individual, when he may think proper.—The Bombay papers are up in arms against the terms of the Charter of the Bombay Bank, and the most energetic resolutions have been adopted to procure a modification of them. The clause which appears to excite particular disgust, is that which directs the shares to be put up to sale.—The news of the fall of Hyderabad is not confirmed. The latest news from Seinde is, that the Amers had rejected the ultimatum proposed by the British Government, and had collected a force of 10 to 12,000 men to oppose Sir John Keane's progress. His Excellency was within one march of Hyderabad. A day or two will, therefore, bring us tidings of the first engagement in which the Army or the India has been involved.—Dr. Wise has been gazetted as the Secretary to the Committee of Public Instruction.—A letter from Singapore containing intelligence from China in the 31st January, appears this day in the papers, stating the consumption of Opium in China this year is likely to fall short by one-half of that of the past year; and when this circumstance is taken into consideration, with the Opium which has been manufactured at this Presidency and in Malwa, it is calculated that there will be an over supply in China, at the close of the year, of no less than 92,000 chests.—Intelligence has reached town of the death of Capt. Warlow, of the Engineers, an officer equally remarkable for his professional qualifications and the great amenity of his disposition.—The Landholder's Society having taken into consideration the answer of Government, on the subject of Rescriptions, has determined to petition the Governor General in Council, on the subject.—A full report of the Proceedings of the Agricultural Society, at its meeting of Wednesday, appears this day in the Calcutta papers.

MUMBAI, FEBRUARY 18.

Important intelligence has been received from the Army in the Indus. The Amers of Seinde having determined to resist the passage of our troops through their territories, Sir John Keane sent orders to the Admiral to proceed and take Karachi a fort at the most western mouth of the Indus. The troops in it were summoned, but refused to yield, upon which several broadsides were poured in upon it, which at once levelled the fortifications with the ground. The British flag was then hoisted, and the village of Karachi, about five miles higher up the river was summoned and surrendered. Intelligence has been received from the Head Quarters of the Bombay Army, at Bunker, twenty-four miles from Hyderabad. The troops were on the point of marching up to cut down, as it is understood, that the Amers have refused our ultimatum, which is said to have been, a payment of thirty lakhs of Rupees for the expense to which the Government has subjected Government; the free navigation of the Indus for ever, and the recognition of a subsidiary force. The British troops, on arriving opposite to the town of Hyderabad, will be required to cross the Indus, the passage of which will be disputed. Sir Henry Fane has really resumed the command of the Army or the Indus; and one Brigade of the Bengal Army is ordered to push forward to meet the Bombay troops. Three promising young officers of the Queen's have been burnt to death in Seinde, by the ignition of the jungles, from which they found it impossible to escape.—Shah Soojah's force has crossed the Indus; and our province has entered on his own territories, a circumstance which was duly announced by a salute from the Horse Artillery. His troops crossed it without opposition, at a place called Hooosain Baglee; the stream was 1,350 yards wide.—There were two meetings in Calcutta, on Saturday; the one of the Australian Association, at which nothing was done, because there were present but one Shareholder, one Committee-man and the Secretary; and a meeting of the Metairie Testimonial Subscribers, at which it was determined to do nothing till the issue of the Agri Meeting was known; the Agri Meeting having also met and resolved to do nothing till the issue of the Calcutta Meeting was known.—The intelligence from Mussoorie is, that the winter is truly English; the snow is eight inches deep; and in some parts of the Landour Hills, several feet. The thermometer does not rise in the day higher than 50; and at sunrise is as low as 32.—The first volume of the Alif Laila, or the Arabian Nights Entertainments, in the original Arabic, has just been published. It does great credit to the spirited publishers, and the laborious printers.—A full account of the lamentable attack on Suddiya, in which Col. White lost his life, appears in the Englishman of this morning. We have transferred it to our columns.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 19.

The Sessions of the Supreme Court was opened yesterday morning, before Sir Edward Ryan, Chief Justice. His Lord-which is about four and a half miles from the station, proceeded there, attacked and carried the village, killing the Renewah Gohain and several of the enemy, besides making two of them prisoners; and having burned the village to the ground, returned to encampments having fortunately sustained no loss. About 11 A.M., as soon as quiet was in a measure restored in the station, Capt. H., accompanied by a small party, went and burned three of their villages, and next morning Lieut. M., accompanied by Mr. Fingnah and 100 men, went and carried on the work of destruction in the Renewah. Two Gohains, and three other large Kamptee villages, met with no opposition.

Almost every place was burned to the ground, Capt. and Mrs. Hannay, and Mr. and Mrs. Pigeant lost every thing, except the few clothes they had on at the time, but fortunately a new bungalow (nearly finished,) Lieut. Marshall was building on the banks of the river, and his old one occupied, probably the former from being very near the stockade, and the latter, situated at the further end of the station, perhaps they had not time to fire, although they burned down the out-houses close to it.

The loss of life has been very great, but not so much as might have been expected from the salubrity of the attack. On the part of the Assam Light Infantry, one Lieut. Colonel, one Subaltern Major, one Naick, Bugler, and nine Sepoys killed; one Havildar, one Naick, one Bugler, and 25 Sepoys wounded, most of them severely; one Artillery man killed; four severely wounded (one since dead); one Gohain killed, and three Chasies (can boat people,) killed, and two wounded; eight women, two slaves, and three children belonging to the Naicks killed, and nine women and two children belonging to the Gohains killed, and wounded in the bazar and round about are not yet ascertained.

Twenty-four of the enemy were killed, besides those killed by Lieut. M. and his party at Su Bleah village; and information has been received that a very great number were wounded, but carried away? It is at present impossible to account for the attack; more especially as the Chiefs were in the contrary habit of paying visits to the officers, and appeared so at the time of terms.

The number of troops in the station were as follows: Artillery, one Jewahar, two Havildars, two Naicks and 25 Sepoys. Assam Light Infantry, one Lieut. Col., one Capt., one Lieut., one Apothecary (in civil and military medical charge,) one Sergeant Major, one Subaltern Major, six Subalterns, four Jewahars, 21 Havildars, 21 Naicks, 4 Buglers, and 301 Sepoys.—*Eng. #### ADIRACK.

The Island of Karagh or Karack is thirty-four Nant's miles N. W. by W. from Budeire and about twenty-one north from the Persian coast, it is about twelve or thirteen nautic miles in circumference, being rather of an acute triangular shape, the point of the triangle being to the north from this is a line nearly along the West Side, it isilly and the land irregular, but the N. W. side as well as the eastern is a land with good soil, I consider to ensure more than three fifths of the whole Island. It is capable of producing all sorts of European and most tropical Vegetables, and Barley and Wheat grow in perfection. The whole of the plains have excellent water at fifteen to twenty from the surface, and it is healthy in the extreme. I believe eight or ten to be the greatest number of sick in Hospital during the wet season even up to this time (end of December) so far as the natives are concerned, there have been about twenty Europeans, in 34st, including officers, and most of these old men and who landed from a crooked ship in wet and stormy weather. Having given you an outline of the Island and its capabilities, I will speak of its anchorage for shipping, from the latter end of March to the beginning of October, or nearly seven months of the year, the eastern anchorage is at all times safe and landing easy, during the three months it becomes necessary on S. E. setting in to shift round to the N. W. side of the Island while it lasts, and where with the shore bearing by S. S. W. or S. W. by S. in eight fathoms you have good anchorage; returning to the eastern anchorage with the N. W. when eargh, ead may be again landed. One of the E. I. C. Vessel of war have laid here about constantly this season acting as shore recomander in the changes of wind. I now will speak of the Island in a political & commercial point of view. First then it is always safe from attack, while there is a couple of Vessels of war in the Gulf, as no force could quit the Coast of Persia without being intercepted.—secondly its proximity to the Euphrates only 90 miles, the same to Budeire the principal port of Persia, the same to the Persian Gulf, into the Persian country as well as many of the wealthy districts of Persia, it also is near Elkatif and Bahrain, both of which places Turahid Pasha is now trying to annex to the Government of Mahomed Ali Pasha of Egypt. These form a few of the Political points in which Karagh becomes important. I will now proceed to its commercial importance. First to the whole of the places aforementioned, it forms a desirable depot for merchandise. The facility of climate has long been a drawback to European Capital being advanced in a trade, which annually takes off several hundred thousand pounds of European goods. The proved healthy state of Karagh at all times, removes this obstacle, and if the British merchants established depots for British Manufactures at this Island, Merchants from Bagdad, Mesopotamia and other countries of the Euphrates and Tigris as well as those from Persia would flock to the mart. It is well known that every year species to the amount of ten to twenty Lakhs of Rs. is carried down by Merchants or sent to Bombay to purchase goods, more than triple this sum would reach Karagh for the same purpose, as the merchants of the interior of Persia and other countries in this part of the world are now obliged to buy at third and fourth hands, and also goods that come from Russia, would purchase from a certain depot if established, I feel no doubt; and I know the people well, there would be an increasing demand for English goods if this point was established. The few Native Merchants of Hindustan who monopolize this trade, dread our setting Karagh as our depot, as their monopoly would be at an end. These few facts are worth the notice of the mercantile world. While the Dutch had Karagh they nearly drove all other parties out of the market; when they lost Karagh, all their trading establishments and factories were quickly given up; the same remark applies to the Portuguese, for when they lost their Island depot their commerce in the Gulf ended with such an opening for trade and with such Political Importance; our Government ought to get Karagh either by purchase or cession from the Persians, then make it a free port, and in two years it will become as important to Persia and Turkish Arabia, as Singapore is to Siam, Cebu China and the Malay Islands and Peninsula.

A Force of 200 men and a detail of artillery is all that would be needful for its occupation, the Citadel built by the Dutch might be made with a little expense and a few guns, every thing that could be required beyond a Martello Tower or two to the S. W. for fortifying the Island, and it being the Remounting of the I. N. Squadron nothing could be wanted for protection of Commerce.

Yours, &c. A. D. G

PROCEEDINGS OF THE FIRST ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS TO THE MARYA HOOK BOOK SOCIETY, HELD AT THE ALMA STATION ROOMS, 41st FENICE ST. 1858.

R. N. C. Hamilton, Esq. President of the Society, having been called to the chair, briefly stated that the present meeting was called in conformity with the 7th resolution of the Society, adopted when the institution was first formed in December, 1856, and that its object was to submit a report of its proceedings for the past year, to elect office bearers, and transact such other business as might be brought before the meeting.

The chairman then requested the Secretary to read the report of the committee, which, being done, the following resolutions were proposed, and unanimously carried, viz.:

Moved by Captain Wheeler, seconded by Captain Graham, — 1st. That the report now read be adopted, printed and circulated among the friends and subscribers in the institution.

Moved by R. Alexander, Esq. seconded by Dr. Duncan, —

2nd. That a copy of the report be forwarded to the Right Honourable the Governor General, with an earnest solicitation that the Agents School Book Society may receive the support of Government, and that His Lordship be requested to allow his name to be recorded as the patron of the Society.

Moved by Mr. Cargill, seconded by Mr. Alderman, — 3rd. That the cordial thanks of this meeting are due to the patrons and subscribers to the Society for their liberal aid in promoting its objects.

Moved by Mr. Robert Gordon, seconded by Mr. Cargill, —

4th. That the thanks of this meeting be presented to the president of the committee, and office bearers for their valuable services during the past year, and that the following gentlemen be requested to act as officers of the institution till the next general meeting, viz.:

President.—R. N. C. Hamilton, Esq.
Committee.—G. J. Gordon, Esq. R. Alexander, Esq. Dr. Duncan, Revd. J. J. Moore, Captain Graham, Captain Wheeler, Lieut. Hamilton, 34th Regt. N. I. and Ensign Shaw, 23rd, Regt. N. I.

Secretary.—R. W. Woollam, Esq.

Acting Secretary.—Revd. J. J. Moore.

Treasurer.—The Bank of Asia.

Moved by Ensign Shaw, seconded by Mr. Woollam, —

5th. That the thanks of this meeting be presented to the chairman for his kindness in presiding on the occasion of the first annual meeting. (Signed) R. N. C. HAMILTON, Chairman.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

Almut Almut, Sibree, Dec. 31, 1858.

SIR,—Among the many advantages which have accrued to India by the opening of Steam Communication between the Western Presidency and England via Egypt, the facility enjoyed by residents in the Agra Provinces and Rajpootana States, of pursuing a route direct to the point of embarkation, may be enumerated. To those who have often traversed the routine voyage down the Ganges, a new interest would be excited by the architectural and natural beauties which come under observation in the journey from Jeypore and Ajmer to Bombay. The obstacles which existed formerly, no longer prevent a traveller from proceeding through the Native States of Joudpore and Sirohee—a safe conduct over practicable and often excellent roads—being now in favour of the undertaking. Having myself driven my wife, in a buggy, from Nusserabad, I can speak with confidence to the comparative ease and pleasure with which the journey may be performed. With an ordinary marching establishment, we left Nusserabad on the 16th November. Beaur, a military post, situated in the extended range of hills which pursues its south-west course from the vicinity of Delhi towards the Gulf of Cutch, was made in three marches, the road being occasionally broken and irregular. Advice and assistance, if required, can be procured from the Political Officer, and other gentlemen at this pretty station, the cantonment of the M'Isirwarah Battalion. The next stage, which is long and fatiguing, leads into the plains of Narwar. The road runs in sight of, and parallel to, the mountain range on its western side, towards Nodji and Pallee; and thence to Eripourah, the cantonment of the Joudpore Legion—seven long marches, through a level country, with patches of cultivation around the villages; but generally waste and unproductive. The town of Pallee, as well known from its pestilential fever, is a large and thriving place, notwithstanding the arbitrary exactions made by the local authorities and the depredations committed on its merchants by freebooters. From its position in these western regions, it is the emporium of commerce, and the connecting link between Gouzerat, and places west of Agra. Printed cottons form the staple article. The shops everywhere indicate the Dyers' trade; and the large sheets of water near the town, exhibits calicos of varied hue, under the cleansing process of the washermen, and innumerable piles of goods upon its banks. The dress, too, of the inhabitants, both male and female, designated the universal article—here the art is practised in almost every family; some branches of which, display their rainbow tints, which certainly produces a more picturesque effect on the outgaraged masses, than would the dark blue tints which distinguish the "Dyer" in other lands. Three marches over ground nearly similar to that already passed, (the last being varied by hills, more bristly wood and Acaia trees,) brought us to Eripourah. This new station is placed upon a rising ground on the bank of a nullah, which divides the Joudpore from the Sirohee territory, and is within a short distance of the village of Burgang. The spot is judiciously chosen—the country being open, or, so thinly wooded for two or three miles around, as to admit of being cleared without difficulty or expense. Water, some of the finest in India, is easily obtained by sinking wells through a calcareous gravel, with the advantage of not requiring masonry to prevent the wells from falling in. Scenery in every direction, wild and picturesque, from the near and distant growing of the hills, which rise in pyramids and extend in ridges of varied outline—Mount Abou terminating the prospect to the south, distant about 40 miles. The lines of the cantonment are well arranged—public buildings making rapid progress.—Officers' bungalows springing up; and, with Captain Downing's already luxurious and productive garden, presenting a civilized and comfortable aspect in the midst of a region heretofore famed for tigers, bloods, and plunderers. Great credit is due to the Commandant of the Legion for the alacrity with which the instructions of Government have been carried into effect, within the short period of his residence on this frontier. A degree of order has been established, and so much respect preserved for steady military discipline among the predatory tribes, as already to ensure comparative confidence to travellers and merchants. The importance of this post in a commercial point of view, has been very recently shown; upwards of 60 hackeries, laden with merchandise and specie from Bombay and Gouzerat, proceeding towards Pallee, and other places in Rajpootana, were attacked by 300 robbers; two hundred of whom were mounted, and accompanied by 30 or 60 camels to carry off the booty. A guard of 20 Sepoys under a Subadar, and a dozen Sowars, being stationed at the village of Mondah, behind a mountain 18 or 20 miles from cantonment, heard the hammering at the boxes, &c., and proceeded forthwith to the rescue. Notwithstanding the favourable position of the plunderers at midnight, and their well concerted stratagems to divert the attention of the handful of men, the property was secured and the marauders driven off, with considerable loss. Three of the carts containing property, had been previously taken away, but the remainder were re-captured and placed in safety. Had the merchants claimed protection on their arrival, instead of taking up a situation beyond the village, no loss whatever would have been sustained. The Cuffia had been waiting for an escort from Pallee, but, after this affair, the merchants would not prosecute their journey, although the hired horsemen had arrived, without the protection of a party of Downing's Horse. Their reasonable wishes having been complied with, they, of course, reached their destination safely. At the several villages within a few miles of the station, the cultivation is very fine, and far less shaven than in many other parts of India. Irrigation, by means of the Persian wheel, is the mode invariably practised. It is impossible for crops of wheat, barley, &c., to look more beautifully than did those a few miles off in a northerly direction at the time of our visit; and conviction must be carried to the mind of every one acquainted with this district, that great benefit would result to the commerce between Bombay and the North Western Provinces of Hindoostan, by the establishment of a mart for merchandise, under the immediate protection of the British Government. Extensive tracts of unreclaimed land of excellent quality, were at hand to repay, with abundant interest, the necessary labour. But, independently of pecuniary results, how great a blessing would be conferred by the substitution of honest, industrious occupation, for the lonely and suspicious wanderings of the Bhils and Mewatis; not to say the expulsion of innumerable tigers from their haunts among the jungles. Our enlightened Government cannot be inensible to the moral advantage which must be gained, by occupying permanently, and with effect, this commanding situation. Since the establishment of the Joudpore Legion in this neighbourhood, far more has been accomplished towards the introduction of tranquillity and social order among the semi-barbarians, called "Thakurs," and their lawless vassals, than the most sanguine could have anticipated. By carrying out the principle, inalienable good may follow. Sirohee, the capital of the district, is two marches from the cantonment,—the road all the way, lying through a dense grass and brush wood jungle,—byres and acacia chiefly. This portion of the journey is notoriously infested with tigers; the track of which was repeatedly observed in different places, by one or other of our party. On one occasion, when passing from Sirohee to Anasra, (two stages) at the foot of Mount Abou, we noticed the footmarks of an enormous tiger in the sandy road, for upwards of a mile, distinctly perceiving where it had retraced its steps, in prowling over this part of the narrow way, with long grass jungle on either side. As it was at dawn of day, the animal could not have long preceded us. The passage of our guests, a short time previously, had probably attracted him to the spot. No fewer than five or six men were killed at, and near, the village of Pallee, within a day or two of our arrival and departure. Fortunately, one of the tigers was destroyed, and brought into Sirohee, (the day on which we left.) At this place deserving notice only from being the residence of the Rao, a convenient bungalow has been erected, and is now available for the accommodation of travellers. The town has attained local celebrity for its cutlery, but is sadly dilapidated; the Palace, situated on the western aspect of a hill, 4 or 500 feet high, being the only substantial edifice. A fine view of the surrounding country is commanded from some of the upper balconies; and two or three of the apartments, painted and decorated in the usual Native style, have a pretty appearance. The reception hall, beneath a dome at the very top of the pile of buildings, is worth looking at. The Rao courteously descended the flight of steps at the base of the Palace to receive us, on the occasion of our visit, conducting M—— and myself up the bug ascent, holding a hand of each. He appears of a mild and gentle disposition, and would, probably, prefer the honour to the care of Government, especially some portion on the "border" of his principality. One of the peculiar features of this part of this country is, or was, the distressing recklessness of human life, so painfully and constantly presented to the eye of the traveller, by the road side. A heap of stones points out the spot on which a person has been murdered—and so numerous are these "calms" in the immediate vicinity of Bombay, that no fewer than 80 have been counted within a single march. The solitary passenger among these jungles, on receiving the fatal arrow from the bow of the murderous Bhel, is pounced upon in his agonies, and instantly despatched for the sake of the hoped-for property. These murdering marksmen are always armed in passing through the woods and passes, on a journey, or pasturing their cattle; nor does any habitation venture scarcely any distance from a village, without one or more of these denizens of the forest as a guardian. With this ever so apprehension need be entertained; any case of treachery for the exception to the rule. The ascent of Ahon is effected after driving through two or three miles of jarring jungle, by the aid of the six or eight coolies accustomed to the work. A rude seat is constructed, and suspended to a couple of lumbos, which are borne on the shoulders of four men. In this manner the ascent is accomplished over, and between, enormous blocks of reddish compact granite, overgrown with shrubs and trees; the lower half being principally lumbos. In about two hours the top is reached, when a lonely lake is seen spreading out amidst the rocks, adorned with several islets; at the further extremity of which, two neat humpaloes are observed to emerge from the distant foliage. At present there are the only residences permitted to be erected by the Shirur Rao—families coming hither during the hot season, having their tents pitched in the vicinity of the lake. Instead of a ridge merely, as the summit appears from the plains below, a space of several miles extends in one direction, and two or three in another, diversified by rocks of every shape, presenting a most wild and picturesque appearance. At a distance of two miles from the lake, the Temple of Dhanra stands, but externally, affords no indication of the elaborate details which adorn this wonderful fair edifice within. The variety and richness of the carving, in white marble; the number of sculptured figures of idols in veneration, produce a most striking effect on the mind of the spectator; not even excepting those accustomed to the splendid architectural culleers of the West. Ahon, as such located as a place of pilgrimage, is about 5,100 feet above the level of the sea; the highest peak being near 1000 feet above the temple.

Descending from this mount of superstition, the route is continued towards Deesa, through jungle; after the first two or three marches, less dense, but fairly enticed in the designation of a wild and uninhabited tract of country, with few isolated exceptions throughout the journey; some portions being over deep and heavy sand. The boundary of the Deogul and Bombay Presidencies is situated nearly between Ahon and this frontier station of the Bombay army. The cantonments are situated on a sandy plain, and appear to great advantage from the neat style of the public buildings, rather English looking with their red brick walls and tiled roofs. The transition from heat to cold is very trying at this station; not only during the different seasons but within the 24 hours. For six months the thermometer has been known to remain at, or above, 90; below it, at one time as high as 121, in a military hospital. At night, during the cold weather, the alterations are equally striking. Notwithstanding this extensive range of thermometer, it was ascertained by the returns ordered by Lord W. Bentinck, that Deesa is the healthiest military station throughout India. To this conclusion, however, I should not be inclined to come, from the conviction that a destructive influence must be exercised on the health, although not indicated by the statistical records—the effect may be insidious in its approach, but ultimately certain.

In six rather long marches over heavy, trying sand, Ahmedabad is reached, the capital of Guzerat. In the progress southward the country becomes well cultivated and richly wooded. This large city yields to scarcely any in India in a general architectural point of view. It cannot boast of its Taj or Kotah, but taken as a whole, has very much to interest the admirer of elegant architectural designs, with the most classic and delicate sculptural embellishment. Some of the structures might be advantageously placed beside the most beautiful specimens of ancient or modern art, in the English Universities. From this city to Cambay is four marches; still over very dry sandy land, and through a rich and fertile country. This place, although still large and populous, is falling rapidly into decay; once so celebrated for its commercial prospect, it is now comparatively insignificant and in ruins. Here our land journey terminated; a country boat having been provided, the voyage down the Gulf of Cambay to Bombay, was performed in little more than six-and-thirty hours, an unusually favourable passage; the wind proving fresh and from the northward all the way. We sailed from Cambay on the morning of the 10th; and reached the Island of Bombay a little after sunset on the following day; the distance being nearly 500 miles.

FRENCH PROTESTANT MISSIONS.

At the last annual meeting of the Evangelical Missionary Society at Paris, M. Girard Perre, the pastor and zealous director of the House of Missions at Paris, presented a report, which exhibits the Reformed Church of France not long ago a desolate and lonely widow, as now rejoicing over seven missionary stations, formed by French Christians in South Africa. These seven stations lace their pastors, their churches, their schools, their teachers, their sacraments, their discipline, their Christian literature. In short, the Bossutos people, of whom geography scarcely knew the name a few years since, possess at this hour regular lessons for schools, a well-kept collection of books and prayers, short tracts on the essential truths and duties of Christianity, and, finally, a translation of the Gospel according to St. Matthew.

The seven stations founded and supported by the Society in the south of Africa, are served by seven missionaries, five assistant missionaries, nine female missionaries; twenty-two labourers; and teaching children, there are about thirty persons attached to that area. In the course of the last year, sixteen converts of natives have been baptised at the different stations, and thirty-seven catechumens received as candidates for baptism. Adding to this number twenty-nine natives who had previously become members of the church, we find that, since the origin of the French mission in the south of Africa, eighty-five persons have embraced the Gospel. The annual collection of the revenues is about 100, which is more than the amount of the preceding years. The influence of the mission is extending rapidly over a population of 500,000 souls in the neighbourhood of the stations.

The Society made, this year, an extraordinary effort, to reduce the exchequer of its receipts; and in a few days afterwards, more than 50,000 francs were remitted to the treasury. Meanwhile, the ordinary receipts have suffered no diminution. On the contrary, they have been 10,000 francs greater than those of last year. The same kind of supererogation and dedication has been realised, which is a very considerable sum for the small number of French Christians.—Paris.

GHASTS TO THE PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH.—Some new regulations have been promulgated by Government respecting the distribution of the Parliamentary grant (25,000*l.*) to the Presbyterian clergy of Ireland. These clergy have, since 1848, been divided into three classes, each minister receiving 100*l.*, 75*l.*, or 50*l.* a year; a similar amount being understood to be also paid to the minister by his congregation or Synod. This classification is now abolished, and all Presbyterian clergymen are to receive 75*l.* a year, but no endowment will, in future, be granted or continued without the personal payment of the congregational stipend. A few congregations which have, at present, two endowed ministers, are, on vacancies taking place, to be reduced to one; and no part of the Parliamentary grant (as has hitherto been the practice) can be applied to any purpose, except the support of officiating clergymen. If rival congregations are got up in the immediate vicinity of each other, such meetings will be granted to them by the State; and no new congregations can be recommended to Parliament for endowment until regularly established for two or three years, having a proper church, and duly paying the stipend to their clergymen.—Dublin Evening Post.

MANCHESTER.—THE WESLEYAN CENTENARY.—We understand that a very numerous meeting of the influential ministers and laity of the Wesleyan Methodist denomination is appointed to be held in this town, in the course of the ensuing week, for the purpose of making arrangements for the celebration in 1838 of the hundredth year of the existence and operations of the society. It is intended, in addition to special religious services, commemorative of the occasion, to raise a general commercial subscription, to be superintended by some of the principal charities of the body.—Manchester Times.

SCIENTIFIC.

The Dahlia was imported from China, of which it is a native, into Europe, somewhere about twenty years ago; and the Swedish botanist, Professor Dahl, was the first who cultivated and made it known. It soon attracted notice in England, where, fifth in the list of its form and variety of colour, it became at once an especial favourite. In 1815, about two months after the battle of Waterloo, it was introduced into France, and the celebrated artist, Andre Thoinin, suggested various practical improvements in its management. The botanist Georzi had shortly before this introduced it at St. Petersburg; and hence it is, that to this day the dahlia be known throughout Germany under the name of "Goringen." It was at first supposed that the bulb of this lovely flower was edible, an idea which at the period of its early introduction greatly retarded its cultivation; so at least we learn from a recent remark on the subject in a foreign journal: as also that two of the most enthusiastic of the Parisian amateurs of the present day, Messrs. Chereau and Dr. Marjolin, have been known to expend in one single year 1800 francs each in the purchase of dahlias.—Gardener's Gazette.

THE PERIODIC SHOOTING STARS. The attention of astronomers and observers should be devoted to-morrow evening, being the thirteenth of November, to those singular meteoricities, the periodic rains of which about that and the 13th of this month have for the last few years excited much notice. The singularity of their regular appearance on the nights in question first excited attention in the United States of America, and their return have since been carefully noticed by astronomers in France and England. Their appearance in this country is not so vivid as in France, but they present a singular phenomenon of stars running in constant succession through the night in the direction of the constellation Leo, or from W. to N. W. in the heavens, but their brilliancy will depend more or less upon the state of the evening. In some parts of France they were regarded as to excite the wonder and alarm of the poorer orders of the people, having the appearance of a rain of fire; and in London it was one of those panics which, with the aurora borealis, gave rise to various false alarms of fire. M. Arago conjectures that from the phenomena and curious appearances which they present, a large planet at some former time was broken into several thousand pieces when it was in the position which the earth occupied on the 13th November, and that probably those pieces flew each other in the same manner as the particles composing the tails of planetary bodies. The neighbouring sites of France, viz. hill and Greenwich will be the best and clearest spots for those in London to witness those singular appearances, which will probably be visible between ten o'clock in the evening and five in the morning.—Pitt.

DISCOVERIES IN NEW HOLLAND.—Two interesting travellers, Mr. Myers, Grey and Lushington, have lately made an attempt to explore the interior of this immense island, but were stopped by the unapproachable hostility of the natives, after penetrating about seventy miles. Limited as was this advance, it has led to the discovery of a highly curious nature, Mr. Grey having found numerous ethnological paintings, presumed to be the work of the Aborigines, which evince considerable knowledge of effect. As a consequence of this, he addresses some representations of the human form, made apparently in the manner of a coat on the surface of the rock, and painted black, whilst the surrounding part is colored white. From these paintings, and a variety of collateral proofs which he says he has collected, Mr. Grey is led to infer that the natives on this part of the coast are of Asiatic descent; a conjecture, indeed, rendered extremely probable, when we consider that the islands of the East India Archipelago form a series of steps, as it were, from the Oriental Continent to Australia.—Ibid.

ÆTNA AND VULCANUS.—The eruption of Mount Ætna, as we learn by a letter from Naples, continues with great violence. It appears to have attained its height on September 20th, but a severe burst came forth at six in the morning of the 20th, and excited great alarm, it appears, however, that no serious consequences have ensued. Vulcanus is perfectly quiet.—Ibid.

Fossil remains from the Humber Mountains were sold by auction, on Tuesday, by Messrs. Stevens. Among the lots, and their prices, were the following:—skull of the lower jaw, containing two molars of the mustelin, symphysis perfect, 1*l*. 12s.; a portion of the skull, with upper jaw, containing four molars; a very fine and perfect specimen 2*l*.; the left ramus of the lower jaw, of gigantic dimensions, with two molars, 2*l*.; the right ramus of ditto, with ditto, apparently of the same individual, 2*l*. 2s.; the cranium, with sockets for two molars, length from occiput to end of snout of skull, 44 inches; diameter across at widest, 28 inches; girth at occiput, 91 inches; weight upwards of half a ton, 135*l*. 6s.; the lower jaws of a young hippopotamus, with the teeth very perfect. 2*l*.; a very fine specimen of the lower jaw of a ruminant, 2*l*. 10s. Lord Brougham attended the sale.—Ibid.

Renewed experiments on the Turpids by M. Muticaci have confirmed opinions that all parts of the brain do not produce equal quantities of electricity; for instance the fourth lobe cannot be touched without exciting discharge, and the effect continues after the death of the animal; this lobe taken away, all discharge ceases.—Ibid.

SATELITES.—M. Deccuppi, with a telescope of Courtois, has, with the astronomers of the Roman College, lately distinguished five rings round Saturn, and counted seven satellites; the distances of which from the planet may be represented by 1, 2, 4, 8, 16—64; so that there is a great interval (perhaps to be filled up by fresh observations) between the two last.—Athenæum.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Elizabeth Ernestine Thürk died on the 22nd ult. at Vienna, having attained the great age of 118. She entered a family as a servant when only eleven years old, and remained in it till her death, seeing two out of the three generations in it pass away. She was never married, and preserved her intellectual faculties to the last moment of her life.—Pitt.

DEATH OF JOHN PHILIP WOOD, ESQ.—We regret to record the death of this distinguished and excellent individual. Mr. Wood was deaf and dumb from his infancy, and yet attached to no mean eminence as an author. His History of the Parish of Cranford, his Life of John Lee, of Laureston, and his edition of Pope's's Perceage of Scotland, have placed his name in a high rank as an antiquary, geologist, and lexicographer. Mining research and several secret marks were paid by him. He was devoted from an old and respectable family in the parish of Cranford, and he held the office of Archdeacon of Exeter in Scotland, the duties of which he discharged with fidelity and success.—Edinburgh Weekly Chronicle.

NEW COLLEGE AT BATH.—The inhabitants of Bath are about to cause to be erected, on the highest part of this city, a new college, to be called Queen's College. It is to be in connexion with the University of Oxford and Cambridge, and the routine of study is to include every branch of learning and science taught there. The project is to be carried into effect by transferable shares of 10*l*. each, bearing five per cent. interest. The designs and plans for the building are preparing under the direction of Mr. Mansers.—Bath Gazette.

RAILWAY FROM ENGLAND TO SCOTLAND.—We before stated that the summit level, in passing the Lammernuir Hills, was only 270 feet above the sea; but the report informs us that this elevation may be reduced 30 or 40 feet by cutting, leaving the summit only 240 feet above the sea. The project has been received with a degree of favour, which shows that its importance is appreciated. A line of communication which would bring Newcastle within four hours, and London within sixteen hours' travelling of Edinburgh, would be productive of vast advantage to Scotland.—Stretton.

ANTIQUITY OF CABINET DINNERS.—Theobald says, that when the Germans wished to reconcile enemies, elect chiefs, make alliances, or treat of peace and war, they took counsel during their repast; "for the mind," he remarks, "is then most open to the impression of simple truths, and easily excited to great undertakings."—Pitt.

CHATEAUVERT.—The conservatory now building by Sir Jeffry Wyattville is 360 feet long, by 160 feet wide, in height 60 feet.—Ibid.

A Chinese Artist has lately painted a series of six pictures, to illustrate the effect of opium-smoking, after the manner, and with a similar moral, to Hogarth's "Bake's Progress."—Ibid.

TEXAS.—The Government and Republic of Texas have formally withdrawn their application to be admitted into the union of the United States.—Ibid.

AMSTERDAM, Nov. 5.—Cotton manufactories are going to be established in the province of Zealand, on account of the Commercial Company. These useful establishments will afford employment to many poor industrious persons, who now find it difficult to obtain subsistence.—Ibid.

M. Victor Hugo, according to the press, has sold M. Delloye, the publisher, for 240,000 francs, the right of printing his works for ten years; and, by the terms of the agreement, has received half of this money down. The Moniteur Parisien says that the price agreed on is 200,000 francs, and that M. Delloye intends to apply this sum, which he had previously adopted in the case of M. de Chateaubriand, still more extensively. Good news for popular authors!—Paris Paper.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.—On Monday evening fifty of the senior scholars of Christ's Hospital went by invitation to Sir J. South's observatory at Kensington to view the comet. Sir James devoted the whole evening to them, and kindly gave them every instruction that the time allowed in regard to astronomical observations and the various powers and uses of his telescope. This is a second instance of that gentleman's attention to the scholars of Christ's Hospital; as, on the appearance of the last comet, he devoted an evening to the instruction of an equal number of their body, and encouraged, as on Monday last, to excite and increase in their minds a love of that science, to the pursuit of which he has so ardently and so successfully attached himself. Sir James did not forget that five or six hours of astronomical observation in the keen air of Kensington-hill might produce an appetite in young stomachs, and that an old English supper of roast beef would not be unacceptable. He had made, therefore, a liberal provision for it; and, as his youthful visitors, after partaking of it with great gusto, and singing "God save the Queen," returned to their venerable foundation highly delighted with their visit.—Pat.

GAMBLING IN ST. JAMES'S.—A meeting of the vestry of this parish was held last week, at which Mr. J. Branscomb, churchwarden, presided; and it was resolved, upon the motion of Mr. Fuller, seconded by Mr. A. Breckett, "that a committee be appointed to collect facts as to the number and nature of the gambling-houses in this parish, and to draw up a memorial to be presented with the approbation of this board, to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, setting forth the alarming and daring extent to which the vice of gambling is now carried on, the inadequacy of the present law to repress the same, and praying that the Government would be pleased to obtain from the Legislature sufficient powers, to enable this board to suppress those places of infamous resort."—Pat. Nov. 8.

VALUE OF A LION.—A lion was sold by auction at Liverpool, last week, for 160*l.*—Ibid.

A GENTLEMAN.—Civility is neither in birth, manner, nor fashion, but in the mind. A high sense of honour—a determination never to take a mean advantage of another—an adherence to truth, delicacy, and politeness towards those with whom you may have dealings—are the essential and distinguishing characteristics of a gentleman.

PRIVILEGE OF A QUEEN'S PAGE.—It was decided in the Queen's Bench, on Thursday, in the case of Pocock, one of the Queen's pages, that he should be held required on the Sovereign, he could not be held in arrest for debt.—Pat. Nov. 12.

ACADEMICAL HONORS.—The College at Amherst, at its recent commencement, conferred the degree of D.D. on the Rev. John Harris, the author of "Mammun," and Theological Tutor of Chebucto college.—Pat.

A FRIEND, LL.D.—Among the degrees conferred at the late commencement at Brown University, was that of LL.D. on Joseph John Gurney, the Quaker minister from England.—New York Emancipator.

Thorwaldsen, the Danish sculptor, has received from the King the order of Daneburg, with the title of Excellency. He has undertaken a monument to Goethe for Frankfurt, the poet's native city.—Pat.

THE KING OF BAVARIA.—We have received letter from Rhenish Bavaria, announcing that on the 29th ult. the teachers and schoolmasters of the district of Landau had been summoned before the land-commissioner, who communicated to them a royal rescript, enjoining that hereafter they should abstain, 1st, from wearing hats and whiskers; 2nd, from carrying watches, chains, trinkets, keys, &c.; 3rd, from dressing too richly; and 4th, from frequenting fairs and coffee-houses. An article of the rescript enjoining the land-commissioner to lose no time in applying the teachers and schoolmasters of these measures, and authorizes him to suspend from their functions such as should not comply therewith in the delay of three days. "The monasteries," says our correspondent, "have been astonished by the Bavarian Duke, because he wears them himself. Those who follow his example are sure of obtaining favours and promotion, provided, however, the monasteries be shaped like his own. But beads and whisks are abandoned by the Court, and regarded as revolutionary emblems which cannot be tolerated without danger for the monarchy."—Commer du Bas Rhin.

RENEWAL PROPERTY!—STURGEON L.M. Oct. 26.—The Dry-light All-hands has lately published the following statement:—"Some weeks ago a small boat, with forty-five men, women, and children, arrived at Grischam (in this province). They were nearly half naked, and had nothing left to subsist on but a few potatoes and a little salt. They had all fled from one of the ancient Swedish possessions in Livonia, where they were treated in the most inhuman manner by their lord—a Count or Baron Stuckenberg. They spoke in the old Swedish language, and were ready to sacrifice any thing if they were sent back to Russia. They were not only constantly beaten before and after meals, but twice a week getting one thing or another in treatment, they say, began when the children were between nine and ten years of age. They did not obtain permission to remain here, but a week after their arrival, were sent, by order of the Government, to Finland, where they were immediately sent to prison."—Pat.

PROPOSED BILL FOR STRAW-VEHICLES.—The merits of a bill to be brought before Parliament have been a subject, by which it is proposed that "all vessels engaged in the conveyance of passengers by water, when employed by any other means than sails or manual labour," shall not be employed without a licence, apportioned in the price to every four miles, nor without paying a duty "for and in respect of every passenger, at and after the rate of  $\frac{1}{4}$ d. for every four miles, or fraction of four miles."—Ibid.

The late Rev. Robert Hall's Works are about to be re-published in six monthly volumes, smaller than those which form the present standard edition, at  $\frac{1}{4}$ s. each.—Ibid.

PARIS, Nov. 7.—The Slavery Question is still one of interest. The friends of emancipation in France are with enthusiasm the results which have been obtained by the British Government, and are actively at work for agitation in the next session, when it will be brought forward with all the influence which the example of England has furnished. This will be one of the most interesting questions for the deputies, and is likely to occupy a large portion of their time. The movement in favour of an electoral reform, begun by the National Guards, is very rapidly gaining ground in the province.—Ibid.

AMERICAN ANTIQUITIES.—The historian and the antiquary are alike interested by recent communications from Mexico, which state that the owner of some farm, lands in the State of Morelia, to the north of Durango, has discovered a grove, in which a thousand dead bodies are deposited. They appear to have been grouped in distinct families, and buried at different periods and ages, as the groups are composed of both young and old, all being enveloped in clothes which resemble, though imperfectly, the mode of treatment peculiar to Egyptian mummies. The clothes are fine in texture of various colours, and remarkable for a high state of preservation.—Ibid.

EXTRAORDINARY LONGEVITY.—The Vienne Gazette announces the death, at Erastuburg, in Lower Austria, of a day-labourer, named Danberger, at the extraordinary age of 130 years. He was born in 1708, at Zieritz, in Moravia. He served in the time of Charles VI., under Prince Eugene of Savoy. He never married till he was 100 years old, and from July, 1829, was a pensioner on the Emperor's privy purse.

IRISH REAPERS.—The Irish reapers, who have finished their harvest work, are proceeding in thousands to their homes, per the Belfast steamers, from Glasgow. On Tuesday morning about fifteen hundred went off in the Enterprise, and several hundred in another steamer. It is a rule that they surrender their shillelahs and books, knives, &c., to be locked up till they land. The more belligerent amongst them yielded with reluctance, and were not convinced of the propriety of the measure until satisfied that there was not sufficient room on board for a good fight. — Glasgow Paper.

SAVINGS IN SWEET WHEAT.—It has been stated that if ditching wheat, as practiced in Norfolk, Suffolk, and some other counties, was generally adopted, full 10,000,000 bushels of seed might be saved on the 4,000,000 acres of wheat grown annually in England and Scotland; and, allowing eight bushels to each person, would support 1,250,000 persons, who, if employed in weeding the crops, might double this. — Past.

ANCIENT OAK.—Some time ago an immense oak tree was excavated from a moss in the neighbourhood of Egleham. It is about 100 feet in circumference, and about 60 feet in length. It has been refit through the middle, so that what is found appeared only as a portion of a much larger trunk. No oak trees are now found in this locality, so it may be regarded as a remnant of the ancient Caledonian Forest. — Scottish Pilot.

ROME, NOV. 1.—The coronation of the Emperor of Austria has been followed, among other acts of liberality, by the restoration to the Knights of Malta of the estates which had been seized to the dominions of the Crown, with permission to establish new commendaries by voluntary contributions. The military subject of the order has long ceased to have any influence. The care of the sick, as the earliest object of the first Knights at Jerusalem, has been lately revived, and they have founded hospitals for this purpose both here and in some other cities. The restoration of the estates in Lombardy is of the more importance, as the other Italian states may be thereby induced to give back to the order the property in their possession. France possesses the richest commendaries, which it may be difficult for the order to recover. — Past.

ST. PETERSBURG, Oct. 31.—Russia is of all the European nations the one which carries on the most extensive trade with China. Hitherto, however, her intercourse with that country was confined to exchanges. The Russians export thither cloths, furs, kinds of various descriptions, and specie. The Chinese give them in exchange tea, sugar, silks, nankeen, and other productions of the country. The quantity of tea yearly imported from China into Russia amounts to about 80,000 boxes, the value of which is rated at 50,000,000 roubles (4,000,000 £). The principal depots of that article are at Moscow, St. Petersburg, Nicholas Negoum, and Irbit. — Hamburg Correspondent.

WINKING AT A NEIGHBOUR'S EARRING.—There's been a good deal of laughing in New Orleans lately,—at least so says the New Orleans Phrygian,—(and nobody ever doubts the N. O. Phrygian), and Messrs. Snoddy and Doolittle of that city were the subjects. "I say, neighbour Snoddy, if you don't keep your nose out of my garden, dash my humdrums if I don't shoot 'em—that's all." "Very well, Master Doolittle, shoot away; only, if you kill any of my hens, throw 'em over into my yard." "Crack! Crack! went the old blunderbuss, morning after morning; and the great fat hens were pitched into neighbour Snoddy's yard like rain!" At last, after a fortnight or so, Mr. Doolittle discovered that Snoddy never had any hens; and that he, Doolittle, had been winking his own hens and tossing them over for Snoddy's pot. — Past.

ANIMAL IMPERMEABILITY.—Underneath one of the arches of the large timber bridge now erecting over Wellington-dean, for the Newcastle and North Shields Railway, a temporary blacksmith's shop is erected, in which an eccentric old character, named Warble, usually works. A few days ago, during the high water, a large three-inch plank slipped through the timbers from the top of the arch, a distance of 80 feet, and entering through the roof of the shop where the old man was at work, fell endways on the shaft of the hammer with which he was at the time beating a piece of heated iron. The hammer-head was broken in two, leaving the end of it in his hands. A young lad stood amazed at the miraculous escape of the old man, whilst he coolly took up another hammer and recommenced beating the iron, unwilling to lose his heat. On being congratulated on not having been knocked to atoms by the large plank, he very innocently exclaimed, "Ay, mister; but a wiles is a good as a mile."

GRAPE DUTY.—The growers of grapes in this country seem not to be aware of the enormous importation of grapes from Spain and Portugal. We saw, yesterday, at a grocer's door in the Market-place, no less a quantity than 45 cwt. of grapes just received. The grape-growers, like the cut-growers, have just endeavoured to protect themselves by a duty which amounts to nearly 50 per cent. on the price paid to the grower in Spain. This heavy duty is found insufficient, as the fact we have stated shows. It is true that persons in the middle classes may have a handsome desert for a couple of shillings; but are their comforts to be promoted at the expense of the home-grape-growers? See what a destruction of capital invested in glass and flues will take place! — Manchester Times.

HONOURS OF THE SLAVE TRADE IN 1638.

Our readers will probably recollect, that, some three or four months ago, a rascal appeared in the papers of the killing of some negroes on board a captured slave, as food for the rest. Accompanied as the public had become to the horrors of the slave-trade, there were few who could give credence to this mischievous enormity. It turns out, however, to be true, that an African was thus deliberately murdered. His hands were first seized, and held behind him; his feet were then seized, and bent backwards; and his head being thus thrown on a hick, his throat was immediately cut—the poor fellow having only time to call out to his sister who was within hearing, "Sobola, them da kill me!" His body was "slit open," like a bull-calf's, that night and hung up till the morning, when part of it was baked with rice for the slaves' dinner; and some of them were beaten to death because they would not eat it! Such are the heart-rending facts, of which there is now no doubt whatever, since the matter has been fully investigated by two Magistrates in Jamaica under the direction of the Colonial Office; and they are facts for the country deeply to ponder.

We had heard before, that slaves were chained and ships, that they were reckless how many of their victims perished by confinement and starvation, and that they drove them seaward by hundreds to secure their own impunity; we knew that their trade was greedy and murder, but we did not know that it was literally that of a butcher. We knew that the African in their hands was deemed to exhaust his strength in unrepentant toil, and that his blood might be shed by a miller's lathe, or a miller's mill; but we did not know that his blood was shed as for the shambles, for his carcass to be cut up by the knife of the butcher, and his limbs to be carried into beef for his fellow-captives. This is new. Hear us, Englishmen, when we ask only one question, is this to be endured? — British Emancipator.

DRENKKNEN.—On Friday morning a man named Gillet, a bricklayer's labourer, was received into St. George's Hospital, dreadfully injured, having been knocked down and run over by a horse and cart, while crossing Bolton-street in a state of intoxication. He is not expected to recover. — On Friday, at the Town Hall, Southwark, an elderly man of the name of James McGowan, was charged with being found drunk and asleep, on taking care of himself at two in the morning. The charge having been fully proved, an officer said he was sorry to observe that the defendant had within the last four or five years become so incontinent a drinker as to have turned himself. When he first knew him he was a highly respectable salesman in the Borough-market, and was the owner of two first-rate houses in the parish, and he was going on making money, when suddenly he took to drinking, and in a short time his business went away, he sold his houses, and became what he now appeared—a poor distressed man. He was committed in default of paying the usual fine.

TEMPERANCE SOCIETIES IN AMERICA.—At a meeting of the Ashmoleen Society at Oxford, last week, a Mr. Delaval, of Ballston, New York, gave a sketch of the rise and progress of temperance societies in the United States, and of the immense change which they have wrought in society. In one state, he asserted his hearers, where there had been one thousand three hundred distilleries, there were now two hundred. In agricultural districts nine-tenths of the farmers drink only water, and were becoming quite rich by selling their cattle on the apples of which they used to make cider. Insurance companies would insure vessels which did not carry spirits, 5 per cent. lower than others. Whole states had taken up the temperance cause, and laws were prohibited the sale of intoxicating liquors. The State of Massachusetts had recently enacted that no intoxicating liquor should be sold in a less quantity than 15 gallons, with the exception of what was wanted medicinally; for which purpose people were appointed, in the ratio of 1 to 2,000, to sell on medical certificates. Temperance and Connecticut had also made prohibitory enactments. — Literary Gazette.

SOUTH AUSTRALIA.—On Wednesday week, the ship Christina sailed from Greenock for South Australia, with sixty passengers, besides a large cargo of goods. It was found impossible to take all the goods and passengers' luggage laid down for the vessel. The emigrants for this ship are of the most respectable and wealthy class, and take out an immense capital with them in goods and money. — Scottish Guardian.

THE MAGISTRACY.—We recommend to the attentive perusal of those who take an interest in the improvement of the Police, an able letter, signed Cannopolite, which we publish this day. The observations of our Correspondent are the result of a long series of successful labours in the Magisterial department. The fact which he discloses, of the existence throughout India, of established castes, and organized bodies of robbers,—and of which the truth will not be questioned by any, who are acquainted with the discoveries which have been made by Major Sleeman and his establishment, while engaged in the suppression of Thuggee,—points out the necessity of a more vigorous effort than has been made by the established Police. At various periods of our administration, when the multiplication of Dacoities had appeared to endanger the existence of society, Government has adopted extraordinary measures for the suppression of this crime. Of this nature was the severe remedy embraced about sixty years ago, when it was ordained, that the family of the convicted Dacoit should be sold as slaves, and which was abrogated by the progress of more liberal notions regarding personal liberty. In the same class may also be placed the vigorous efforts made about thirty years ago, to suppress the crime in Kishnaghar and the neighbouring districts. Those exertions which have been made when the tide of crime seemed to rise beyond its usual limits, have been relinquished when the immediate object was gained, and the established Police of the country has been left to cope, by ordinary means, with the elements of crime. But a period has now arrived, when another vigorous effort appears to be required of the executive authorities of the State. Partly through the gradually increasing inefficiency of the Magistracy, owing to the addition of labours foreign to its functions; partly through the severity by which Dacoits have been emboldened, the crime of Dacoity has increased to an extent which reflects the highest discredit on our rule. Happily, just at this time, there happens to exist in full vigour an organized body of functionaries, who were called into operation for the suppression of crime, in a peculiar and most abhorrent form; and which has most effectually succeeded in eradicating it. The existence of Major Sleeman's establishment has always appeared to us to point out the simplest and most effectual plan for the suppression of Dacoity. We are happy to see our Correspondent so entirely coincide with this opinion. We are still more rejoiced to find that it has been adopted and acted on by the highest authority in the State; and that Lord Auckland has already appointed Major Sleeman, Superintendent General for the suppression of Dacoity, in the Western Provinces. Under the ubiquitous operation of his system, there can be little doubt, that the crime will soon cease to exist in the provinces which have been happily committed to his superintendence. But why should not Bengal and the Lower Provinces come in for a share of His Lordship's lenigant consideration? This kingdom is overrun with organized robbers; their courage gains strength from the comparative impunity they enjoy; yet their numbers cannot exceed those of the Thugs throughout India, with whom Major Sleeman has dealt so summarily and effectually. Why should not Bengal then be blessed with two or three years of such exertions for the entire suppression of this crime?

Our Correspondent is anxious to draw forth, and apply to the exigencies of the country, whatever appears advisable and harmonious in the plans, both of the Committee and of Mr. Halliday; and in this feeling he is seconded by every well-wisher of the country. It will be cause of deep regret, if at the time when public attention is at home and in this country, has been directed to an especial degree to the enormous evils of the existing system, relief should be retarded by a want of unanimity, relative to the most appropriate remedy. No paternal love of system should be allowed to weaken those feelings of benevolence, which the deplorable condition of the country cannot fail to inspire. The evils with which we have to combat, have grown to a portentous magnitude; and we cannot afford to reduce our capacity for removing them, by any display of sentiment. Let there be but an actual commencement of reform, and we shall soon see a progress in reconciling the differences of the two systems. Separating those parts on which there appears to exist the greatest contrariety of opinion, from those, in which there appears to be a more friendly approximation of views, let the latter be instantly reduced to practice, and the working of the new system will turn up original information, upon which to correct our judgment respecting those points which are in debate.

Our Correspondent alludes to two descriptions of transgressors; those who are found in organized bands, and live by the ruin of others; and those who are casually drawn into crime. He has exhibited a third species of Dacoity, far more destructive to the people than either of the others. We allude to the Thamachars and their minions. Through the inefficiency of our present system of control, the natural propensity of man to abuse power has been stretched to its utmost extent by our own Native Officers; and their visits are more dreaded than those of the robbers who precede them. To curb their license, to restrain their operations, and to inspire the people with a confidence of relief from both descriptions of foes, we need the Assistant Magistrate, within a limited circle,—a European, all the better. This European Magistrate, with stationary habits and local views, not subject to an annual removal, not bowed to the ground by fiscal duties, not overpowered by a sense of the magnitude of his jurisdiction, will be the necessary power of peace to the people, and the terror of guilty Dacoits and Darogahs. He will be enabled to collect such a fund of statistical observations, as will enable us happily to take a second step in reform. And the appointment of these officers, so far from interfering with the operations of the establishment for the suppression of Dacoity, will prove its most efficient auxiliary.

PROGRESS OF AFFAIRS IN SCINDA.—The last intelligence from Scinda is highly favourable. The Amer of Hyderabad, who had strenuously resisted the overtures of the British Government, and refused a passage to our troops, has been reduced to reason, without the necessity of bloodshed. He has agreed to grant us the free navigation of the Indus, to pay down twenty-seven lakhs of Rupees towards the expenses of Shah Shujah's contingent, and to receive a subsidiary force of five thousand British troops. His previous rejection of the terms proposed by our Government, was evidently the result of a secret combination with the powers beyond the Indus, from whom he expected succour. His unconditional submission, on the approach of our troops, is likely, therefore, to produce a favourable impression in Afghanistan, and by confirming the dread of our power, to smooth the path of future operations." It is an auspicious circumstance, that the progress of our troops northward from the sea, and southward from Ferropore, through the territory of independent and jealous powers, situated on the left bank of the Indus, has been accomplished without the necessity of firing a shot, with the exception of a broadside or two from the Wyllesley, at one of the mouths of that river. This uninterrupted advance must serve to deepen among European nations, the idea of our supremacy in India.

The Indus may now be considered as emphatically our boundary. The oldest Mahomedan conquest in India is brought into a state of dependent alliance with us. Our paramount authority has now been extended among the tribes on the Indus, who have never yet acknowledged it; and they are linked with the association of states over which the genius of Great Britain presides. But for the circumstances which have constrained us to take up an advanced position beyond the Indus, we question whether the footing we have now gained on its banks could have been acquired for years to come. This may, therefore, be deemed an important collateral result of the present movement. It will remain for us to improve the advantages which have thus been gained, by making the line of this river an effective line of defence. With the entire command of that river, and with the Steamers which the Court of Directors are said to have destined for its navigation, nothing will be wanting but a free passage through Egypt, to enable us to transport a body of European troops from Falmouth to the Punjab, in less than ten weeks. The countries on both sides the Indus which have so long been the victims of misery, will now commence a new existence; an interchange of commodities will bring in its train industry and plenty; and the seeds of civilization will be sown and matured by this association with the foremost of civilized nations. With the free navigation of the Indus, under a British guarantee, why should we not expect, in a few years, that it will exhibit the same appearance of life and activity which the Ganges does? The vast regions of Central Asia, especially if a paramount British influence can once be established among them, will present a magnificent field for commercial enterprize. The Indus is the nearest route by which the manufactures and productions of Europe can be thrown into them; and where security has been established, commerce will not fail to follow. Whether we view the present course of events, therefore, in a commercial, a political, or a moral point of view, they must be considered as forming a new era in the history of these extensive territories, and as the first step towards bringing them within the pale of modern civilized associations.

DEATH OF KALEEDAS PUNDIT.—The death of this remarkable man, with whom we have been acquainted for more than twenty years, occurred about ten days ago; and we cannot but think that, considering his peculiar acquirements, a brief notice of his career will not be deemed foreign to the character of this journal. His father, a Pundit of no little celebrity in his day, early applied himself to the study of Astronomy, a science almost extinct in Bengal; and after a careful examination of the Siddhantas, adopted the system laid down in them, to the rejection of the wild and fantastic theories of the Pooras. He was the literary associate of the earliest of our Oriental literati, Sir William Jones and Mr. Wilkins; and an astronomical globe, with which he was presented by the former, he continued to preserve as an heirloom in his family. His son, Kaleedas, was early initiated into the same studies, and enjoyed, moreover, the advantage of a free intercourse with Mr. Reuben Barrow, whose astronomical researches are so well known in India. Like his father, he adhered to the system of the Siddhantas, which he always maintained to be the only correct system which the Hindoos possessed. He was, notwithstanding, a rigid, if not a bigotted Hindoo, and never allowed the truth of the Pooras to be called in question. We have often been amused, in the course of conversation, to observe the struggle in his mind between a regard for the great truths of astronomical science unfolded in the Siddhantas, and a submissive veneration for the current Shastras, of which he was obliged to repudiate the fabulous astronomy; and the various contrivances by which he endeavoured to reconcile these conflicting authorities, have often inspired pity for the victims of popular superstition.

Though our Pundit was, without question, the greatest Hindoo astronomer in Bengal, his scientific acquirement were made subservient to the puerilities of astrology; and yet we do not believe that he was ever convinced of the fallacy of his astrological calculations. Like many great men in our own land, he was firmly persuaded that the heavenly bodies exerted a distinct and visible influence on human actions; and he was consulted on all occasions by the great and wealthy Natives in Calcutta. His reputation was very extensive. When a child was born, he was called in to cast its nativity, and to draw up a prophetic scroll of the good or evil which lay in its path. He held in his possession the horoscope of not a few of the most influential members of Native society in Calcutta; and upon the return of every new year, regularly prepared a schedule of the events which were likely to happen to them; which he proceeded to present in person, and for which he always received a handsome fee. The rich Native, acting upon the principle, that "forewarned is forearmed," prepared himself without delay to encounter and to avert the inauspicious influences of the stars, by acts of propitiation, and by gifts to Brahmans; and one rich—we had almost said enlightened,—Native of our acquaintance, finding on one occasion the benignity of the celestial influences greatly outweighed by their malignity, determined to propitiate the whole body by a series of propitiatory services, which cost him two thousand Rupees. This was the year preceding the great failures.

The old man had reached his seventieth year. He resided latterly at his family house, about thirty-five miles distant from the river. His son, on giving us the intelligent of his last moments, described them as the most happy and cheering which a Hindoo could desire; and as a sure indication of the great stock of merit which he had been enabled to accumulate during his life. For, said he, My father had just caused the Pooras to be read, as an act of religious merit, and his strength was sustained till the last leaf was folded up, when he began to feel the approach of death. The physicians were consulted, and advised that he should bathe in the holy stream, which was a delicate mode of announcing the extremity of his case. A palankeen was provided, and his son proceeded with him to the Ganges; and no sooner had he obtained a sight of it, and tasted its waters, than he said, Lay me on its banks: This is the most favorable hour for the last journey: I have just tasted the waters of the sacred Ganges; the sun has begun his journey to the north; the moon is now on the increase; it is day and not night. Every auspicious omen is combined on this period. Now let me depart. His son had no sooner begun the ceremonies for the purging soul, than the old man expired. Such was the hope in death of one of the most scientific and enlightened of the Hindoos.

SCIENTIFIC AGRICULTURAL EDUCATION.—A small pen-

pamphlet on this subject, has been printed for private circulation by Mr. Piddington, who has obligingly favoured us with a copy. The subject is itself well worthy of attention; and although the present tract is not published in the ordinary mode, we suppose the author is desirous it should be generally examined and attended to. His essay is employed in illustrating three main points. 1st. That India possesses largely the means of agricultural wealth; 2d. That those means are deplorably wasted; and, lastly, that incorporating scientific Agricultural instruction with the system of Public Education, would have the best effect in remedying the existing evil. Neither of these positions, we imagine, could be disputed. They might all be urged with infinitely greater evidence and force, than the limits of Mr. Piddington's pamphlet have allowed him to apply to them.

The chief means of agricultural prosperity spoken of by our author, is the great amount of capital embarked in the raising of agricultural produce. For Indigo and other articles in demand for the Europe market, he estimates that capital to the extent of ten millions of Rupees is annually advanced chiefly by Europeans. But this he considers as only "a petty fraction" of the entire capital annually applied to agricultural purposes; and we have no doubt of the fact. The plain inference is, that were this incalculable amount of capital well and wisely applied, there need be neither want and misery amongst the people, nor contracted revenue for the Government. But another inference, it appears to us, must be equally just—that, with all the ignorance and folly existing, a fair return is nevertheless obtained for the use of so much capital. Otherwise a few years would exhaust it. It cannot be denied that so much capital might procure far greater returns; and, therefore, a better use of it is highly desirable. At the same time much of the present misery of our agriculturists arises from the unequal division of profits between capitalist and labourer. The evil is complicated; and so must be the remedy. No one scheme will be found a panacea for the varied wretchedness of our people.

The conclusion to which Mr. Piddington's argument would lead, is not distinctly specified; but we take it to be the institution of an Agricultural Professorship in the Hindu College. He complains very justly of the want of a distinct and palpable practical good, as the recognized object of the education bestowed on Native youth. At present, he observes, it would be, perhaps, puzzling to the most enlightened Natives, who do not themselves speak and read English, to say what are the direct and tangible advantages to be expected from the 'Europe learning.' Many know that it strikes at the root of their religious belief. Many know that it enables their children to read the English books, to explain some of the phenomena of nature; and to use some of our strange instruments. All, too, have probably a vague notion that this knowledge, establishing a sort of community of feeling between their children and the European gentlemen, may be advantageous when they become competitors with others for place. But assuredly not one suspects that we possess an order of sciences which might exert a great and beneficial influence upon their worldly and our financial prosperity, and place them far above that curse of every respectable Native youth, the necessity of looking to Unaidedness, or place-hunting, for future support—and that these sciences are kept carefully locked up from them. The course of instruction proposed by Mr. Piddington would help to change this. Besides its own natural result in respect of the agricultural interests, it would create a greater partiality to the whole system of education with which it was combined. We should be glad, therefore, to find his suggestion attended to, and an Agricultural class formed in the Hindu or the Hooghly College, or in both.

Yet, notwithstanding the examples produced of such Professorships in other countries, we could consider them as only feeble means for accomplishing the great object in view. The students of our Colleges will, in many instances, be our future Zemindars; and certainly it is of vast importance to raise agriculture in their estimation, and open up its resources to their view. But none of them will be farmers; and without a corresponding elevation of the farmers, the agricultural instruction and zeal of the landlords will be of small avail, nay, often worse than profitless. Verbal education must be brought within the reach of all our peasantry, and agricultural information form a part of it, before much good is to be expected from educational means. Experience shows that more effective means may be had. In all England and Scotland, we believe, there are not above a couple of Professors of Agriculture; and yet Agriculture has made amazing progress there in the last fifty years. A number of causes have contributed to it: of which, however, the great spring has been, interest. Landlords and farmers have been compelled to keep abreast of the other divisions of the community in the race of industry and invention—or rather, perhaps, to draw after the manufacturers with sufficient speed to prevent their own ruin. In doing so, they have resorted to the facilities offered by combination, in general and local associations, and by bringing a portion of the press into their service. We imagine fifty Agricultural Societies may be found for one Professor, and each of them doing fifty times the good that any Professor could accomplish. The Societies supply an infinitude of motives and impulses, besides eliciting and spreading information, which is nearly all a Professor can do. In this country we have seen a little of the advantage of the same course. Our Agricultural Society, in horticulture, found a sphere in which they and the Native gardeners had a common interest. They have, therefore, found the means of beneficial co-operation; and the result is the subject of universal admiration. If the Society could, from generosity, devote their attention as earnestly to the general interests of Agriculture, as, from interest, they have already done to furnishing vegetables for their tables, they would soon effect wonders which would eclipse all their Town Hall exhibitions. Indeed, we comfort ourselves with the assurance, that before long, generosity will have little to do in the business. Every year, a greater number of European and East India gentlemen are becoming bound to the soil of India, in the possession of factories and estates; and what is equally good, Native capitalists are embarking as principals in the factories and establishments connected with our foreign commerce; and from these two classes, we hope to see the Agricultural Society made effective, by the gradual substitution of persons of various avocations and characters, united by common interests, and urged by the real incentives of necessity and profit, instead of our present race of amateur amateurs. India is not about to sink into the irredeemable poverty and misery which some are foreboding. Her evils are daily becoming more prominent, as they are becoming more aggravated. There is a point,—not far off, we imagine,—when they must be remedied, either intentionally or unintentionally. And there are elements of good sufficient at work in the country to make us anticipate a happy issue. The body politic has its springs of constitutional vigour still. It will rally and live after all.

AGRA SCHOOL BOOK SOCIETY'S FIRST REPORT.—The Report of the Agra School Book Society we have placed among our selections. It will reward perusal. The Society has undertaken a service urgently required by the state of the North Western Provinces; and it has commenced its course with principles of the best character. Its regard is directed to the body of the people, and not to a favoured fraction of them. It prefers the quietest and most direct means of communication with them—their vernacular dialects. And it has wisely declined fettering itself with unnecessary and mischievous stipulations, on the important subject of religion. On all these points it commands our approbation. It has not yet had time to do much in the prosecution of its object: but it is not a little to have made a beginning, especially in the difficulties of the past year. What has been done appears to be judicious, and may be safely taken as an earnest of great good. We hope the Society will receive liberal support both from Government and the public, and daily increase in efficiency and usefulness.

THE MIDNAPUR TREASURERSHIP.—The Treasurership of the Midnapore Collectorate is the most persevering mendicant in the Lower Provinces, and ought certainly to be brought under the notice of the District Charitable Society. Within our editorial recollection, it has been several times or thrice a begging, and we perceive from an advertisement in the Calcutta Gazette, that it has been obliged again to throw itself on the charity of the public. Considering the eagerness of the Natives to finger the public money, it is somewhat singular that so much difficulty should arise in finding a man to take charge of the Government treasure in this district. There must be something peculiar in the circumstances of the case, to create such a phenomenon; and it is worth while to make search for the cause. The Treasurership of the District is a high sounding office; and from the amount of the security required, it might be supposed that its remuneration corresponded in some small proportion with its dignity. But though the advertisement has wisely concealed the amount of the salary, we happen to know that it is just fifty Rupees a month, and no more. Midnapore is a troublesome district; the people are litigious even beyond the higher averages of litigation, and as very slippery in all their transactions, that an honest man is not safe among them for any length of time. The smallness of the pay renders it impossible for any honest man to hold it; and the character of the people makes it extremely hazardous for any dishonest man to accept it. Hence, the difficulty of filling up the appointment. Security of fifty thousand Rupees; a salary of fifty Rupees a month, and a residence of three or four years in jail, if the Treasurer embraces the means which are so thickly scattered in his path of doubling the pittance—these are hard conditions of service, unworthy of a great and magnanimous Government. Even if an upright, hard working, honest Treasurer could be had for fifty Rupees a month, capable of giving the requisite security, Government should be above accepting his services at so humiliating a remuneration. We have heretofore lifted up our voice against these advertisements, which we can consider in no other light, than as a treacherous conspiracy of the Board of Revenue to bring the Government into contempt; and we must press the subject again on their consciences. The Natives laugh to scorn these little huckstering devices for saving a few pence which are so invariably defeated. There is nothing more expensive than these cheap bargains of service. The Natives are keen enough to perceive, that the man who can risk half a lakh of Rupees in the shape of security, would find no difficulty in providing the nominee with an allowance of fifty Rupees from his own purse, as it would be but little more than one per cent. interest on his money. They know that no man gives this security, but under the full assurance that the place is worth ten times the official salary, and that he shall be able to realize more than one per cent. on the capital he risks. The Natives feel, moreover, that for Government to exact honesty, under the severest penalty, at the same time that it takes away both the motive and the means of honesty,—is certainly to act a very equivocal example before its subjects; and we would venture to advise, if the salary is not to be increased, or the amount of security to be diminished, that an embargo be laid forthwith, and for ever, on these advertisements. It is not dis-eerect to present to the broad view of the people the more shameful parts of our administration.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 21.

Last night's Calcutta Gazette contains the largest batch of Civil Appointments which we have seen for an age; no fewer than forty-three; and the major part of them are senior boni-fide appointments, which looks as though Government had begun to be sensible of the great evil entailed on the country by an endless circle of officiating nominations.—Letters from Lahore state, the Maha Rajah Ranjot Singh has recovered from his late attack, but that General Allard had died at Peshawar, after an illness of a very few days. At so critical a period as the present, his loss must produce a decisive effect on the politics of the Punjab.—At the review at Dum-Dum yesterday, a melancholy accident killed the spectators and officers with gloom. A shell burst by accident, soon after leaving the howitzer, and a woman, a child, and eight men were severely wounded. Three have died, and the limbs of three others have been amputated.—An account was published some time ago of the plan of a scientific expedition which had been planned for the Eastern Archipelago, by Mr. Brooke. We now learn from the Herald, that he is the son of the late Mr. T. Brooke, for so many years First Judge of the Provincial Court of Appeal at Moorshedabad, the sudden death of whose two daughters, in the bloom of life, within three days of each other, about twenty years ago, cast such a gloom over the society at that station. The enterprising gentleman has employed the ample fortune left him by his father, in scientific researches. He was formerly an officer in the Company's Service; and in the Burmese War raised a small body of pony cavalry, in the command of which he was severely wounded, and obliged to retire to England.—The Committee of Public Instruction has purchased the house formerly built by General Perron, at Chinsurah, for the College, for the small sum of twenty thousand Rupees. Large additions are to be made to it, which, when completed, will render it one of the most magnificent buildings in India.—It is said, and we hope with truth, that Mr. James Sutherland succeeds Dr. Wise, as Principal of Himgilly College.—General Ventura, who has very recently landed at Bombay, on his return from Enzope, is proceeding with all speed to Lahore. Eighty cases of different European curiosities, intended for the Maha Rajah, have been sent to Calcutta.—The latest accounts from Raigun state, that a rebellion has just broken out in the southern provinces, headed by the Hiar Apparent, who it appears has not been put to death by Tharrawaddie. The Governor of Raigun has sent out a considerable force against him, but with little success. If this rebellion should gather strength, it may relieve us of the necessity of a Burmese war for a twelvemonth.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 22.

We perceive that Mr. James Thimason, late Secretary to Government in the North Western Provinces, has just embarked in the Windsor, for the Cape, in company with his family.—The Bombay papers are still crowded with the most angry observations on the conduct of the Government of India, in reference to the Bank. We see that the papers at Madras rather side with Bombay, but the Calcutta Press is unanimous in upholding the conduct of Government, by which the spirit of jobbing has been so effectually checked at the Presidency, on the present occasion.—The latest news from the ARMY OF THE INDUS, in Seinde, is that the Bombay troops had arrived within two days march of Hyderabad, the capital. The Ameer continued firm in his determination not to accede to the terms offered by the British Government, and not to allow a free passage to the troops. A large body of Beluchers have been assembled for the defence of Hyderabad; and it is said that fifteen thousand men were posted on the right bank of the river, in order to oppose Sir John Keane. He had determined, notwithstanding all opposition, to force his passage across, under cover of his cannon. We may expect, therefore, in a day or two, to hear of a sanguinary engagement. Two Brigades of the Bengal Army are pushing on from Bikhur to Hyderabad, having left their baggage and suit behind them.—The Englishman quotes an article from the Naval and Military Gazette, respecting the frightful mortality which swept away the troops in Aracan in 1825. On the 1st of October of that year, of 6,174 men, 3,638 were in hospital, and no fewer than 450 had died in the preceding month.—Mr. Harcourt, who stands appointed to the East Commission, has been obliged to proceed from the Isle of France to the Cape, for his health.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25.

The intelligence from the West of the Indus is of a more cheerful character than we have for some time received. Lord Evelyn, who is employed in collecting supplies, has received a message of the most friendly nature from the sister and Poor of Nizam Dild Khan. The former possesses ten lakhs of Rupees, which she wishes to secure by depositing it and herself under the protection of the English. The latter exercises extensive influence in Candahar, which will now be turned in our favour. Mehrab Khan, of Kheilat, has also evinced the most friendly disposition towards the English. The Bengal Army is described as in the highest spirits, and the health of the troops has improved ever since they marched from Peshawar.—The Honorary Chamber of Commerce has addressed a letter to Lord Auckland, the character of which may be judged from the fact, that the Government of India is enthusiastically designated 'the Government of Calcutta.'—Mr. J. P. Grant has been obliged, on account of ill health, to take a month's leave of absence. His duties will be performed, par interim, by Mr. Miller.—The Harkum of this evening has a very good article on the education of the young Nizam of Musoolahad. It appears that the lad's father, fully aware of the deficiencies of his own education, had determined on sending him to complete his studies in England; that arrangements were made for that purpose, which would have been completed without delay, but for his death. The Editor calls upon Government to fulfil the wishes of his father, and at once to determine on sending the young prince to England.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 25.

The intelligence received from Seinde, on Saturday, is highly satisfactory. The Amers of Seinde have shrunk from a collision with the British troops. While Sir John Keane was approaching the city of Hyderabad, the Chief gave in his unconditional acceptance of the terms proposed by the British Government. He has agreed to pay up twenty-seven lakhs of Rupees, to abolish the tolls on the Indus, and to open the navigation of that river, and to receive a subsidiary British force of 5,000 men. No obstacle now exists to the march of the Bombay troops through Seinde, and they will move up rapidly to Rooree, when it is expected the bridge will be complete by the time they can reach it.—A very gorgeous ceremonial, directed by the Mahab Rajah Seinde, at Gwalior, on the occasion of Col. Sutherland's departure, evinced the high esteem in which he is held by that prince. His Highness appeared deeply affected by his removal from a situation in which for four years he has afforded the highest satisfaction.—The Agra Ekbar just received, contains an article on the projected road from that station to Bombay, and a notice of the plan proposed by Col. Sutherland. We have transferred this important paper to our own columns.—The Delhi paper states, that Lieut. Pottinger is still at Herat, and on the best terms with Shah Kanran. There had been some misunderstanding between them, but it was amicably adjusted.—The Editorship of the Calcutta Courier has been bestowed on Capt. J. A. Currie, on a salary of 500 Rupees a month. The present Editor vacates his seat on the 1st of March. We learn from him, that the Management of the Military Orphan Society has most generously agreed to allow the sum of Fifty Rupees a month for a Reporter.—The last Quarterly Report of the Government Savings' Bank gives token of its progressive utility. In a little more than five years, the sums deposited have been a trifle short of thirty lakhs of Rupees; after all the withdrawals, the sum still at the credit of depositors, exceeds seventeen lakhs of Rupees.—The Portrait which the Native community voted of July William Henrich has arrived, and is now to be viewed at the office of Carr, Tagore and Co. Those who have seen it, describe it as a very striking likeness.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 25.

The Englishman states that some Nephews were arrested a few days ago at Benares, on whom were found letters to the States of Rajpootana. Another letter was taken to pieces by the bearer, as soon as he was discovered.—A meeting is to be held this evening, at the Town Hall, for the purpose of forming a Natives' Institute. Sir John P. Grant is expected to take the Chair.—Shares in the Bengal Bank, which have for nearly a month been stationary at a premium of 2000 Rupees, have a little improved. Several sales have been effected at 2150 Rs.—The departure of Major Wilkinson from Chota Nagpore for Nagpore, is deeply regretted by all the residents, both Native and European. To the Natives he has endeared himself by his unrelenting exertions for their improvement; to the Europeans, by the anxiety of his position and his cheerful hospitality.—In the Resident Court, held on Saturday last, Mr. Adams, as a Branch Pilot, who had been obliged to stoppage out of his allowance of 200 Rupees a month, was ordered to pay one half of his augmented allowance of 700 Rupees, for which he has come in as Branch Pilot.—The Estate of Ferguson and Co., has just announced a fourth dividend of three per cent.—A singular notice has been going the round of our papers. It appears that the Metropolitan of India had drawn up a prayer for the Government of India, which all the clergymen in his diocese were directed to use. The Rev. Mr. Sturrock, however, proved refractory, denied his Diocesan's right to adopt such a course, and refused to pray for the administration of British India, until an Act of Parliament should be passed to enforce the duty. It appears also that proceedings have been instituted in the Archdeacon's Court in England, to bring the right of the Bishop to the test of a judicial examination; but whether the suit originated with the Rev. Mr. Sturrock, not one of the papers has mentioned. We think both the Harkum and the Courier in the wrong when they say, that the authority of Parliament is necessary to alter the liturgy one tittle either by addition or subtraction.—The Officers of the Annex or Tine Isars, in order to testify their esteem for the late Col. Duffin, have raised a subscription for the purpose of erecting a monument over his remains.—The Governor General arrived at Delhi, on the 12th instant. His Lordship was met at Trevelyan Gunge, by the Civil and Military Officers of the station, and escorted to his encampment. He will pass ten or twelve days at Delhi.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 25.

The Bombay Mail for the last three days has been wanting; and this is an invariable forerunner of the Overland Mail, which may now be confidently expected in the course of this day.—The papers state that an Engineer Officer has been employed to dismantle Jhansi.—The meeting at the Town Hall last night, for the purpose of laying the foundation of a Mechanics' Institute was very fully attended, there being not less than three hundred and fifty persons in the room. Sir John Grant presided. Various resolutions were passed, in order to give effect to the objects of the meeting, and thanks were voted to Sir John P. Grant, for presiding, and to the Rev. Mr. Dixon, for organizing the Institute.—A letter from the camp at Rooree, dated the 31st of January, states that after the Ameer of Khyber had agreed to the surrender of Bakkur, there was some delay and some demur about the business, and that it was at one time deemed necessary to hold the troops in readiness for action, when Sir Alexander Burnes announced that it would be delivered up before sunset. The writer of the letter, however, appears to be more anxious to ridicule Sir Willoughby than to inform his readers, and a strong shade of sarcasm is thus cast over his statements.—By the Official Gazette of the Bombay Presidency, it appears that readers are invited for the establishment of a horse dock between Bombay and Gorebunder.—The Staff of Sir Henry Faure has been ordered to join him at Shikarpore, without delay.—Letters from Futtyghur state, that the iron bridge over the Kakevadee, built by the late Nabob Hukeem Munde Ally Khan, has been made over to the British Government by his legation.—An express has been sent off to General Ventura from Rajpoot Singh, in consequence of the death of General Alard, requesting him to hasten his arrival in the Punjab.

FAMINE REPORT.

TO F. CARRIE, Esq.

(Offg. Secy. to the Right Honble the Govr. Genl. N. W. P.)

Sir,—I have the honour to submit for the consideration of the Right Honourable the Governor General, a Report, with the correspondence noted below, (a) on the proceedings of the several Magistrates within this Division, during the late famine, and of the expenditure in each of the Districts.

2nd.—The delay which has occurred in submitting these documents, has arisen from the non-receipt of the required information from the several local officers, (b) and from my desire to bring the whole subject at once under His Lordship's view.

3rd.—It is almost unnecessary now to state that the late insupportable distress originated in the failure of the periodical rains in 1837; the first effect of the scarcity of food and its consequent high price in this Division, was evidenced in partial disturbances in the District of Furruckabad; these were quickly put down by the vigorous measures adopted by Mr. Robinson, and by the orders (c) of the Lieutenant Governor, North Western Provinces, to provide labour at the public expense; which orders were first put in force in the District of Furruckabad on the 29th August, 1837, where, in addition to the funds placed at his disposal by the Lieutenant Governor, the Magistrate, Mr. Robinson, very advantageously employed those of the one per cent. road fund.

4th.—The numbers of applicants continued to increase in exact relation to the increase of the distress by the loss of the harvest; the first who sought assistance were the lower classes, who, by the absence of all demand for labour for the rural population, were thrown out of employ, either through the hopelessness of attending to their agricultural pursuits, or by the utter impossibility to till the soil from the want of water or any molature.

5th.—The gradual increase in the price of grain, and the great scarcity of all the ordinary culinary vegetables, added to the cessation of work, compelled artisans and manufacturers to resort to the Magistrate for employment, according as their private resources were exhausted, and their inability to obtain the means of subsistence impelled them.

(c) Commissioner's letter to Lieutenant-Governor, dated 14th August, No. 381.—Mr. Officiating Secretary Thomson's reply, dated 17th August, No. 392.

6th.—On the first approach of distress, the scumdar or manufacturer sent away the lowest class in his service, having their duties performed by others; as his inability to maintain an establishment increased, the members of his family gradually turned their hands to the most menial offices. When, however, the progress of the calamity reached its crisis, the heads of families, as well as the most respectable and industrious, were alike compelled to yield to the pressure of circumstances; and putting aside their natural pride and prejudices, to enrol themselves, amongst the public labourers. I, myself, daily saw many who had paid their revenue with regularity, and who had up to that period lived in easy circumstances, working on the Agra Strand, grateful that the means of existence had been extended to them, and loud in their exclamations of gratitude to the Government.

7th.—The number of labourers employed at each Station reached a maximum in the several Districts on the dates stated below. (d) I have noted the total number of men, women and children at work on that day, as a striking record of the benevolence and munificence of the State. The proximity in the dates strongly corroborates the fact of the general pressure of the distress; the number of mouths fed by the bounty of the State on one day may be estimated at 2,30,000, and this rate, with but trifling variation, continued throughout a month. The extent of the misery to which succour was afforded may be calculated from this incontrovertible fact. Considering the degree of destitution and poverty to which the whole of these lamentable objects were reduced, it is difficult to err in that such an assemblage of starving paupers should have dispersed entirely by the 31st August, without the slightest inconvenience to the public, or the smallest interruption to the peace and good order of the several Districts.

8th.—I have noted below (e) the dates on which the first orders were issued fixing the rate of payment to be made to the pauper labourers; copies of my instructions are likewise appended; these rates were seldom exceeded, but the average may be estimated at—

1 anna for Men,
½ do. for Women,
¼ do. for Children;

and were uniformly adopted as the standard, for the daily disbursement varied occasionally by the fluctuation in the market price of rice. In some Districts, or in parts of Districts, where it was found practicable, rations, at the undermentioned rates, were served out:

12 chittacks or ¾ seer for Male,
10 ditto for Female,
8 ditto for Child;

It must be remarked that rations were most expensive, the cost of baking being about 4 annas a maund of flour.

9th.—The expense incurred on account of dieting and pay in the several Districts, was as follows:

* Note.—The Magistrate has given 1,27,363 as the numbers from 1st to 7th June, from which the average is deduced.

(e) Circular to Magistrates, 30th April 1838, No. 193.—Do to ditto 19th June, No. 302.—To Magistrate, Furruckabad, 17th August, No. 393.—Circular to Magistrates, dated 19th August, No. 399.

10th.—The greatest difficulty was experienced in arranging for the superintendence of the masses of labourers. I issued such circular instructions as appeared to be necessary, and, except from the Magistrate of Agra, no representation reached me of the insufficiency of the scale laid down; at Agra, however, difficulties did occur, but such were to be expected—the duty which devolved on the Local Officers was alike novel and distressing, and required the utmost exertions of the most energetic; the expense in each District under the head of establishment, is entered below. (f) The charge at Agra, it will be observed, exceeded greatly that in any other District.

11th.—The following table shows the dates on which the several Magistrates availed themselves of the discretion to provide labour in the five districts of this Division:

Muttra, 1st Nov. 1857.—19th March, 1858, at the District Office.

Agra, 11th Sept.—19th March ditto.
Farruckabad, 20th Aug.—Generally throughout the Districts.
Mynpoore, 20th Aug.
Etawah, 12th Oct.

12th.—I have not yet had an opportunity of witnessing the works performed in other places—they are detailed in each District Report; but the emigration of the Strani along the river face of the town of Agra, will be a lasting monument, not only of this dreadful season, but also of the humanity of the British Government; it has been a work of real utility to the Native community: and though its construction was viewed with great dislike by a large proportion of the European community, and as an impossibility by the Natives, yet its having withstood the impetuosity of the Jumna stream during the just heavy rains, has elevated the most sceptical of its durability, and, I trust, has proved its solidity.

13th.—Below (g) is detailed the amount expended in each District on account of miscellaneous charges, tools, &c. The Magistrate of Agra obtained the use of a large supply from the store in the Fort, the whole of which were returned on the breaking up of the gangs. In all the Districts the tools have been collected, and will be carefully preserved for distribution to prisoners as required. The Magistrate of Mynpoore, Mr. E. Tyler, added one pie extra to the pay of those who brought their own tools; and the Magistrate of Farruckabad effected some saving, by adopting the system of contract work.

14th.—I allude to these arrangements as it is desirable that every plan pursued should be noticed, that Government may be prepared to form a just estimate of the exertions of the several Magistrates.

15th.—The whole of the gangs throughout the Division were finally broken up on the 1st September, on which date public labour was entirely discontinued.

16th.—With reference to the measures adopted to effect the dispersion, I will not recur more to the difference of opinion which existed on the propriety of reducing the rates of pay. In my view it appeared desirable, when the prospects of the season opened, that the poor should have no temptation held out to them that could induce them to remain from their homes, or that would draw them from their agricultural pursuits. I acted on this view, and in all the Districts, except Agra, the Magistrates occurred in the expediency of the measures proposed by me, finding neither difficulty in giving them effect, nor increase of misery from their operation; nor did the Magistrate of Agra, when he obeyed the injunctions issued to him, report that the measure was attended with other result than those in the neighbouring Districts.

17th.—When the Agra gangs were reduced, to the most destitute and wretched who had not any means to return to their homes, or who, if they reached them, could not possess a few days' maintenance, I authorized the payment of a bonus equal in 15 days' food, or 1 rupee, to be distributed to the inhabitants of villages in the interior; by this means 9,241 individuals were enabled to reach their homes, and support themselves until the advancing season admitted of their procuring labour. Happily the rains proved abundant; the exhausted population has already in a great degree recovered from its sufferings, the harvested crops have been most luxuriant and plentiful, and the whole face of the country is verdant and animated; in fact, it is a source of astonishment with what celerity all have returned to their ordinary occupations, and how little sign now exists of the late desolation.

18th.—So dreadfully extensive and lasting a famine could not but occasion a great degree of sickness, and be followed by extreme mortality; from the effects of which, in the brief space of a few weeks, a population reduced to the last stage of existence cannot be expected to have rallied. Independent of these causes for a deteriorated state of public health, the drying up of the rains was yearly accompanied by intense heat in September and October, which caused protracted delirium and melancholia; there is nevertheless abundant ground for thankfulness that, notwithstanding multitudes were congregated together, no pestilence or contagious disease appeared amongst the crowds of paupers; this may be attributed, if not entirely, to a very great degree, to their not being housed or hunted, and to their being always exposed to the action of the air to free ventilation, and to the season in which the largest masses were collected being that of the hot winds, during which they could with comfort and without detriment remain in the open air at night.

19th.—I am convinced that had they been located or required to reside in any buildings, or enclosures, it would have been utterly impracticable to enforce cleanliness, or to have preserved them to health.

20th.—But amongst the consequences of the famine, I must note the numbers of helpless orphans of both sexes, and of tender years, who have been found at the breaking up of the gangs destitute and friendless, without a relative to claim them, and ignorant of the villages from whence they came. These have all found, not only an asylum but protectors; those who have been able to give such an account of themselves, as to enable the Local authorities and Committees to trace their parents, have been restored, notices have been issued throughout the several districts, and every means taken to restore them to their homes. Yet, notwithstanding all these exertions, a number between five and six hundred helpless infants remained unclaimed: these have been taken charge of by the Orphan Asylum at Agra, some by a similar institution at Benares, and others by Mr. Wilson, an American Missionary, at Fattyghur; in this manner have all been, not only rescued from misery, but placed under such judicious management as will ensure their being brought up in some useful trade, and eventually become useful members of the community.—Greensley's Agra Journal.

THE HUSBURY COLLEGE.

A Deputation of the General Committee of Public Instruction proceeded to Chinsurah and Hooghly in a Steamer on Sunday morning, to inspect the classes of the College and ~~British~~ School at these places. The deputation consisted of Sir Edward Ryan, the Honourable W. W. Birl, Member of Council, Mr. Cameron, of the Law Commission, Mr. C. W. Smith, of the Sadler Board, Mr. John Grant, Mr. J. C. C. Sutherland, Captain Birls, Nawab Tewar Jung, and the Secretary, Dr. Wise. The Deputation was accompanied by Mr. Secretary Halliday.

and some other gentlemen. The gentlemen of the Station and neighbourhood who attended on the occasion were:—Mr. Barlow, the Judge, Mr. Semmels, the Magistrate and Visitor of the College, Dr. Esdall, Mr. St. Pourcain, a French gentleman from Chandermaur; Baboo Jyotiram Mookerjee, and several other native gentlemen.

The Deputation and visitors next proceeded to the College, which is held at Pargana house at Chinnurah, and after inspecting all the different classes in the Oriental and English departments in their class-rooms, adjourned to the library, where the prizes were arranged. Here several of the boys of the junior classes were called up to read, and the Deputation expressed themselves much pleased with their reading. Mr. J. C. C. Sutherland next examined some of the senior students of the Mahomedan department, belonging to the classes of Anad Hussein and Akbar Shah, in Mahomedan law, and expressed himself highly satisfied with their replies.

The prizes consisting of money were then distributed to the Oriental department. After which the first class of the English department was then called up and examined for about an hour and a half in English Literature, History, Mathematics and Natural Philosophy. Sir Edward Ryan then stated, that he and the other members of the Deputation, were very much pleased with the manner in which the students in both the Oriental and English department had acquitted themselves, and that the degree of progress exhibited was highly creditable to all the instructors of the College. After the prizes of the English department were distributed, the Deputation and visitors left the College and returned to Calcutta.

Several maps and drawings were exhibited on the Library table, some of the former were considered to be very neatly executed, particularly that in which the prize was awarded, the peritomena of Man drawn by a student of the first class. — Thus, &c.

THE NEW ROAD TO BOMBAY.

The first report of Major Dennyman on the Agra and Bombay road, is unfavourable to that undertaking. The line that is surveyed by the Military is the most direct—running by Gwalior, Etawah, and straight to Bombay, but is pronounced to be impracticable, from the insuperable obstacles presented by rocky, precipitous hills and torrents. It is not, we believe, about to attempt another mile, or to speak more correctly, to survey one. Meanwhile a not unimportant question has been recently brought forward which has been made to Government:—a Col. Sutherland, who has throughout supported the undertaking, and which is as original as his plan, is now in favour of the other line, which instead of a road to Bombay, runs by one to the Gulf of Cambay, from whence a water communication can be established with Bombay. It is further a part of his proposal, that roads be formed from Allahabad, Agra and Delhi to Neemuch, from whence they are to unite in one road to the Gulf of Cambay. This is the mere outline of the Col. S's plan, which really reminds us in a way, of the route by which Columbus made his great stand against so much opposition at first, and yet so obvious and simple when explained.

In the intense attention given to the Agra and Bombay road scheme by ourselves and our Bombay contemporaries, the intelligent view taken by Colonel Sutherland never once struck us, and yet now that it has been opened to us, we see at once its superiority. The great and paramount advantage which recommends this plan, is, that it saves out of a distance of 700 miles, upwards of 200, or nearly one-third of the whole, while the saving of expense is even greater. Nor is there, that we are aware of, any even slightly preponderating disadvantages, against this great consideration: the country between Neemuch and Cambay is better suited for a line of road, than between Neemuch and Poona, intersected as the latter is by the Nerbudda. We know not, indeed, whether the Gulf of Cambay from its natural features may not present a serious difficulty to steam or other navigation. The idea is that the area of the sea is much less, with great velocity, rendering part of the Gulf dry at low water and dangerous for vessels. But as the plan was more one of considerable commerce, and we have the agency of Steam to overcome the difficulties of its tide, we see nothing to prevent the full success of the plan proposed by Colonel S—, which both in an economical and practicable light, is superior to the direct route. But whether it eventually proves to be so or not, we are happy to be able to lay it to public notice, as a subject for consideration in a subject, which public curiosity, nor our Bombay contemporaries, should allow to sink into forgetfulness. — Agra Ukbar, February 14.

AGRA SCHOOL BOOK SOCIETY.

FIRST REPORT.

Read at a General Meeting of the Society, February 4, 1839.
In submitting to the friends of the Agra School Book Society, the first annual report of their proceedings, your Committee are glad to have it in their power to record the very general approbation with which the Institution was viewed into existence, and the highly liberal support by means of which its objects have been hitherto sustained, and its measures effectuated.

Whilst but one opinion prevailed in regard to the necessity of an Institution, having for its object the supply of intellectual nourishment to those who were perishing for lack of knowledge, it was not before your Committee had consulted the opinions of the friends of education, and were encouraged by expressions of liberal support, that they ventured to lay the foundation of the Institution, and impose upon themselves the responsible duties which were involved in the undertaking.

Extracts from the correspondence of several of our friends in answer to the enquiries which were instituted relative to the state of education, and the supply of books and other appliances, necessary for Schools, will be found in the Appendix.

In presenting the first report of your Committee, no opportunity during the past year, they trust, that with reference to the difficulties attending a new Institution, in the time consumed in correspondence, and in making local arrangements with translators, printers, &c., and particularly with reference to the interruptions occurring during a season of unparalled distress, in the aggressive duties which devolved upon almost every member of your Committee, that the amount of progress made by a new Institution, and your Committee must admit, that the great and increasing want of elementary publications, and the means that have been created in the establishment of a press in Agra to publish works to any extent, will induce their friends to make fresh exertions for obtaining a much larger supply than the funds at their disposal are at present calculated to afford.

The numerous official engagements of the Members of your Committee, are not the only obstacles to some of which they have had to contend; the frequent absence from the school in the discharge of important public duties, of some, and the removal of others altogether, with the difficulty experienced in supplying their places, have created inconvenience, which are not felt to an equal degree in the progress. Arrangements, however, have been made in the appointment of a fixed establishment, which will ensure the uninterrupted progress of instruction, and their careful revision through the press.

It will appear in a subsequent part of this report, that your Committee have been obliged to decline publishing a few works which were offered to the Society, not so much from a want of addresses, as from want of adequate facilities. For the publication of the books which are required for the numerous schools and institutions, the purchase of copyrights, and even the printing of the same, and those for printing and publishing, also require a position, that a very limited number of works only can be undertaken, and accordingly a selection must be made, which must be directed to the immediate objects of the Institution, the Agra School Book Society having confined to a translation of the Bible, a publication of English and Bengali works, the number of these in Hindustani and Urdu is exceedingly few, and it is to be regretted that these languages that the mission of this Society will be more especially directed. The N. W. Provinces, a field of extensive field for cultivation, and it is confidently hoped, that a more mature and enlightened consciousness will eventually aid the exertions of a Society, which has for its object the moral, political, and political and social happiness of an considerable portion of its subjects.

Scarcely in looking back upon the past, can our friends examine with all the fearful havoc of life which attended it,—the dispersal of members that survived, over various parts of the country,—the entire disorganization of every school institution, and the breaking up of the few schools that had been established at distant intervals from each other, there is enough to excite the tenderest sympathy, and to demand the most enlarged benevolence.

To those who have not made enquiries into the subject, it would hardly appear credible, how few there are amongst the millions of our native subjects that have been educated. This fact has been illustrated in a document received from Mr. Hamilton, which is inserted in the Appendix.

The following abstract taken therefrom shows the state of education among the jail prisoners in the Agra Division, at the close of June, 1838:—

Places.	No. of Prisoners.	No. who merely read and write.	No. educated.
Mittra, ... ..	583	5	3
Agra, ... ..	1673	8	4
Farrukhabad, ... ..	1891	7	6
Mynpoore, ... ..	1428	88	7
Etawah, ... ..	479	6	0

It has been also ascertained that not only is the number of schools in these parts exceedingly limited, but that what is taught in them, extends scarcely beyond reading, writing, and a knowledge of addition.

In such a state of things, it is not to be expected that the condition of the people can improve, and it behoves, therefore, all those who are interested in their welfare to exert themselves to the utmost by promoting the diffusion of knowledge, in lay a foundation for those salutary political reforms and improvements in the arts of social life, which can only result from a well-organised and extended system of education. It is not to be lost gued, however, that any people are to depend entirely upon foreign aid, for the full development of those refined principles, which require time to mature, and bring to maturity;—not the first impulse must be given, and it given with sufficient force and in the proper direction, every talent and energy will be put into action, and all the resources of the country be gradually brought into operation;—in other words, the natives of India will improve the advantages which European aid requires to confer upon them; they will adopt their model institutions, imitate their arts, and acquire knowledge of every branch of their learning and philosophy. Another point that requires to be alluded to, is the manner in which education is to be administered; whether through the medium of English, or the vernacular or dialects,—whether by an extension of village schools, or when the more rudiments of knowledge are taught, or by the opening of Colleges, where a higher order of acquirement may be secured. It is apart from the purpose of this report to enter into these questions, but your Committee are desirous to range in the opinion of the recording Secretary of the Calcutta School Book Society, that both the English and vernacular languages should be simultaneously encouraged. We are happy to find that the Persian, the more language of the courts,—and the language of the people, is to be studied; and that Urdu and Hindustani are to be cultivated in its place. No English can convey a more striking illustration of the superiority of the spoken language, than a passage in the work, entitled 'Observations on the Sanskrit names of India.' During the festival of the Mohammedans, observes the writer, 'when the Mussulman is reciting the Persian Book a descriptive of the lives and writings of the Imamites, it is only by his impressive manner and strong gestures that he excites his hearers to sympathize in the incidents related, but when the Mussulman is reciting in his own language, tongue, and every word of which is comprehended even by the most ignorant, the whole assembly rise, and recount the names of the great teachers after Mohammed.' Another interesting fact showing the efficacy of Hindustani as a medium of instruction, is afforded in Mr. Wilkinson's letter inserted in the Appendix.

With regard to the Arabic and Sanskrit languages, your Committee are of opinion, that the continued cultivation of them is greatly desirable for imparting exactness, purity and force to the vernaculars; but they do not think them suitable channels for the knowledge that may be transferred into them, of the literature and culture of Europe; nor do they think that translations into these languages should be made out of a disinterested motive to the natives. Mr. Muller, notwithstanding the acknowledged doctrine they possess over the minds of their disciples. Your Committee are of opinion, that instructive books in the Urdu and Hindustani would interest themselves greatly to all classes, and that they could be recited with ease and purity, more easily than in a classical dress.

PUBLICATIONS OF THE SOCIETY.

The birth of the Institution being so recent, it will not be expected that many works have been contributed, but those that are in the printer's hands, and others that are being translated, with a few that have been recommended for preparation, make a number as many works as your Society can at present prudently undertake.

The only work that has been printed is Cliff's Geography in Hindustani; the number of copies is one thousand, of which the Calcutta School Book Society have availed themselves of the offer of the Committee to take 200 copies at the cost price. This work is highly useful and popular in the original, and likely to be equally so in its present new dress. The same work in Urdu is now being printed by Mr. Greenwood, who has established a press at Agra, in the neighbourhood of the Government, which your Committee have held out to him in the printing of their works. As there is no other printing establishment in the N. W. Provinces possessing types in the original character, except the American Mission Press at Lucknow, Mr. Greenwood's establishment will doubtless prove a valuable acquisition, as, if done, an excellent opportunity to many, who have both the ability and leisure, to contribute elementary tracts or treatises for the natives. We have no doubt that books in England and America for examples of the vast benefit, that has accrued from the spread of knowledge by means of the press, and which from their cheapness, are peculiarly suitable to the circumstances of this country. Another work now in the press is a translation in Hindustani of Marshman's Brief Survey of History.

The following are the works preparing for publication. Some of them are nearly ready. The six first books of Euclid translated from the Persian Ousooli Ouldood, by the late Rev. J. Thompson.

An Urdu translation of Wilson's Grammar of History.

An Urdu translation of Marshman's History of India, presented to the Society by the indefatigable and zealous friend of India, Mr. John Nutt, of Schamprapore.

Your Committee have also resolved to reprint Sellen's Abridgement of Scripture History, both in Urdu and Hindustani.

They have also purchased 50 copies of Miss Birds' Ancient History; 50 copies of the Hindustani Students' Assistant; 25 copies of Lieut. Sutherland's Illustrations of the Kings of England; and 4 copies of Mr. Thompson's New Urdu Dictionary.

Your Committee have in addition to the above, lately purchased from Syed Mahomed Meer, a native of Lucknow, the copyright of an approved translation of knowledge, for 200 Rs. From this exercise of the translation, the original cost and moral tendency of the work, it was considered a very suitable book for prizes, and it was with this view that it was adopted. It is necessary to observe at the same time, that your Committee have resolved to confine themselves as strictly as possible, with their means are more ample, to class books.

Among the works recommended for preparation are the five popular introductions to Natural Philosophy, published by the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, embracing Mechanics, Hydrostatics, Pneumatics, Optics and Astronomy.

It would be very easy to add considerably to the list of books, which it is desirable to print, and if adequate encouragement could be extended, the press might be made to teem with publications of every description; but it is too much to expect that private benevolence alone should be appealed to, as it is often in the case of suffering humanity, who can offer to those engaged in the service of usefulness, which the most necessities of the country so mainly demand. Your Committee, therefore, would vainly hope, that as the sphere of their labours increases, the truly Christian spirit which prompts and animates private benevolence in extending the blessing of knowledge, to their benighted brethren, will be seconded and supported by a liberal Government, in proportion to their just claims.

With regard to the distribution of the Society's publications, we have but little to notice; as they have had but few works, except the recommended publications presented to them by the Bazaarizing Fund Committee, which they could call their own; but judging from the sales which have been effected from the Depot of the Calcutta School Book Society, and which range from 2 to 1000 Rs. worth per annum, to say the least, that a large amount of our stores will be made, when they are created. Before concluding this part of the report, your Committee cannot refrain from expressing the obligations they owe to Mr. John Nutt and Mr. Wilkinson, for the lively interest they have taken, in the welfare of the Society, for the liberal encouragement they have afforded, and the valuable suggestions they have offered, in carrying out the important objects of the Institution, and, lastly, to all who have so liberally come forward to aid and encourage their exertions, your Committee would beg to return their most grateful acknowledgments.—Eng.

A REPORT OF THE SUVAVALAPURAM MISSION.

1. From the list of Congregations and Schools, drawn up at the end of the half year, it appears that there are at present under Christian instruction at this station, and adjacent villages, 1819 families, consisting of 4447 souls who have renounced idolatry. The people are nearly all of the Shonar tribe, many of whom cultivate the paddy and other produce; they reside in 80 different villages. The number of adults and children baptised is 516; the communicants are about 120. The Lord's Supper is administered every month at Suvaivalapuram, and from time to time in the villages.

2. There are 16 Schools under regular school-masters; 18 Schools are likewise taught by catechists, as the funds will not allow of a school-master being appointed to every School. In these Schools about 900 children are receiving instruction, 150 of whom are the children of professing Christians; the rest are the offspring of heathen parents, of various castes. Among these children there were only 20 girls until within the last two months, when Mrs. Muller succeeded in establishing Girls' Schools in several of the villages, by furnishing the children with a quantity of cotton (which grows plentifully in the district) to spin into thread. This employment will prepare them to support themselves in future life, while the spiritual benefits of labour for the parents as some compensation for the loss of their children's services while attending the School. Mrs. M. is very desirous of having a home Seminary for Girls, under her own inspection, in the Mission compound; any number of children could be obtained, if funds only were provided. The attention of the friends and promoters of female education in India is respectfully called to this important object, and their aid most earnestly solicited. The support of a child is about 24 Rs. per annum.

3. At present there are 62 Catechists and Assistant Catechists employed. They steadily labour among the Congregations already commenced, and likewise preach the gospel to the heathen in their vicinity. Every month they assemble at Suvaivalapuram, for counsel, instruction and fellowship. On these occasions they deliver a portion of Scripture, which they have committed to memory during the month; at present they are going through the gospel of Luke. During the first half year I was obliged to discipline one of them for improper conduct. The others are conistent and diligent. I commend them to the sympathy and prayers of the Christian Church.

4. During the last quarter I have selected a Preparandi class, containing from 10 to 14 youths. They are preparing for immediate usefulness, and are learning a Scriptural catechism and the Epistle to the Corinthians; these lessons are explained to them morning and evening, besides the Tamil Harmony of the gospels, which is read and explained at the evening meeting for prayer. Some of them have begun to deliver addresses to the people who assemble at each season.

5. The monthly expenses for carrying on the Mission is nearly 400 Rs. The Travancore Committee allow only 400 Rs.; the additional expense has been hitherto defrayed by the balance in hand from our Mission fund, raised chiefly in India by friends who were desirous of preventing the extinction of the Mission until we could join some public Institution. But the aid of the Christian public is still urgently needed to prevent too great a demand on the Society's means, and to enable one to enlarge my sphere of usefulness. In many parts of the heathen world the natives refuse to come under regular instruction, and obstinately cling to their idols; here the people are in great numbers actually consigning them to the moles and the bats. Christian Brethren! will you refuse to send us aid?

6. In addition to the demands for the salaries of the native teachers, which are fixed on the principle of affording support merely while preaching the gospel, about 400 Rs. are immediately required to erect small chapels or houses of prayer, and dwellings for the Catechists. The chapels are generally mud-wall erections, the roof is of Palmyra timber, covered with leaves of the same tree. When plastered with chunam they are comfortable, and in appearance greatly in advance of the miserable devil temples of heathen worship. Those who dwell or worship in "celled huts" should remember their less favoured brethren, and assist them in obtaining a humble building, in which they may learn to serve and worship the living and true God. Most of the present places scarcely afford a shelter from the heat of the sun and from the rain.

7. Tracts and portions of the Scriptures are distributed, read, and explained by the Catechists, Preparandi class, and by myself when visiting the Schools and Congregations. The young men go regularly every Saturday to the heathen villages with tracts and other books, which are generally well received and often eagerly inquired after. We owe much to the Tract Society in London, which supplies its Auxiliaries in this heathen land with paper so liberally as to meet all urgent wants. And to that noble Institution the Bible Society we are likewise greatly indebted.

It will be interesting to our friends to learn, that the people, though generally possessed of no more than is sufficient for their support, have founded several benevolent institutions among themselves.

1. The Book Society, whose object is to raise funds for procuring Bibles and Tracts. Its income last year was between 70 and 80 Rs.

2. The Friend in Need Society, formed for the relief of the poor and indigent in the Congregations. This is the pure result of Christian influence. No such idea ever entered the mind of a Hindu, as affording assistance to his fellow man as such. This Native Society raised 100 Rs. last year, and expended it to ameliorate the condition of those suffering around them.

3. The Peace Society. The opposition offered by the heathen to the establishment of the Mission gave rise to this Institution, which seeks by the formation of Christian villages, to protect those who are unable to reside with comfort or advantage among their heathen neighbours, after embracing Christianity. The income last year was about 60 Rs. The sums raised by this Society have been expended in a way that was not originally contemplated, and which we hope will not occur again, namely, to meet the expenses of the Native Courts for vexatious law suits. I am happy to say we have now "peace in our borders," and trusting in the presence of the Saviour, and the support and sympathy of His people, I hope to labour "while it is day: the night cometh in which no man can work."

POETRY.

For "The Friend of India,"
BY A CORRESPONDENT.

Not in vain speech erst said a Holy man,
That could Earth's brightest Saint for one short hour
Sit on God's throne with judgment cloth'd and power,
He must in roudous wrath east forth his ban
Of ceaseless woe, and all his fury shower
On this most miserable world! Yet He
Who gave his Son to die that man might live,
Can man scorn this gift, and yet forgive!

Oh! mercy, matchless, measureless and free,
I would our simple lesson learn of Thee,
(Which some may smile to read); "Cai I, who owe
"Ten thousand talents to his love, and thee
"Draw all my joys; can I in dangerous throng,
"My fellow servants for an hundred pence?"

THE SUCCESSION POLICE.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

DEAR SIRS,—The subject of improvement in the Police of this country appears at length to have so seriously engaged the attention of the Government, that it is to be hoped some radical change will be speedily carried into effect; and it, therefore, becomes the more desirable that the subject should be fully discussed in every possible point of view, while there is yet time to obtain a hearing. I venture, therefore, to offer a few remarks, having reference principally to Mr. Halliday's able Minute upon the subject; the sentiments of which appear to have been very generally adopted and approved by the Editors at the Presidency, and their correspondents.

The first remark I would make is, that criminal offenders are, properly distinguishable into two very different classes—the one casual offenders; or those whom want or some other circumstance has led into crime or misdemeanour without previous confederacy; and the other, professional offenders; or those who habitually earn their bread by lawless modes of life, to which, for the most part, they are habituated from childhood. The distinction between these two classes seems to be most marked in every respect; whether we regard the moral turpitude of their actions; the means of their detection; or the nature of the punishment suited to their case. Yet, practically I believe, the distinction has never been acted on by our legislature; though some of its enactments, no doubt, in a manner recognize its existence; and to the absence of this discrimination, I conceive, may be traced most of the evils of our criminal jurisprudence; as it produces virtually the effect of ensuring almost entire impunity to the practised rogue, while it treats the uninitiated with a severity which not infrequently makes more villains than it cures.

In our own favoured country, the number of those whom I have called casual offenders is comparatively small, owing to the zealous co-operation of the people with the laws, and the generally high tone of conventional morality which prevails; but I believe that of offenders of the other description, the numbers of organized fraternities of plunderers, is much greater than is generally supposed; and at the same time yearly increasing in numbers and dexterity—while in this country the numbers of these last; the extent and completeness of their organisation; and the success which results from it, are truly appalling. From the "Thug" down to the "Udair" it is a current saying amongst them, that 84 tribes exist, (thence termed in their slang phraseology, the Chauras,) in which are included the Doodia, Pata, Kiangars and others of our Chokekardaree classes; each of these is perfectly organised within itself, and pursues a distinct description of crimes—and yet there exists amongst them all a species of freemasonry, (constituting, I believe, in a certain waterfulness of eye, which the habitual practice of crime begets,) by which the members of each are enabled, strange as it may appear, at once to recognise those of other tribes. They constitute, in fact, an immense community, quite apart in their feelings and interests from the rest of society; yet intermixing with it; and acting as a poison at its core. The same thing in kind, though different in degree, exists in England, especially in London: and I feel perfectly convinced, that in every nation on the globe which has passed beyond the state of primitive barbarism, the great mass of crime is perpetrated in a like manner.

The next suggestion that I would offer is, that of these two classes, the casual offenders and the professional ones, the latter appears to be the only one for the coercion of which a centralized system of Police, such as that advocated by Mr. Halliday, is required or likely to prove advantageous. How admirably efficacious the latter can prove for the suppression of organized robbers and murderers, we have, during the few last years, had an example and proof afforded us, I believe, wholly without precedent. Indeed, it stands to reason that if crime be organized, the system for its prevention should be at least equally so. But that

"Gens d'armes" should be established for the rigid surveillance of the people at large; for the reporting of offences; the keeping of the peace; the prevention of misdemeanours; and generally for the performance of the miscellaneous duties of conservancy which ordinarily demand the attention of the Police, I hold to be a question of a very different nature; and when put in its simplest form, I apprehend few will view such a proposition otherwise than with suspicion and dislike. Despite the condemnation passed upon municipal bodies, I believe that the latter class of duties, intimately connected as it is with the dearest interests of every community, will ever be performed by them in a manner more efficient, and more satisfactory to all parties than by any other—and if we be disposed to denounce them, it will surely be well to hear its mind, that it is no new theory that the freedom of spirit for which Britain's arms have ever been distinguished, is essentially attributable to the operation of these institutions. To expect, however, that such bodies can take cognizance of matters beyond their immediate sphere, which they must do if they would compete with depredators who roam through all regions, and have confederates in every locality, is manifestly to look for that to which their constitution does not admit them.

To carry out the above suggestion it would be requisite to divide the Police of the country into two distinct portions—the one having a centralized organization, which for the sake of distinction might be termed "The General Police," and the other strictly local, which might in like manner be named "The District Police." And I would here remark, that the sphere of duties and mode of operation followed by these two portions would be entirely distinct; in an extent, perhaps, not at a first view quite apparent. Experience has shown that, for the extermination of organized and professional offenders, the only efficient method is to hunt them in their haunts and lurking places, acting upon previous information deliberately and systematically recorded; but by no means trusting to the chances of seizure during, or consequent to, the perpetration of a specific offence—and this appears to have been practically acknowledged and established in every successful effort with which I am acquainted; whether the extermination of the Italian Banditti; the suppression of the Pindaris; our efforts to put an end to Piracy; or the operations now in progress against the Thugs. The duties, therefore, of the former branch of the Police would provide their being attached to any particular locality, and would necessitate their being constantly on the move in pursuit of denounced characters; while the performance of a duties of a local character would devolve entirely upon the other branch. The Jails, likewise, for receiving, after their conviction, the persons arrested by the General Police, ought, I conceive, to be similarly organized; quite apart and distinct from the district Jails for ordinary offenders; and as the crimes committed by the former would never be definitively tried but at the Sessions, the separation desired by Mr. Halliday, of the executive from the judiciary, would be in this far secured.

The last suggestion I propose to make is, that if it should be determined to organize a centralized Police, we possess in the present establishment for the suppression of Thuggery, a nucleus of the most admirable description on which to form it. I know not whether the efficiency of that department is adequately appreciated by the community at large; but I speak of my own knowledge when I assert, that in those parts in which it has been for some years in operation, Thuggery has been in fact entirely suppressed. The few members of the fraternity who yet remain at large, are wandering about in a state of destitution and despair; knowing that their circumstances and crimes are intimately known to the authorities, and themselves objects of the closest and most penetrating search; while as individuals are seized and brought in, few, if any, attempt denial from the same conviction of its inutility—all this has been effected by means of an establishment vastly less in proportion than that contemplated by Mr. Halliday; and were its sphere of operation extended, and the first impulse given by the same able directors to whom it owes its origin and progress,* I entertain no doubt that every other lawless fraternity would, in a few years, be reduced to an equally helpless condition. Mr. Halliday has assumed, that the whole of the funds appropriated to the support of the present Police would be available for the maintenance of the contemplated new one; but there is in truth little doubt, that if practicable at all, such appropriation would be attended with much hardship, injustice, and difficulty; while for a general Police, such as that contemplated above, a fourth of these funds would probably be found abundantly sufficient; and the remaining three-fourths would be still available for the support of the present Police on a reduced scale but an improved footing.*

I have already exceeded the limits to which I had wished to confine myself; and shall, therefore, leave untouched the subject of placing the Local Police essentially under the control of the Zemindars; and the desirableness of creating something worthy the name of municipal institutions, where the oppressiveness or indifference of the landholder has rendered the bond of mutual confidence and support, which, under a different system, formerly subsisted; but I cannot refrain from observing before I conclude, that I shall be glad if the above remarks be viewed as an endeavour to strike a medium between the plans of the Board and those of Mr. Halliday. I believe that the sentiments and suggestions of both are founded on justice and good policy; and that the only reason why they appear to be incompatible, is this—that it has been the practice heretofore to view the work of preventing crimes and misdemeanours as essentially a single whole; and to range all crimes together under one order of classification, without any special reference to the great difference of circumstances under which they are perpetrated.

I am, my dear Sir,

Yours faithfully,

COMMUNICATOR.

BRISTOL.

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.—From the Missionary Record of the Church of Scotland, for August and September last, we gather the following intelligence. The Clergymen of the Church have applied for some measures being adopted, by which they may be provided with some opportunity of ministerial usefulness and ecclesiastical supervision, instead of being allowed to remain as at present unmolested and unemployed, until in the ordinary tenor of this establishment, fully equipped as it already is, will be speedily found to be a very different measure from the mere removal of a Superintendent of Police to control the several Local Magistrates. One of your Correspondents suggests that the duty of superintendence could be as well performed by the Assistant Adjutant as by an officer specially appointed; but I apprehend that a more radical error than this could not be committed. If the entire separation of the Executive be desirable under any system of Police, it becomes more peculiarly so under an organization of the kind contemplated; for it will be found that the principal duty of such Superintendent must be to collect and compare and merely information by which to effect seizures, but evidence on which to convict. Heaven has happily implanted in condemned rogues a disposition to betray their accomplices; and it is only by taking full advantage of this disposition, that the Executive can hope to conquer with them. It is this characteristic which has given to the establishment under Major Sleeman such surprising effectiveness, and marked it with an originality and a vigour from which every nation of the civilized world may, I conceive, learn a most important lesson in criminal procedure. It was observed by Lord William Bentinck, that he considered the evidence obtainable by this means to be superior to almost any circumstantial evidence which can be conceived; but it is manifestly an engine in the use of which much caution is requisite; and it appears, therefore, to be essential, not only that those who collect the evidence shall be wholly distinct from those who are ultimately to try the criminals; but that the former shall be provided over by a special functionary, who from his neutral position shall be best enabled to collate the evidence collected at various times, and from different quarters; and that no individual shall be entrusted with the task for so long, until by such collation he shall have satisfied himself that none could remain of his guilt.

* Note.—After the foregoing exposition of my views, it is, perhaps, unnecessary for me to observe, that if any anticipations be correct, the labours of the Local Police would, in a short time, be immensely reduced; without either confederacy, or a generally disseminated crime moving crime to any serious extent could exist; and while the gradual progress of education and improvement tends towards the correction of the latter, it is my belief that the former (which is undoubtedly the grand support of crime) would be virtually annihilated in the course of a few years by a Police Establishment, such as that above adverted to; and the entire extinction of the Local Magistrates would then be directed to questions connected with internal improvement, and the peace and comfort of the people. The transfer of the proposed portion of the funds for the support of the centralized Police could be effected gradually from whatever quarter and by whatever means might be locally found most convenient; and no shock would thus be given to the people, such as must result from the introduction of any sweeping and sudden change.

* Note.—I rejoice to learn that there are grounds for supposing this measure to be actually in the contemplation of Government, and the ex-course of patronage they receive a charge. The application was received by the last General Assembly with much satisfaction, and is to be taken into more careful consideration by the Assembly of the present year. An unhappy schism has occurred in the Presbyterian Church in New South Wales. In the end of 1837, Dr. Lang arrived in that colony with a number of settlers, and ten clergymen connected with the Church of Scotland and the Synod of Ulster, for whose support, or "ultimode, or about to become, members of the Presbytery of New South Wales," a promise of Government aid had been received from Her Majesty's Ministers in England. But shortly after his arrival in the colony, Dr. Lang and a portion of the clergy with him met to constitute themselves a Synod of New South Wales, for the purpose of superintending the Presbytery already existing. The reason given for this proceeding, was the utter insufficiency of the Presbytery with only a single exception, the establishment of which was permitted to exist in it, the systematic protection it afforded to every case of delinquency that occurred, and the consequent moral degradation that could not fail to attach to all that belonged to them. Three of the clergymen declined taking part in the new Synod, as neither being according to Presbyterian Church order, nor calculated to remove the evils complained of, in far as they really exist. The Synod, however, was formed, and as a result of the proceedings appeared in the papers of the Colony. The Presbytery in its turn met, pronounced Dr. Lang to be by his own act no longer a member of the body, and agreed that a copy of the decision should be sent to Dr. Lang, the acting Governor of the Colony, the Moderator of the General Assembly, and the Secretary of State for the Colonies. The Colonial Government thereupon declined paying the salaries of the clergymen who had adhered to Dr. Lang, holding that thereby they had separated themselves from the Church of Scotland, in connexion with which alone provision had been made for their support. The Secretary for the Colonies communicated this fact to the Colonial Committee of the General Assembly, and as a result of such observations as they might have to make on the subject. The Committee strongly condemned the proceedings of Dr. Lang, and referred the matter to the Committee of the General Assembly, which met on the 8th August last. The Committee highly approved of the conduct of the Colonial Government, and authorized the Moderator to send out an address prepared for a Committee for the purpose of rectifying the evils which had occurred.

The Assembly's Mission at Malacca, we are happy to see, is about to be re-ordered. The Committee have unanimously appointed the Rev. Mr. Johnston, a native of Moffat, licentiate of the Church of Scotland, now a missionary at Whitehaven, Arr. to the Malacca station. Mr. Johnston's serious attention has for several years been directed to missionary labour, and from the many encouraging testimonies in his favour, the Committee have been led to form the highest opinion of his fitness for the work. He is a personal friend of Mr. Anderson, the present missionary at Malacca, and, in fact, is the very person to whom Mr. Anderson has himself turning his eyes, as the friend whom he would choose for his counsel and companion.

Jews' Society.—The "Operative Jews' Institution" provides employment for Insipiens and Converts; but, as the progress of the truth among the Jews brings many cases forward in which temporary assistance is much needed, the "Abrahamite Society" was formed for the relief of such cases. From the Third Report, it appears that loans and gifts were made to 33 persons, in the year, with great advantage. On the 1st of September, a distinguished Rabbi from Hungary was baptised at the Episcopal Jews' Chapel.—Missionary Register.

LONDON MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—On the 31st of July the Rev. W. H. McArthur and his family, on their return to Batavia, with Mr. W. Lockhart, Medical Missionary appointed to China, and Cheongkang, (see p. 284) returning to his family and country, sailed from Gravesend, in the Gorga the Fourth, Capt. Drayner.—Aug. 18: the Rev. Henry Nott and Mrs. Nott, on their return to Tahiti, sailed from Gravesend, in the Everest, Capt. Gilmore.—Aug. 28: the Rev. John Lamb, appointed to Combaracunda, returned for Malacca, with Mrs. Lamb, in the Mary Anne, Capt. Tarbutt.—Sept. 12: the following Missionaries sailed from Portsmouth, in the Duke of Buccleugh, Capt. Close, for Calcutta: Rev. George Gwyer and his family, returning, in greatly improved health, to resume his labours; Rev. James Kennedy; Rev. Dr. Ferdinand Sommer and Rev. Dr. J. H. E. Rorer, German Missionaries, and their wives.—Ibid.

CHRISTIANITY IN CHINA.—A letter from St. Petersburg dated June 28, says: "We learn from Peking, where a mission from the Greek church of Russia has resided since the time of Peter the Great, that upwards of 300,000 Chinese have embraced Christianity, and that there was every reason to believe that all persecution of Christians was on the point of ceasing. The Emperor himself is said to have studied Christianity, and to hold it in respect; while, at his accession to the throne, Christian blood was frequently made to flow. The rigorous investigation the Christians now exist only on paper, and their execution is entrusted to such Mandarins alone as are favourable to the Christians. The law of 1820, although in terms applying to all Christians, was directed solely against the English, of whose political influence the Emperor began to be afraid. There are a China several viceroys, whose chiefs are to be found at Peking, Nankin, and Moupin."—French Paper.

METEOROLOGY.

THE AFTERGLOW OF NOVEMBER.

The predicted falling stars appeared yesterday morning at an early hour, and attracted considerable curiosity. For some time the sky seemed to be reflecting an alarming conflagration; in fact, several Fire Brigade-engines were turned out, and for upwards of two hours were traversing the metropolis in search of the supposed fire. The phenomenon has been observed during the last six or seven years past, in the interval extending from the 13th to the 16th of the present month. The same phenomenon has been observed precisely at the same time in Germany, Russia, Australasia, and America.

In consequence of the periodical accuracy of this meteoric visit, preparations had been made for some months last for taking more accurate observations, and the principal observatories in England have been in requisition.

During the progress of the meteoric phenomenon yesterday morning, the atmosphere was remarkably clear, and the sky shone with unusual brightness, the air was freely with a strong breeze from the east. It began a quarter before ten. The first object that attracted attention was several stars of an ordinary size shooting from their original spots and falling apparently to the earth, where it appeared that they exploded, for immediately afterwards the horizon was brilliantly illuminated by a brilliant light; this, in the space of ten minutes or less, disappeared, and another light of a most splendid description rose from the same quarter and gradually expanded over the entire hemisphere. It was an immense mass of crimson vapour appeared, tinged with branches of silvery convolutions, which at times formed a rich and variegated canopy, covering the entire expanse from the east to the western hemisphere, presenting the most gorgeous spectacle. Towards four o'clock the phenomenon became very faint, but the bright columns of light radiating from it retained their splendour till half-past four, when it totally disappeared. The phenomenon when viewed from a high elevation was magnificent; the whole of the metropolis was illuminated.

In the Arctic region the lights appear to perfect their perfection during the solstice. In England, according to certain accounts, the appearance of many of these lights are to be seen in comparison the inhabitants of England have but a faint idea of their splendour. They often assume the colour of blood, and exhibit one species regularly appears between the west and north like a luminous rainbow, edged with gold and silver colours. Beneath the arch is a darkness through which the stars appear with some brilliancy. The species is thought by the natives to be the forerunner of storms. Another kind strikes the beholder with horror, for they crackle, sparkle, hiss, make a hissing sound, and are more like the firing of a rocket. Every eye is struck with terror: even the dogs of the hunters are seized with such dread that they will fall on the ground, and become immovable till it is over.—Est.

DECKWALK OF THE BALTIC SEA.—It has been observed that the waters of the Baltic are undergoing a gradual decrease, which seems to arise from some elevation of the surface of the bottom and coasts of the sea. Ancient marks are traced upon the rocks, which indicate the former level of the waters, and these are now considerably above the surface of the sea. The Academy of Sciences at St. Petersburg has called to its attention the attention of Prince Menshikov, Minister of Marine, and instructions have accordingly been given to Captain Lieut. Bencke, who is charged with a survey of the coast of Finland, to observe with accuracy the present elevation of the existing marks above the level of the sea, and to make new marks in the rock at known heights to serve for a future observation.—Ibid.

PEAT AND FOSSIL TIMBER BELOW GRANITE.—A paper was lately read before the Geological Society, from Mr. E. J. in the neighbourhood of St. Peter's Cemetery, he found it necessary to have a well dug. At the depth of 42 feet from the surface, the workmen came to a block of granite, which they were bound to blast, and ascertained to be six feet in thickness. A few feet beneath the granite, they were surprised at finding small quantity of peat, with several pieces of fossil timber in its state of decay, and concealed by the soil. Specimens of these have been sent to the Society.—Ibid.

THE DUCK OF WELLINGTON'S BECK.—The extraordinary feeling in the despatch at business office, with no intervening day where pursuits to enrich upon business, for which he was ever remarkable, seems to us to be impugned to the morning paper;—First, never to postpone any thing in a spirit of procrastination, but may when postponement was expedient or indispensable; second, to give the preference on every subject to honest practical views over ingenious subtleties; third, to be guided in dealings of all kinds, by fairness, moderation, and justice; and, fourth, to regard dishonour more as a loss, except in very special cases. Edinburgh Review.

WEEK INDIA.—In the November papers we observe a letter from Mr. Sturge to the British Emancipator, stating that he had been told that the Emancipator had been named from Kansas the last day of the October, as a new Mission conference. This letter is forwarded to the Editors, British Emancipator. It is not, and the same counter, and probably to Jamaica and Hayti. Their investigation was particularly directed to it. In the last, and the previous to the last Legislature, Councils and Magistrates. The conduct of the liberal and negroes in their own circumstances; and it is to what further measures are requisite to promote their future welfare, and to what and religious advancement. The expense of the Mission will not detract from private subscription. It has been suggested, as before, by a strong appreciation that attempts which are made as far as possible to satisfy the emancipation of the negroes, by venal and poor laws and police regulations.

MR. O'CONNELL AND MR. STEVENSON.—The British Emancipator observes:—"The American Ambassador has at length answered Mr. O'Connell's letter, and denies being a promoter of slaves for sale and traffic," which was the heaviest part of the allegation referred to by Mr. O'Connell. A slaveholder and a slave-breeder he is; only not "for sale and traffic." He has the chivalry also to make a similar denial on behalf of the state of Virginia. Upon this point we beg to place his testimony in juxtaposition with that of Thomas Jefferson Randolph, whom the Virginia legislature of 1832, declared, "that this state had been converted into one grand manumission, where men are reared for market, like oxen for the slaughter." We see, however, by the New York Emancipator of the 4th and 11th of October, that this affair is creating a strong sensation on the other side of the water, in which a seven-leagued foot of General Hamilton, who was to have been Stevenson's second in a duel with a man who he knew would not fight, and who has been compelled to apologise for the insult and braggar, (and of his letter, whereby Virginia slaveholders, has not a little contributed. These representatives of the cause of freedom have committed an offence not easily pardoned, to admitting that the charge of being a slave-breeder "for sale and traffic" is a calumny. To please to this, it seems, that should have been avoided and ignored in the Emancipator says very correctly, "If Mr. Stevenson has not made himself a party to the correspondence, he has made himself look most abominable the one." We leave this gentleman in the hands of his countrymen.

AUSTRALASIA.

DEATH OF REV. S. MARSDEN.—By a letter received by the General Missionary Society from the Rev. William Cooper, dated Sydney, May 10, 1839, we learn that one of the oldest, and most beloved and valued of the friends and co-laborers of the Society, has been at length called to his eternal rest. Mr. Cooper writes:—

On Saturday morning, the 12th instant, at Windsor, after a short illness, he passed to that more illustrious life. He was a dear and beloved friend and co-laborer in Christ, the Rev. Samuel Marsden. He had nearly attained his 74th year, and had been about forty-five years a minister of that Gospel which afforded him sure comfort under every trial, while passing through the vicissitudes of a troublesome world; strong consolation in the prospect of death and eternity; and a hope that of immortality. His burial remains were on day interred in the family vault at Parramatta. His funeral was very numerous, and most respectfully attended. There were present the chief and other officers of the several Departments of the Colonial Government, and as many of the Colonial Clergymen as traded within a convenient distance; also Ministers of other Denominations; military officers, merchants, and private gentlemen from Sydney, Liverpool, Windsor, Parramatta, and other places; and a large portion of the respectable population of the colony, to bear the funeral service, and to testify their dutiful and joyful regard for the memory of their deceased Pastor.

Mr. Cooper adds:—

By the removal of Mr. Marsden, the Mission in general, and the Church Missionary Society in particular, have lost a sincerely attached and zealous friend. His heart was much engaged in the cause of Christian Missions; especially for the evangelization of the South-Sea Islanders. He laboured long as the Society's friend and agent, to establish the Mission in New Zealand; and before his death he had the delightful satisfaction to behold, at his last visit, the saving and happy effects of the Gospel among the natives of that land, in which the Mission was commenced, under his direction, about twenty-four years ago. He has now entered into the everlasting joy of his Redeeming Lord. May we follow him, as he followed Christ! Then, being found faithful unto death, we also shall receive the Crown of Life.—Missionary Register.

REPLY OF GOVERNMENT ON THE RESUMPTION QUESTION.—We have published in another part of our present number, the reply of Government to the Letter of the Landholder's Society, on the subject of the Resumption.

It is a satisfactory consideration that the important question now at issue between Government and its subjects has been so fully discussed in all its various bearings; that Native ingenuity has been so well seconded by European talent of a very high order; and that every argument which could be gleaned from the presumed pledges of Government, from the analogy of ancient precedents, or from the broad principles of general policy, has been brought forward and applied with fearlessness and ability. Siriban has any matter in which the Natives were interested, enjoyed the benefit of so complete an investigation. The whole subject is now before the public, and a fair estimate may be formed of the justice or injustice of those measures by which Government is endeavouring to protect its own interests. The question will at no distant period be appealed to England, where it is likely to excite an earnest discussion; and it is chiefly in reference to this ulterior proceeding that we rejoice in the ample measure of investigation which it has enjoyed in this country. It cannot after this be advanced, that the petitioners appealing to England have not possessed sufficient opportunity of making the most of their case; or that they have fallen victims to a partial and one-sided view of the matter. If their claims should break down on the appeal to England, it will not be for lack of the most zealous exertions, or of the most able advocacy.

A careful perusal of the reply of Government convinces us, that it affords a full and ample refutation of all the objections which have been taken to the present measures. The strong line of argument adopted by the public authorities, places their case on high vantage ground. The ordeal through which it has passed, has only served to give it additional strength. In no instance have the petitioners been able to sustain a charge against Government for a violation of the public faith. The appeal which the reply makes to the declarations of former administrations, shows that the present measure is in strict analogy with the proceedings of the British authorities since 1764. It has been fully shewn, that the exemption from all taxation which the Landholders claim, for a portion of land yielding an annual revenue of a million sterling, is founded upon no title obtained, except in very few instances, from the Emperor or his Viceroys. It is incontrovertible, that forty-nine out of fifty of the rent-free tenures have been created by a collusion with inferior officers, who were intrusted with the collection of the public revenue, and who took advantage of the confusion of the times to alienate it. It is manifest that these officers possessed no higher authority for disposing of the funds of the State, than a Collector of a Zillah under the British Government. The charge brought against Government, moreover, that special tribunals had been erected for the adjustment of their cases, under the impression that they would lend more to might than to right, is refuted by a reference to the numberless instances in which they have decided against Government. The outcry which has been raised, does not proceed, therefore, upon any substantiated charge of illegality or violated pledges. It is referable to that natural impotence of taxation, which Lord Castlereagh was once so ill-judged us to call impertinent, but which is felt quite as much by Englishmen as by Natives. The same feelings which now disquiet the country, would equally have been called into existence in 1793, had the measures of Lord Cornwallis, for asserting the rights of the State, been pursued with vigour and with any degree of success.

The gist of the present complaints lies in the amount of the assessment; and we are inclined to think that it would be well for all parties in the State, if some plan of compromise could be set on motion, by which the tenures should be surrendered without discussion, upon the pledge of a lenient assessment. It would be well if the necessity could be avoided of setting up Exchequer Courts throughout the country, in which the State and the people are brought into a very ungracious collision. We could wish, moreover, that Government was saved, not only the odium, but the labour of those investigations which precede Resumption, and which now draw off so large a portion of the public talent of the service from the departments of civil and criminal justice. We could wish the rent-free holders to be exempted from the anxiety and the expense, to which they are necessarily subjected, in their attempts to secure exemption from contributing to the public burdens. But a compromise of this nature must be proposed by others; and what body stands in so advantageous a position for attempting a fair mediation, as the Landholder's Society? There can be little doubt that after every effort on its part in this country has failed, it will appeal the cause to England; and we cannot, after a perusal of the powerful arguments by which the cause of Government is supported, after then any flattering hopes of success. Would it not be more advisable for this Society, instead of prolonging the war for four or five years more, to make a bold and vigorous effort to save the country so many years of distraction, and to lay a foundation for the lasting gratitude of posterity, by throwing all its weight into the scale of conciliation?

THE DEBATE AT THE INDIA HOUSE.—The last overland mail has brought the report of a debate at the India House, in which Mr. Montgomery Martin took the field against the British Government of India, and gave an historical survey of the miseries which it had inflicted on this unhappy country. If his facts are correct and his reasoning sound, it must be self evident, that of all the barbarous invasions with which this country has been visited, by far the most disastrous has been that which transferred the sceptre to a Christian Government. "Our Government, however, is Christian in name only; in practice it is worse than that of the Mahomedans." It is true that it has not pulled down the Hindoo Temples, and cast the idols at the entrance of Mosques for the faithful to tread on; true it is that our Government has not adopted and acted on the principle, that whatever a public servant may accumulate, belongs on his death to the sovereign. It has not defiled its hands with the diabolical cruelties which rendered the Mahomedan government odious to men and angels—but during the brief period of sixty-five years, it has been the cause of no fewer than nine famines; not to mention the two great famines, that of 1770 and of 1833, which the orator has accidentally omitted. It is true that the British Government has not attached to the office of the Board of Revenue a large pond filled with every species of abominable filth and ordure, through which revenue defaulters are dragged with a rope, and which by way of derision is called Itkyoontu, or Hea-ahut;—but by its notorious conduct in India, it has caused the failure of all the old mercantile firms or a ruin, not far short of six millions sterling; and it is owing to the same pernicious influence of the British Government that the said houses have not been able to pay more than five shillings in the pound. There is one crime which Mr. Montgomery Martin has forgotten to place in his catalogue, we mean the Poli Plague, which may be laid at the door of Government with quite as much regard to truth and justice as the nine famines and the six hundred millions.

The description of these enormities, which have no parallel in the history even of the empire of China, letting alone civilized nations, arouses all the latent benevolence of Mr. Martin's character. His sympathy for the suffering millions of India kindles as he proceeds into the sublimest exaltation; and he declares, before all the Directors and Proprietors, that "he would freely place his head on the block, if by such a sacrifice he could secure a practical land settlement in India." This is true, genuine, high-souled, disinterested generosity. For Mr. Martin happens to know nothing of the people in the Western Provinces, for whom he is surely to perish on the scaffold. His connection with India extends little beyond the circumference of the Ditch. The people of India will, doubtless, feel infinitely obliged to him for this spontaneous offer of his head, though we almost fear that it is likely to benefit them just as little, after it has been laid down on the block, as while it continues on his wretched shoulders. But as this is the first instance in which any man has offered to die for India, we think the opportunity should not be lost of reversing such dispositions. The good folks in Calcutta should forthwith resolve for themselves they have given to Mr. Taitton or Mr. Crawford, you appoint Mr. Montgomery Martin their agent at one thousand pounds sterling a year. We would also recommend him to the formal attention of the Landholder's Society, of the formation of which he had, doubtless, heard, but we he offered to sacrifice his head for the interests of the 20 millions in India.

Mr. Montgomery Martin says, "We have wrung a thousand millions from India; and what have we given them in return? Famine! Famine! Famine!!! Thousands of human beings floating down the stream, poisoning the air with their effluvia, and rendering the water unuseful; and forty thousand square miles depopulated!" Now here are two very material errors in this appeal to the passions. In the first place Mr. Martin tells us, that we have wrung a thousand millions sterling from India; and in order to give the stamp of authority to this statement, he tells the Proprietors that he had waded through masses of documents. We, too, have waded through masses of documents, and find that from the day we touched Indian revenue to the last year, we have not drawn quite two-thirds of this sum. Three hundred crores of Rupees, more or less, is nothing when the object is to make up a round and impressive number. But before Mr. Martin can be adopted as a safe guide, he must make a better use of the masses of documents which pass through his hands. Secondly, as to the famine itself, which Government is represented as having bestowed, by way of tribute on the people of India, every body, except the Editor of the Reformer knows, that it arose from the visitation of Providence, and not from the base and detestable malignity of the public authorities in India. Why, the fact is, that this famine, which has desolated the Provinces of the West, so far from having been brought about by the satanic agency of Government, has afforded an opportunity, which has not been neglected, of calling into exercise the noblest sympathies of our nature, and of drawing forth exertions from the authorities of the State, which will entitle them to the lasting gratitude of the country. The number of starving poor on whom the bestowed employment and food, in the limits of a single Commissionership, amounted, at the crisis of the calamity, not less than two hundred and fifty thousand a day. The same Government expended in a few short months, in reparation of revenue, and in actual disbursement of relief, amounted to four hundred thousand pounds. From a demagogue who can turn the circumstances of such a famine into a occasion of censure of the deepest, the blackest character, the Indian Government can have nothing to fear, and the people of India nothing to hope. Such wantonness of exaggeration can serve no other purpose than to reduce our hopes of a redress of real grievances.

Sir Charles Forbes supported Mr. Montgomery Martin's views. He said, "We had drawn enough from India in 40 years to pay off the national debt." Not, Sir Charles, three hundred millions sterling. We have been endeavouring to discover whether this assertion was intended to show up our injustice to India or to England. We almost incline to the opinion, that Sir Charles had reference to the injustice which we have thus committed against our own native land; in the absence of those feelings of patriotism which British statesmen ought to be animated, when they take the affairs of India in hand; and it must certainly move public indignation throughout our own beloved country, to find that so fair an opportunity of wiping out our national debt, from the revenues of India, has been so disgracefully neglected. But in this respect there is this to be said to extenuate the conduct of our statesmen in India, that they have implicitly followed the example set before them in England; for it is a fact, that the sum which has been extracted from the Natives of England in the last 40 years, has been more than equal to the payment of the national debt. But so blind have our former men been to the true interests of the country, that instead of applying this sum at once to the extinction of the debt, they have been frittering it away in paying the interest, and in the support of the national establishments.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN ABOLITIONIST PHRASE BOOK SOCIETY.—While Negro Emancipation was in progress, British philanthropy scarcely had leisure for any other object. But that great measure having been attained, and now needing only to be watched and guided in the development of its results, the national benevolence seeks for new citizens. The long and arduous struggle for liberty to the slave has wrought a noble good for the world. It has made pity for human slavery a national principle. It has spread it through all ranks, and every corner of the land. It has trained a successive generation to its exercise; and it has brought out a moral energy and power for the accomplishment of its objects which has proved irresistible. The philanthropy of England cannot now sink quietly into inaction; and it will have ill with any evil, however strong and well supported, against which it sees itself.

The Aborigines Protection Society, which has not been in existence more than a couple of years, seems likely, in a short time, to occupy the place of the Slavery Abolition Society. Its originators were amongst their chief men; and their objects form a sort of natural generalization from the particular case of the negroes. "The title of the Society," says a writer in the Eclectic Review, "explains its object, which is sought to be attained by collecting information from all parts of the world, upon whatever materially affects uncivilized tribes of men in their intercourse with white people, and by making that information known to the public through the press, or to the Government and Parliament by personal appeals, whenever redress of their grievances, or improvement in the laws and administrations concerning them may be needed." The Society then contends with the cruel oppression springing from prejudice of colour, the pride of knowledge and power, and grasping selfishness; and that is met in all the colonies of our widely extending empire.

The tribes which have already attracted the attention of the society, are the Red Indians of America, the Africans of the Cape, the South Sea Islanders, and the Hindoos. To our quarter of the world the Society appears to have been drawn by the association of slavery. The settlement of the future condition of the liberated negroes of the West was embarrassed by the imputation of our unhappy Coolies. They, and the country they came from, were thus forced upon attention. Besides, when African Slavery was extinguished, it was naturally asked, where else the monstrous evil was in existence, and could be riveted and destroyed; and the West India Planters were amongst the first and loudest in calling for destruction on the Slavery of India. The Cooly Trade, and Indian Slavery, in all its kinds and degrees, will now, therefore, be treated with little tenderness; and we warn the shewers of either to prepare for rough handling. It is impossible to say to what other Indian evils the society may extend its notice. Certain it is they may find a sufficiency of them for labour. The Opium monopoly and trade we should think will not long escape their attention. It is an abuse of it above, that one nation should draw a large portion of its revenues from the systematic demoralization of another, whose weakness makes it the victim of foreign rapacity. The Exchequer of India itself may likewise be brought under examination; and if so, it is not probable that a Government so unscrupulous in corrupting the subjects of another power, will appear to have been particularly careful of the morals of its own. When profit from the encouragement of vice can be sought and enjoyed with satisfaction, any shew about the virtues will soon be cast aside.

The Aborigines Society, at present, however, are chiefly occupied with the interests of the South African tribes, and the South Sea Islanders. At the Cape, colonization has long been advancing on a system of extreme wickedness; and the redskins are now reaping the fruits. Year after year retaliation comes upon them in irruptions and massacres by the Native tribes. Their houses and all dear to them are, therefore, possessed in fear and uncertainty; and the expenditure and supplies necessary for maintaining a frontier warfare, besides impoverishing the colony generally, drain Cape Town of the chief means of its foreign traffic. Ships find provisions there so high-priced, that every sacrifice is made to save the necessity of calling there to renew their stock. In mercy to the colony something effectual must be done, not by arms, but by legislation and benevolent policy, to change its character and circumstances.

The South Sea Islanders of New South Wales and New Zealand, require protection, if possible, still more urgently. In that direction the tide of British colonization is now setting with amazing force; and it will either overwhelm the Native tribes, or bear them on to the elevation of free and civilized men. "In the last twenty-four years, the number of emigrants has increased from an average of 5,000 a year, the amount during the ten first years, after the general peace, to 50,000 a year, during the five years ending 1831, and to 70,000 a year in the last five years; and of 694,969, who have emigrated in the last thirteen years, 493,818 have gone in the last six years. This increase, too, is likely to prove the beginning only of a still more wonderful augmentation of the number of colonial emigrants: A great future field. Asia-tralia east, north, west, and south is scarcely yet opened, and in one colony there. Now South Wales, the provision of means of emigration in the sale of crown lands, has already in five years sprung from 18,000 to 180,000 per annum."

From such a state of things we cannot but hope for vast improvement in the eastern hemisphere. How altered will be the relations of its northern and southern portions within another century! Yet it is much to be wished that the new empire in the South could grow up in a uniform character of benign influence upon the Native races. Its rise upon their extermination is abhorrent to every feeling of humanity. "It seems to be an opinion founded rather on experience," says the Report of the Society, "than on any essential principle in the nature of the case, that the coloured races must inevitably perish, as civilization and christianity advance. Whatever past facts may be, and unquestionably they are painful enough, they are not evidence that in better scheme of civilization can be found compatible with the safety and improvement of the Aborigines. We cannot admit the doctrine that the establishment of a civilized community in the neighbourhood of uncivilized tribes, must be injurious to the latter, without supposing something extremely defective and improper in the regulations and principles of the former. Let there be error and the evil must be diminished."

Whilst the Ministers of the Crown are disposed to cling to the old ways and maxims of colonization, it appears that the views of the Aborigines Society meet with acceptance amongst the parties who are most deeply engaged in founding and extending the new colonies. In the case of South Australia provision is promised for obtaining land from the Natives by treaty; for reserving one-fifth of it for their use; for protecting them by a special agent; for making their subsistence a charge on the new colony; for instructing them; for building asylums for them; and for taking means to teach them habits of industry. The New Zealand Bill, which has not yet passed, but most probably will, "besides winning some of their points, has a provision of great importance for the relative comfort and respectability of the Native Chiefs during their difficult progress towards civilization." In fostering the spirit by which such provisions are dictated, the society have ample scope for usefulness. Their progress we shall watch with much interest, and report from time to time to our readers.

ADEN.—The Atalanta has brought intelligence of the capture of Aden by the troops of the Honourable Company, after an obstinate resistance on the part of the Arabs, whose loss in killed and wounded did not fall short of a hundred and fifty. The casualties among the British troops did not reach a tenth of that number. It appears that the place had been voluntarily ceded by the Arab Chief to the British, for the payment of 8,000 Rupees a year; but the violation of his engagement, and the resort which he compelled us to make to arms, has liberated our Government from the pecuniary obligation, and Aden is now become unconditionally a British port. It is the first acquisition of territory made under the reign of Queen Victoria, and we are happy to perceive that the captors have determined to present Her Majesty with the four brass guns, three of sixty-four pounders, and one of sixty-eight, which have fallen into their hands.

The possession of this spot on the Coast of Arabia is at the present moment of no small political importance. But it is in a commercial point of view that its permanent value is to be estimated. Situated in the vicinity of no active trade, capable of great augmentation, it is likely, from the favourable character of its harbour, but still more from the protection of the British flag, to attract a large portion of that commerce by which Mocha and Jadda have been enriched. It would be no matter of surprise to find it altogether supersede those ports, and attract to its own emporium the valuable coffee of the entire coast. On the other hand, it cannot fail to afford facilities for pouring British manufactures into the extensive country, of which it stands on the foreground. For the first time in the lapse of many centuries, Arabia will witness the establishment of a free port in its bosom, in which mercantile transactions may be carried on with unlimited confidence; and it is impossible that the commerce of that country should not feel the invigorating influence of this novel principle of security. The intercourse between it and Bombay, and whenever the comprehensive scheme may be adopted, between it and all India, conducted with a steady and uninterrupted regularity, cannot fail to contribute largely to its prosperity. It will, of course, be immediately constituted our coal depot at the entrance of the Arabian Gulf, and become the rendezvous of our Steamers; a circumstance which will necessarily give us an uncontrolled supremacy in those seas.

VILLAGE BOUNDARIES.—We have been favoured with a little brochure, entitled a "Memorandum on Indian Village Boundaries, by a HINDOO CIVIL SERVANT." The subject is one of great importance to the country, and deserves the particular attention of the public authorities; for the interests both of the people and of the state are deeply involved in it. The want of well defined boundaries is the fruitful source of local litigation and tumult. In the Tipperah district, owing to the absence of fixed limits, the proverb, till a very recent period in every month, was, Jaher latih, tar-ho mathi; which may be translated, he that could employ the club, enjoys the land. The same remark is equally applicable to all the old settled districts of Bengal. In the Zemindar of Shroepore it has been justly remarked, that "in consequence of these boundary disputes, more murders have been perpetrated, more villages have been laid waste, more heads have been broken, more houses have been fractured, more lambs have been used, more bodies have been dug out of the grave, to charge people with murders that have never been committed, than have occurred in any other part of the country." A regard to the interests of the community would seem to call for active and persevering efforts to terminate so disastrous a state of things. But the interests of Government are equally involved in the question; and this is aptly illustrated by a writer whom the Bengal Civilian quotes. "By the mode of settlement in Bengal, every Zemindar has a fixed jumma or rent; but generally speaking, the boundaries are but ill defined. It is evident that if the boundaries are disputed by one Zemindar, and he establishes his right by fraud to a neighbour's estate; or if two neighbouring Zemindars should collusively effect this through a Decree of Court, the estate robbed of part of its land, though less valuable, being still liable to the same jumma, will, probably, be, in the first instance, confiscated for arrears of revenue, and ultimately Government will be obliged to reduce the revenue demanded from it, while the fraudulent neighbour enjoys his additional village at the old rate."

In the settlement of the North Western Provinces, the greatest exertions have been made, and with success, to obtain separate and scientific definitions of the limits of villages. In the settlement of the disputes which arose, the most solemn adjuration was often employed; and so obtain a conscientious confession of the truth, the litigant has sometimes been called to "walk bare-footed over the ground he indicated as his boundary, with his hand on his son's head, after having been sworn by a Brishman, under purification, and performed other equally binding ceremonies."

The writer proceeds to describe the vague and unsatisfactory manner in which surveys and measurements are made by the Natives, whom the Courts employ in this duty, and which never serve to terminate litigation. He has given a map of a village, containing a thousand beegahs, most whimsically irregular, and of which no knowledge which the Native is possessed of, would ever enable him to furnish a map even approaching to accuracy. The remedy for this state of things he proposed to effect by the very simple process of constraining the Native surveyor to proceed in the more scientific mode of drawing up his boundary survey on a sheet of paper, divided into squares, to each of which a fixed dimension should be assigned. The full squares would give a fixed quantity; and the broken squares on the extremity would give the dimensions of the 'oddsets,' and thus furnish an accurate statement of the village under examination. Among the various advantages attending this mode of survey, one would be, the permanent value of such a record. Under the old system, when the dimensions of every corner and angle were put down in figures, ample room was afforded for alterations and interpolations. When the boundary was marked by a certain house, or tree, or ridge of earth artificially thrown up, the demolition of the house, tree, or ridge effectually nullified the value of the survey, and threw the whole question anew into a state of oriental confusion. But a survey drawn up in squares of equal amount cannot be tampered with. We wish we could transfer the map of this improved survey to our pages, because it would at once carry conviction to the mind of the reader. The value of the author's suggestions is not diminished by the modesty with which he says, "I am aware that there is nothing new in this recommendation, which consists of the application of the simple rules of mapping, the delineation of the points, or the simplest problem in geometry. But its application to Native surveying is new,"—and herein consists the merit of the recommendation.

But how is the reform to be introduced? The old Patwarrees and Amcees will plead that their forefathers knew nothing of this mode of measuring by squares; and they will not admit it. Their hereditary abhorrence of innovation will prove an insuperable barrier to the progress of any improvement among them. The reform must be effected by men who have been trained up by ourselves. Native youths ought to be placed up in a Surveyor's Institution, under the instruction of public officers; and one or two of them should be attached to every Zillah Court in the province, to be employed whenever there may be occasion for their services. A salary of twenty or thirty Rupees a month, occasionally improved by fees from those who benefit by their services, would serve to make this branch of the service respectable and efficient.

CALCUTTA MECHANICS INSTITUTION AND SCHOOL OF ARTS.—The majority of our readers will have learnt from the daily papers that this Institution was established, at a public meeting held in the Town Hall, last Tuesday week. The chair was taken by Sir J. P. Grant, who advocated the cause of the Institution with great power. He was followed by a number of other speakers, whose addresses appear to have rendered the meeting a very interesting one. The points chiefly urged, were the rude state of the arts amongst the Natives, calling for the application of European science and experience to their improvement; the mistaken partiality of the East Indians for the mere use of the pen as the means of livelihood, to be rectified by exhibiting the mechanical arts in connection with the solidest triumphs of science, as well as the source of personal respectability and independence; and, though last, not least, the general advantage to the community of easy and constant access to the instruction and enjoyment of scientific lectures. All these topics admitted of extensive illustration, and received it; and the application was simple and direct. The Institution was formed amidst universal applause.

Books for enrolling the names of members, and the donations of benefactors were upon the table; but from the crowd, and confusion on the breaking up of the assembly, they were of only partial use. We are happy to find that the number of subscribers has now reached nearly to a hundred; and the donations amount to 850 Rs. Both will rapidly increase when the Institution has fairly begun its operations; and we gladly add our recommendation of it to those of our contemporaries; who are numerous in its praise. Four pieces of apparatus for exhibiting experiments in galvanism, which are in excellent condition, have been presented by a gentleman, whose example we trust will be followed by many others. These important apparatus, of no value to the present owners, may be turned to great account in the Institution, and will be received with thanks. So will even old volumes of books, and still more, complete works; and by such contributions many may find an opportunity of doing good at a very easy rate.

The Editor of the Herkara has very appropriately brought to remembrance a small tract published by the late Mr. Kyt, in 1821, entitled "Thoughts how to better the condition of the Indo-British;" and it less than an hour after his paper was published, a copy was sent to the Secretary of the Institution for its use. The tract itself does not exceed 33 pages, and we remember that 50 pages of No. V. of the Quarterly Friend of India were devoted, by the late Dr. Robinson, to the notice of it. The Institution shall be welcome to a copy of that likewise; and they will together form an interesting memorial of departed labourers in the cause; which is now, we hope, to be occupied with greater and happier effect.

The Mechanics Institutions in our Native land have wrought a great change in the character of the working classes. Their influence has not been always beneficial; but, on the whole, it has been eminently so. In some cases the humble associations of unlettered Mechanics have grown into magnificent Institutions, worthy almost of ranking amongst Colleges. An example of this we have seen in Liverpool. There the Mechanics Institution is a noble edifice, with a theatre for Scientific lectures capable of accommodating a thousand persons, and an extensive suit of rooms for separate classes of pupils. In the theatre, two evening lectures are delivered every week in complete courses, by eminent Professors engaged in succession for the purpose. Annual subscribers of a guinea are entitled to attend all these lectures without further payment; and instruction in the private classes is had, in every branch of English, classical, and scientific education, as well as most of the modern languages of Europe, from first rate masters on extremely low terms. Moreover, after the instruction of the Mechanics themselves had been provided for, the wants of their children were taken into consideration; and last year there was added to the Institution a public school of a more complete and comprehensive character than we have ever seen elsewhere. Its Head Masters are men from the English Universities, of the first attainments.

Their salaries are liberal and consistent with their standing as scholars. They were guaranteed for a certain period by some of the wealthy and enlightened merchants of the town; but the scheme was so well devised and executed, that the school-rooms were at once filled; and the guarantee will be found, we believe, unnecessary. We need scarcely add that neither the theatre nor the school-rooms of this Institution are occupied solely by Mechanics and their children. Crowds of ladies and gentlemen of the first respectability are constantly to be found there, and the pupils in the schools are of every rank; but the rich in no way interfere with the privileges of the poor. On the contrary, to their support is chiefly to be attributed the astonishing prosperity of the Institution.

We have not introduced this example from the idea that the Calcutta Institution has any chance of running a similar course. The circumstances of the two are wholly different. But the Liverpool Mechanics Institution is one, of which, after some considerable acquaintance, we have heard of no evil consequence or influence whatever, but which we have seen to be most efficient in doing good; and this character we believe it has attained by its systematic and independent mode of proceeding. It accepts of no gratuitous or gratuitous instruction, and, therefore, leaves no scope for wrangling and debate, or any concealed display of small wits. So far we recommend an imitation of its example in Calcutta. After the Committee have excited attention by a few introductory lectures, let them engage their own lecturers and masters, and occupy the pupils' entirely with their instructions, and none of their own spoutings.

In some cases, Mechanics Institutions have proved exceedingly mischievous by becoming schools of prejudice. We hope this will be carefully avoided in Calcutta. There could be no more unsuitable place than the new Institution for discussions of doctrinal, heretical, or religious controversy; but the natural sciences which are taught there, will be barren of the richest gratification and benefit properly belonging to it, if it be unenriched by the just and sublime corollaries of natural theology.

WEEKLY EPIPHONE OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 28.

The Mail for which we have been looking out with anxiety for the last two days, had not made its appearance last evening.—An alteration, beneficial to the public, has just been made in the rules of the Bank for Savings. Formerly, as soon as the deposits reached 500 Rs. they were transferred to the four per cent. loan; and as this loan is now at a discount of five or six per cent., depositors were subject to a great loss when they had occasion to sell out. It is now ordered that one clear month shall be allowed the depositor, after his savings shall have reached 500 Rs., for declaring his intentions; and that he is at liberty to direct his deposit to be invested in any class of the public securities at the rate of the day.—Letters from Shah Soojah's camp state, that after having crossed the Indus, the officers of his contingent expected to enjoy some weeks of repose for completing the discipline of the troops; but in consequence of the opposition of the Ameer of Hyderabad, a portion of the troops has been ordered to march down the right bank of the river, to co-operate with the Bengal troops marching on the left on Hyderabad.—Letters from Sikarpore of the 2d February, set at rest all fears respecting Mr. Mcnaghten's safety. He has not been put to death by the Chief of Cabul, but arrived on that date in good health and spirits at Sikarpore, and was received with the salute due to his rank.—Messrs. Cockerell and Co. are about to employ a Native practitioner, selected from the Pupils of the Medical College, for the medical treatment of the Natives in their employ; an example which we would earnestly recommend to all those who have large establishments of Native workmen.—

The Principal Snider Ammunition of East Borneo has been declared guilty of conduct which disqualifies him hereafter for serving Government.—The Harbours enters his protest against his employment of Col. Presgrave, in succession to Major (Edmunds), at the Admiralty, upon the strength of an old Order of Government, which limits that situation to officers of the Engineers or the Artillery.—The Earl of Bath has received orders for completing his marching establishment. It is supposed that the illness of Rung et Singh is the cause, and that the Ferozepore troops will march on to Lahore.

FRIDAY, MARCH 5.

The Atlantis has at length made her appearance at Bombay, with London Mails to the 25th December. Had she waited a week a day later, she would, in all probability, have brought intelligence thirteen days later, which was hourly expected through France, on the day of her departure. The number of passengers arrived on her is twenty-three, besides eleven Engineers for the Indian Navy.—The price of one lakh of Rupees drawn yesterday, fell to the share of Col. Nicholson, of the 6th.—The Society of Arts has offered a premium of £50, to any person who shall successfully cultivate the Tea Plant in the East Indies, or in any British Colony, to the extent of five acres.—Mr. Robert Williams, of the Civil Service, has been appointed to officiate as Post Master General, during the absence of Mr. George Alexander.—This day Capt. Currie has made his debut as Editor of the Courier, in a small address. The retiring Editor gives his old Master's one piece of advice; that they will abstain from padding in the matter of the Editor's ship, and distinctly states that for six months all sorts of padding have been going on to mislead him, and to bring in some one else.—A Commission, de l'Inde des Indes, was held on the 27th, to enquire into the state of Crossin's Fund's interests. Mr. L. Clarke and Mr. Osburn, Commissioners. Former a Jernon of respectable rank were empanelled, who found that he had been of unequal mind, and incapable of managing his affairs for the last year.—The presents sent to Ranjeet Singh by Louis Philippe, through General Ventura, and which have been added at Bombay, occupy one hundred and sixty packages.

SATURDAY, MARCH 6.

Mahomed Ali, of Egypt, thirty-two years of age, has proceeded into the inland regions in the southern extremity of his dominions, in search of a gold mine which some German Discoverers have persuaded him they have discovered.—The French Government has proposed a General Congress of persons deputed by all the European Governments to devise "a uniform system of quarantine regulation, founded on actual necessity, and calculated for general adoption." The British Government has offered its cordial co-operation in the scheme.—Mr. Roper has been appointed to the bench at Bombay.—It is stated in letters received by the present Mail, that Mr. Turing had determined to return to this country to his practice at the Calcutta bar.—A third translation of the Arabian Nights' Entertainment, intended as a standard family edition, has just been announced in England, by the Rev. E. Forster.—The Calcutta affair has excited some little attention in England. The Spectator has a long article on the subject; and rather severely has banished the learned Judge's allusion to Mr. Gaitly's "high and ancient family."—It is stated that two of the Steamers which were intended originally by the Court of Directors for our rivers, are now to be sent to navigate the Indus. Arrangements have been made with seventeen Engineers, of whom eleven have already arrived at Bombay. The engines for the Victoria Steamer, now building at Bombay, which have been manufactured by Napier, of Glasgow, were engaged to be shipped on the 10th of January. The freight agreed on was not less than 2000*l*.

MONDAY, MARCH 4.

Intelligence has been received from Herat, stating that Lieut. Pottinger had accommodated all his differences with Shah Karwan, and had regained entirely his influence over him.—The Russian Agent, Vilcoitch, who has been so long in Candahar, stirring up the Natives against the British, has retired to his own country, as he says, to report progress to his master; this is the same active intriguer whom Colonel Burnes discovered at Cabul.—The papers just received from Bombay state, that great anxiety prevailed regarding the Semiramis Steamer, which had then been several days due.—A letter from Loonahall, dated the 15th February, states that Ranjeet Singh's health is in a very precarious state, and that he is much worse than when the Governor General was at Lahore. The two Ministers which were ordered to accompany Colonel Wale across the Indus, have been stopped by Ranjeet Singh's people, who said that no order had been issued on the subject; which clearly shows that in consequence of the illness of Ranjeet, his Sikhs do what they choose.—A letter from the 19th N. I. states, that in the march of that corps from Cutch to Allahabad, not a single casualty has occurred.—Further particulars have been received of the death of General Anand. He was first attacked while reviewing the French Legion at Peshawar, with severe vomiting, and was immediately carried to his tent, where he received every attention from Dr. Lord, of the British Service. He rallied on the third or fourth day, but was subsequently seized with the same symptoms, and fell a victim to the disease eight days after he was attacked.

TUESDAY, MARCH 5.

It appears from the Bombay papers, that the Semiramis Steamer is high and dry in a field of clover at Juggon, on the Kattwar Coast, and serious apprehensions are entertained that she cannot be got off. The Adiantum Steamer, and H. M. ship, Wilhelmy, have been sent to her aid. On the return of the last vessel, she is to be sent up the Persian Gulf, to infuse a salutary feeling into the minds of the Persian authorities. The intelligence which was received some time ago of the hostile disposition of the King of Persia, does not appear to be corroborated by the information recently obtained. It is stated with great confidence, that an embassy from Persia, bearing presents to the Queen of England, has arrived at Constantinople.—The Bombay troops have commenced their march to Sikarpore, without crossing the river to Hyderabad. A few of the officers have been permitted to visit that capital, which they describe as a miserable assemblage of huts.—The Sixteenth Annual Meeting of the Parent Teachers Institution was held on Sunday last, when a gratifying report of its progress was read, and ordered to be printed.—The Madras and Bombay papers are beginning to cry out again at the system of Government established by the last Charter; and the community at the latter place has determined to petition the Home Authorities to invest its subordinate Governments with such a moderate share of independent power, as will enable them to provide for the exigencies of the community under their rule.—The official reports of our gallant affair at Aden are given in the papers of this day.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 6.

The Annual Meeting of the Proprietors of, and the Subscribers to, the Calcutta Public Library, was held at the Library Rooms, on Monday last, when a report of progress was made, in the highest degree satisfactory.—The Singapore of yesterday announced the arrival of the Sir Edward Ryan, from China, the 26th January; but we cannot expect to obtain any intelligence from her before we go to press.—Another extensive fire has broken out at Port Louis, which has consumed no little property. The previous fire is said to have occasioned a loss of five hundred thousand piastres.—The latest account from Balkar is dated the 8th February, and appears in the Courier. Mr. Maenaghten is in the camp of Shah Sujah, at Sikarpore, and will advance towards Candahar as soon as the Bohn Pass is clear of snow, whether any part of our force can move with him or not. Such is the nature of the private intelligence from some officers of the Shah's Army. 21st U. A. M.—A despatch has just been received by Brigadier Roberts from the Commander-in-Chief, which countermands the orders for our advance to Hyderabad, and directs that we remain in our present position. In a private communication His Excellency informs the Brigadier that the Ameer has given in. I should not be surprised if we are ordered to return to Agra forthwith. We cannot live here during the hot weather, and Mr. Maenaghten will not require the Bombay Army and our own to settle Shah Sujah on the throne of Cabul."

THE LATEST EUROPEAN INTELLIGENCE.

The Atlantis, with intelligence from England to the 28th

December, arrived at Bombay on the 15th February; and her packages were received in Calcutta on Thursday last, the 28th.

Her Majesty the Queen of England was in excellent health.

Parliament was prorogued to the 5th February, when it was to meet for business.

Nothing certain can be gathered from the papers regarding the stability of the present Ministry. Various rumours were abroad, as usual, on the approach of a new Session, regarding the conditions by which it is said they proposed to strengthen themselves. It was again rumoured, that they would direct themselves of all connection with the Radicals, and with Mr. O'Connell, and form a junction with the more moderate Conservatives; but these rumours have been so frequently repeated, that they have lost all credibility. Lord Melbourne continues to enjoy, without abatement, the sunshine of Court favour. Lord Palmerston has declined to bring the question between Belgium and Holland to a final issue; and this circumstance, combined with the sagacity and vigour which he had displayed in the recent troubles with Austria and Turkey, has brought in a large accession of popular favour, and so far have contributed to the stability of the Ministry. It is not, therefore, unlikely, that in spite of all sinister prognostication they will jog on through another Session.

Lord Durham has returned to England, and is said to be silently brooding over the insults which induced him to throw up the Government of Canada. We may fully expect, therefore, an outbreak of indignant passion on the meeting of Parliament. We cannot discover from the papers that he has yet had an interview with the Queen, or has had his commission as Her Majesty's first. The Countess of Durham has resigned her situation of Lady of the Bed Chamber to the Queen, in a summary style, which it is not peculiar Her Majesty from smiling at to read it.

The expected outbreak in Canada has occurred, and has been promptly put down by the vigorous measures of Sir John Colborne, who has succeeded the Earl of Durham in the administration of those provinces. The insurgents consisted almost entirely of desperate characters from the American frontier, whom the Republican Government was unable to keep down. No Government will more effectively, or more judiciously, maintain its position in which Lord Durham is placed by the premature resignation of the Government, than the Canadian race of tranquillity under his successor.

Various attempts have been made by revolutionary demagogues to stir up the indignations of the manufacturing districts to revolt against the existing state of things. Several meetings have been held in Northampton, at which the most inflammatory speeches have been delivered by Mr. Thomas O'Connor and Mr. Stephens. The result has been too fatally visible in the burning down of a factory belonging to an obnoxious Magistrate, in which more than four hundred workmen were regularly employed. The Ministry have put forth a royal proclamation against these meetings.

Sir James Rivet Carnac was appointed Governor of Bombay. On the 19th he was sworn in at the India House; and under the impression that the war in India would, probably, interrupt the progress of Steamers in the Red Sea, has taken his passage for Bombay on the Thames Collette; and earnest, therefore, he expected to reach that Presidency before the beginning of June. Mr. M. T. Smith has been elected a Member of the Court of Directors in his stead.

Mr. Torson, it is said, will return to India, without delay, and resume his place at the Calcutta Bar.

It appears that Russia has given Her Majesty's Ministers the most pious assurances, but they do not appear to have obtained more credit; for we find that the Vorta along the British Coast might be considered as exposed to attacks from the Baltic, have been put in a state of defence, and that the most vigorous exertions were in progress for placing both the Army and the Navy on an efficient footing. England is evidently alive to the perils which Russia is making in all quarters of the globe to undermine the fabric of her commercial greatness and her political influence.

The Queen's party in Spain appear to have gained some successes over their opponents; but still no decisive movement has taken place which could in any measure decide the fate of either party. The merchants of Liverpool and London have presented addresses to Lord Melbourne, deprecating the atrocious state of things in the unhappy country.

The latest date of intelligence from Bombay, at the departure of the Scamper, was the 6th October, from Calcutta of the 22d September.

Mr. Buxley, of Stockton-upon-Tees, having urged Her Majesty's Ministers to send out a ship of war to Torres Straits, to search for the survivors of the unfortunate ship, Charles Eaton, a vessel was accordingly dispatched, and the son of Captain and Mrs. Buxley, who fell from his mother's arms at the moment when she, with the rest, was murdered, has been recovered and brought to England.

Sir James Allan Park, Bart., one of the Judges of the Common Pleas, died at the age of 70.

Sir John Lubbock has dissuaded the House of Assembly at Jamaica, on account of the turbulent conduct of that body, arising from dissatisfaction at a new law respecting prison discipline. Parliament, it would seem, has declared himself opposed to the extraordinary proceedings of his countrymen.

The amount of O'Connell's rent this year was £15,000.

The Company have at length determined to suspend their agency in China, after the present season; reserving to themselves the option of renewing it, should circumstances render the so doing expedient. They also this year limit their contributions through China to £200,000.

A correspondence between Lord William Bentinck, the Court of Directors, and Mr. Canning, the Chairman of the Committee for improving the communication with India, has lately been published. It takes its origin from a request made by the Legislature, to the Chairman of the Court of Directors and the President of the Board of Control, to carry out the comprehensive scheme of Sir C. Canning, namely by means of a Private Company, on the East India Company prior to their sum equivalent to the outlay on the expense of the present steam communication, for a period of ten years. The present steam communication is to be renewed, and extended only for the legitimate purposes, the supply of goods, and defence of our Indian Empire.

A letter, signed a Friend of the People, has been addressed to the Queen in India, in light of the specimen, a most extraordinary production, consisting of a letter to the Queen mainly as a periodical article, and according the Ministers of being alike devoid of ability and common honesty. It is generally given to Lord Brougham, but there is no apparent proof of his having the author.

The Indian Steam Ship Company have announced that their first vessel, the India, will be launched on the 2nd of January next, and be ready to take its station in the Thames by the middle of April. The vessel is built by Messrs. Scott and Sons, and the engines by Messrs. Scott and Stirling, of Greenwich. She is of 1,200 tons burden, with accommodation for eighty cabin passengers, and two tons of goods. She is provided with a safety apparatus, and built with two strong bulk-heads of plate-iron across the engine-room, in order to confine accidental fire, and prevent a leak springing in one division from spreading to another. It is also announced, that another vessel of 1,200 tons burden is on the stocks, and that a third will be ready within 18 months, and that three more are about to be commenced. With this number of vessels, it is expected that twelve voyages out and twelve voyages home will be performed in each year; allowing fifty-five days to accomplish the distance from Plymouth to Calcutta by the Cape of Good Hope.

Fifty-six of the principal banking firms in London have addressed a memorial to Mr. Spring Rice against the proposed delivery of letters on Sunday, at the General Post Office. They state that 'the quiet and domestic comfort which they, their clerks, and dependents have hitherto derived from the rest of Sunday, has been mainly secured to them by the total cessation of business at the London Post Office on that day.'

It is stated in a provincial journal to be the intention of the Roman Catholics to erect a magnificent Cathedral in London, and that 100 wealthy persons and commissioners are expected to subscribe £20,000 each towards it.

We beg to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of the following sums for the Friend of India:—

FAMINE REPORT.

21st.—It would not be just to conclude this Report without alluding to the important and valuable assistance which has been derived from the members of the several Relief Societies formed at the different Stations, as well as from individual philanthropy. The superintendence of the vast sums which the munificent benevolence of all India kept supplying with an almost exhausted stream, for the support of the distressed in the North Western Provinces, was a work of great anxiety and toil; the sums noted below, (A) indicate the amount disbursed by Charitable Societies, independent of the Government funds. From the Presidency of Bombay the remittances were quite enormous, whilst those from Calcutta were likewise very considerable. As the Agra Relief Society publish a Report of their transactions, and as this subject will be more particularly and more properly noticed therein, I will not enlarge on it here. I must, however, state that, individually and collectively, the majority of the European residents at the different Stations, and in the interior, have evinced a willingness, assiduity, and co-operation highly creditable to themselves, and of inestimable advantage to the objects of their solicitude; for, even in the distribution of charity, peculation could not be prevented, and was occasionally discovered in each of the Districts; indeed, the Magistrates found themselves unable to confide in the honesty of those in whom, of necessity, the daily payments were vested; examples were met in some cases, but the fact is a melancholy reproach on the Native character. In Futtygarh, the chief distribution of the charity, I believe, was undertaken by Captain Wholer, of the 34th Regiment Native Infantry. Those in Mynpoore, by Mr. A. W. Begbie, the Civil and Sessions Judge. In Muttra, by a Committee of gentlemen. In Agra by the Relief Society. Here I cannot, however, refrain from pointing alluding to the individual and unreserved exertions of the Reverend J. Moore, an ordained Missionary at Agra, who voluntarily at a great risk of his life, and a total sacrifice of personal consideration, toiled through the oppressive heat for days, for weeks, for months, assiduously directing the distribution of the public charity, and superintending the management of the Asylum; such services can hardly be rewarded; they cannot be estimated by those who did not witness their importance; they have gained for the individual the lasting gratitude of thousands, and are worthy of the direct notice of the Indian Government. In Etawah, by Mr. J. Cumine, the Collector and Magistrate.

22nd.—It is proper I should distinctly name the public functionaries who have, by their exertions during the past most trying season, carried into effect the humane intentions of Government:—

"In Muttra, .....	Mr. W. H. Tyler and the late Mr. Crawford.
"Agra, .....	Messrs. Mansel and Alexander.
"Furruckabad, .....	Messrs. Robinson and R. Campbell.
"Mynpoore, .....	Messrs. E. Tyler and J. Killoch, Senior.
"Etawah, .....	Messrs. Cumine and T. Tucker.

23rd.—The District Committee of Cawnpore early in March stated, as a cause for that Station being overrun with paupers, that they undertook the orders of Government in respect to the provision of labour were not fully carried out in the District of Etawah. On this representation, without any reference to the Local Officer, or an inquiry through this Office, the Right Honourable the Governor General was pleased to censure severely the Local Officers against whom the blame was imputed. I beg to state that the Cawnpore Committee, at the time they made the assertion, had not as many poor employed within the District of Cawnpore as were employed in any of the Districts of the Agra Division, Cawnpore included. That station might have been overrun with the destitute; so were Agra, Furruckabad, Mynpoore, Muttra, and Etawah; in neither of which Districts did the Local Committees impute blame to their neighbours, but rather resolutely set themselves to meet the exigency.

24th.—I have grounded my assertion on the printed reports of the Cawnpore Society; if they are wrong, I have been misled; but, with deference, I humbly hope that the resource passed on Mr. Cumine may be modified. If not cancelled; as the information subsequently derived by the Government must show that no backwardness to assist the really distressed existed; whilst the peculiar position of Etawah, from having the starving population of a foreign (Marhatta) territory on its frontier, required the exercise of great caution, lest the whole should be drawn across the boundary, and the peace of the country endangered by the introduction of so lawless a class of people.

25th.—An abstract is annexed below, (1) shewing the total expense which the Government have incurred in procuring the lives of thousands of its subjects; and although the amount is large, it is nothing when weighed against the objects which have been attained, the misery which has been averted, and the lives that have been saved.

26th.—But supposing for a moment there should be those who would exclaim at the cost. View the expenditure as a question of revenue, or as a mercantile operation. It was an indispensable advance to ensure in future years a proper cultivation of the soil, and a sufficient means to carry on the husbandry and agricultural operations of the Districts, so as to realize a revenue in subsequent years. This season has been so far propitious, the crops are abundant, and the returns in revenue will not fall 20 per cent. under ordinary years. I would ask how could such results have been obtained, had the population not been supported, or had they been allowed to emigrate to other countries?

27th.—The foregoing detail is but a brief outline of a vast subject. It will, however, I trust, satisfy the Right Honourable the Governor General, that the Local Officers under my control, have sedulously and honourably performed a most arduous task; whilst occupied in which, it must be borne in mind, they were all charged with the preservation of the public peace, with the adjustment of the revenue demands, and all the ordinary duties of the Magisterial and Collectorate departments. They have been zealous instruments in a cause which has exalted the name of our Government, and our national character, and placed its fame and reputation on a basis which, it is universally admitted, no Native ruler, or former sovereign ever gained. The object I have offered to the public is, to state the gratitude of a whole population, whilst it has extended the arm of aid and succour to the surrounding States. It was the example set by a whole district officer. In Bhiropoor, a British District, the Native Governments distributed food at various places, and when the season for the rains arrived, the Darbar of Gwalior, Bhopoor, and Bhiropoor, sent their agent with funds to defray the expenses of any of their subjects desirous of returning to their homes; by which means, many, who could not for years, if ever, have revisited their native villages, were enabled to return, carrying with them tidings of our Government's liberality, and of the vast resources applied to the support of a starving population.

28th.—In conclusion I will add that, in addition to the expenditure above enumerated, the amount of suspension of Revenue in the several Districts of this Division is as follows:—

"Agra, ... ..	10,193,585 4 9
"Furruckabad, ... ..	6,82,935 12 11
"Mynpoore, ... ..	1,96,640 2 44
"Etawah, ... ..	8,69,759 8 11 1/2

Rs. 29,56,503 8 0 1/2

29th.—I hope that the foregoing record will be approved by the Government. It placed the Right Honourable the Governor General in a heavy responsibility on me; if, in acquitting myself thereof, I have been found wanting, the deficiency I cannot charge to any want of personal exertion, or of anxious solicitude. I have had to perform a duty, not only novel and harassing, but surrounded with difficulties, oftentimes most perplexing; one in which the impulse of natural feelings and sensibilities, was apt to lead from the really correct and proper course; the task is done, and the materials are submitted; which will enable the Right Honourable the Governor General to judge

REPLY OF GOVERNMENT TO THE RECEIPTING QUESTION.

To W. C. HUBBY, Esq., and Babu PANDURANG CUMAR TAGOR, Esq.,
Honorary Secretaries of the Landholder's Society.

GENTLEMEN,—I am directed by the Honourable the Deputy Governor of Bengal to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated the 26th November last, forwarding for His Honour's consideration a Petition against the measures now in operation for the investigation of claims to hold lands free of assessment, and urging on the part of the Landholder's Society certain arguments against those measures.

1. The whole subject, which is felt to be one of importance in all its bearings, has long engaged the attention of the highest authorities, and the Deputy Governor in forming his own conclusions upon the matter treated in your address, and in the Petition above mentioned, has not failed to advert to the sentiments recorded regarding them by the most eminent men who have governed British India, as well as to the sources of historical information, both with respect to the laws and customs which (apart from any exercise of caprice or tyrannical power) regulated the administration of the Land Revenue under our predecessors, in dominion and to the views and intentions of the authorities who framed the code of 1793.

2. A careful examination of those sources of information has convinced the Deputy Governor, that not only justice authorities, but that considerations both of policy and equity imperiously require, that all lands held exempt from the payment of Revenue, the possessors of which do not enjoy their immunities under the positive guarantee of the Regulations of 1793, should be subjected to assessment; and that with reference alike to the common law of the country, as declared in the preambles to Regulations XIX. and XXXVII. of 1793, (a) to the formal announcement in Regulation II. of that year, the fundamental law of the permanent settlement, and to the unimpeachable general principle, that nothing short of a legislative guarantee, to exonerate any individual from bearing his fair proportion of the public burthens; no length of prescription can reasonably be held to convert into property, the necessary detriment of the community, that, which being unmentioned by law, is, in fact, only an abusive and untenable privilege,—nor has the custom of the country given any colour to such privilege. It is well known that even those grants by former sovereigns of India, which are considered to be held entitled to be held perpetual, have not been and never could have been practically treated as such;—"For," in the words of Sir Thomas Munro, "if Italian Princes could grant Chuanga Jaghirs; and if none could resume them, a great portion of the country might in time be released from affording any aid to the State, either in revenue or in military service. If, therefore, the increase of Chuangas during successive reigns might, if not checked, have finally impaired, if not altogether exhausted the resources of the State, and as the evil could only be remedied by Resumption, it seems to follow from the reason of the thing, that the sovereign must have had the right to resume as well as grant."

3. The guarantee given by the laws of 1793, that all grants for holding lands exempt from the payment of Revenue, made previous to the 12th August, 1793, shall be deemed valid as respects the original grantee, and hereditarily in perpetuity, if the original grant confer that immunity, has been and is scrupulously observed. The object of the measure now in operation, and objected to by the Landholder's Society, is to ascertain in regard to all lands as held exempt, what really are, and what are not protected by that guarantee, in order that its benefit may be extended beyond further question, and for ever, to the parties truly entitled to it; and that those who possess no valid claim to a privilege which ought uniformly to be confined within the narrowest limits, consistent with the maintenance of the public faith, may no longer be permitted to appropriate funds which appertain of right to the State; and nothing has been done of late to these ends beyond the execution of laws, the most recent of which was enacted more than ten years ago, after long experience of the failure of former plans for the assertion of the rights of the State, and after a great sacrifice of Revenue, and consequent enhancement of public debt.

4. After this exposition of the general principles upon which the measures of Government complained of are founded, it is not the intention of the Deputy Governor to enter upon a lengthened examination of the detailed objections to those measures, stated in your Letter. But His Honour deems it necessary, in order to obviate the further spread of misconception, to point out a few of the mistakes of law and fact, into which it appears from your Letter that the Landholder's Society has fallen.

5. You speak in the third paragraph of your address, of Lakshmi tenures as "the shape in which the Government may have bestowed its favour, or rewarded meritorious services," and state that the argument (which you are combating) carried out "to its full extent, would deprive the sovereign of all power of granting honours and rewards." But the truth is, that the vast majority of even the oldest tenures in Bengal were not granted by any sovereign or even subordinate Governor, but were of the nature described in the passage quoted on the Margin from the preamble of Regulation XIX. of 1793. (c) To grant of this description, which are probably so few in number in Bengal, your arguments of course can have no proper application.

6. Again in paragraph four of your Letter, you truly observe that it does not "appear how the community can be really benefited by removing a large number of its members to a state of pauperism." But the measures now in operation can only, when circumstances are most unfavourable to the parties concerned, place them in the position of the oldest Zemindars of Oude and of the North Western Provinces; and if the tenures of the great body of the Lakshmi tenures are as mild as you allege them to be, their cases will come under the indulgent provisions of Clause II. Section VIII. Reg. XIX. of 1793, and will be assessed at half rent Jumma terms, much more favourable than are enjoyed by any Zemindar in any District not under the permanent settlement, and probably by many even at those within its pale.

7. Thirdly; you state in paragraph six of your Letter, "that while poverty and despair will defer money from appealing at all in cases improperly decided against them, or deter them from appearing till too late to be heard, it is the practice of the Government Vakeels never to abandon a suit in which they have been cast, until it shall have been decided by the superior tribunal, or until at least the case shall have been referred to the special consideration of Government."

8. But the truth is, that of the 311 cases decided by the Special Commissioners of Patna, Meerut, and Calcutta, during the two years ending with the 31st of July last, only 36 were appeals on behalf of Government against the decisions of the tribunals of first instance, although in the course of the same period 4440 cases, involving an estimated annual Revenue of Rupees 4,24,424, were decided against the claim of the State by those tribunals; and that of 1288 cases now pending before the Special Commissioners of Meerut, Patna, and Calcutta, (file cases) there is a reference to the Special Commissioners of Patna on this point, in only 101 cases; and the instance of the officers whom you term "the Government Vakeels." It is not within His Honour's knowledge any case of the nature to which you advert has been "referred to the special consideration of Government."

10. Fourthly; you allege in the same paragraph of your Letter, that from this practice of universal appeal on the part of the Government Vakeels, has resulted the realisation which so many complainees at half Jumma are subjected to, rather than incur a ruinous litigation with an all powerful opponent.

11. But with exception of a short and unsuccessful attempt at compromise in the district of Chittagong, no such arrangement has yet been attempted on the part of Government, consequently none such can have been "submitted to" by the Lakshmi tenures.

12. Fifthly; you state in paragraph 11 of your Letter, that the laws, now in operation, of Lord Cornwallis's legislation in 1793, did not disturb possession if it extended back to twenty-eight years, namely, if acquired in Bengal before the 12th August, 1765, "contrasting this state of the law with what is assumed to be the existing law and practice; but possession is no more disturbed now than it was liable to be in 1769; on the contrary, the present law and practice are far more favourable in that respect to the holders of such grants;—the Regulations XXXVII. of that year, which directed that he should be ousted, on his tenure being proved invalid; and that a settlement should be made with the person possessing the Zemindari or proprietary "right in the lands, whoever he may be" (d).—Further, the law of 1793 as-

(a) "By the ancient law of the country, the ruling power is entitled to a certain proportion of the produce of every parcel of land, and it transfers the right thereto for a term or in perpetuity."

(b) "The Governor General in Council will impose such assessment as he may deem equitable on lands as present alienated and paying no public Revenue, which have been, or may be proved to be held under illegal or invalid titles. The assessment so imposed will belong to Government, and no proprietor of land will be entitled to any part of it."

(c) "Previous, however, to the Company's accession to the Swamy, numerous grants of this description were made not only by the Zemindars, but by the officers of Government appointed to the temporary superintendence of the collection of the Revenue, under the pretext that the produce of the lands was to be applied to religious or charitable uses; of these grants, some were applied in the purposes for which they were professed to have been made, but in general they were given for the personal advantage of the grantee, or with a view to the clandestine appropriation of the produce to the use of the grantee, or sold to supply his private exigencies."

will, will alike give the most attentive consideration to the representations of all parties who may bring forward in a legitimate manner well authenticated cases of grievance. In every such case that has been substantiated, liberal redress has been given: like relief or compensation will be freely accorded in future. Although it is unquestionable that lands which were held Lakhraj in this have been antagonized with lands paying revenue, in order to their fraudulent concealment, in business vastly more numerous than those in which even search has been made after non-existent Lakhraj lands, in consequence of the registry of fictitious claims to the same, every endeavour has been made by the employment of well remunerated and responsible officers, as Deputy Collectors in the conduct of Mufussil operations, to define the hazard of abuse. To this the attention of Government and of the controlling Revenue authorities has been and will be most earnestly directed, and no pains will be spared to render the measure, which the Deputy Governor is convinced are intrinsically just and proper, as free as possible from all practical hardship in their operation.

20. The Deputy Governor does not perceive any thing in the Petition of the parties to which your Letter gave cover, requiring further answer than that now returned to you.

I am, Gentlemen,
Your most obedient servant,
(Signed) F. J. HALLIDAY,
Secretary to the Government of Bengal.

For William,
22d January, 1880.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

ON THE ESTABLISHING OF A NATIVE TASAN MAGAZINE.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR.—It may possibly be intended by the Allwise, that the work of religious conversion in India is not to be effected by direct persuasion, which if it were generally to take place, might do so, so rapidly as to have a dangerous and convulsive effect in the social system: but without attempting to scrutinize His will in this particular, I think it must be conceded, that whatever tends to stimulate and improve the rational and thinking faculties of the Hindoos, must tend powerfully, though indirectly, to promote their susceptibility of conversion to sound religion; and in this principle it seems to me very advisable, that while the Missionaries continue their present exertions (above all worldly cares) in the work of direct conversion, they might at the same time much promote the great end in view, by establishing a periodical, something in character like the Travels Magazine, from which all direct reference to religion (which might check the circulation of the work) should be excluded. I think that such a work might at any capital city obtain a very considerable circulation, and afterwards bound up into volumes or otherwise, might travel into remote parts of our territories, and thus do much towards dissipating the darkness, and by indirect consequence, the debasing Hinduism of the provincial communities.

The success of such a work must depend much on its being rather closely adapted even at some sacrifice of opinion and taste, to the average mind of the community to which it is addressed, and on its subjects being in a considerable degree connected with the every day business of the expected readers: there must at least be,—if not a sacrifice,—an abatement of the writer's opinions and sentiments to those of the readers; and though he must write in advance, he must not write too much in advance of the community he writes to. It also seems to me, that an artist of some skill should be associated in the work, and at least one medical gentleman, who, besides contributing elementary articles on therapeutic subjects, might give medical advice (with or without fee, for the benefit of the general subject)* to correspondents; and, furthermore, the work might be much aided by means of such access to public records as the Government would, without doubt, give to the Editors, which favour might be requested by occasional investigations against the Russian Government, and assurances to the people of the perfectly Arcadian happiness they enjoy under British Government.

I doubt that the Government could well except, in the above particular, connect itself with the work: but as the spread of the work would always extend on the spread of primary education, the Government would, by stimulating and even gently enforcing the lower orders to learn reading and writing, most effectually promote the grand moral object in view: let the ability to read and write be made a condition of all service under Government, and even of military service, except in times of exigency—let this be done and the new Magazine will accomplish the rest.

I apprehend that it is only by such indirect means as the above, that a general religious conversion of the Natives may ever be effected: it is thus that the stout heart must be softened before we can make our impression on it: the rack and etchel of their superstition must be removed by undermining and by solvents, and not by battery and pickaxes.

P. S.—I subjoin an imaginary index of one volume of the Magazine.

BERLIN.

BAPTIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—On Tuesday, July 31, Mr. George Parsons, about to proceed to India, to be associated with Mr. Leslie, at Monghyr, was delegated to his important work at the Chapel in Essex Lane, Finsbury. Prayer was offered and the Scriptures read at the commencement by the Rev. Mr. Crossman, of Woburn. The Secretary of the Parent Society delivered the last day's address; the Rev. W. Jackson, of Finsbury, asked the most questions; the Rev. W. Watson, of Truro, offered the ordination prayer; the Rev. Benjamin Godwin, of Oxford, gave the benediction Matt. xxv. 20; and the service was closed in prayer by the Rev. C. L. Middlebach, the minister of the place.—Miss. Herald Sept. 1.

We are happy to observe that Mr. Parsons has arrived in this country, in the Albatross.

LUTHERAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—On Wednesday, August 1, 1880, Mr. James Kennedy, A. M., of King's College, Missionary to Buenos Ayres, was publicly assigned to his several works in Blackfriars Street Chapel, Abchurch Lane. The services of the day were commenced with prayer and reading the Scriptures, by the Rev. H. Angus, of the Scottish Church; after which the Rev. Dr. Wardlaw preached from Numbers xiv. 21, asked the usual questions, and offered up the ordination prayer, with the laying on of hands; the Rev. Mr. Kennedy, (the Missionary's father) delivered the charge from Prov. xl. 20; Mr. Kennedy, the Missionary's brother, Mr. Scott, from Demerara, and several other ministers of various denominations took part in the services of the day.—Miss. Magazine for Sept.

Mr. Kennedy arrived in Calcutta a month ago, with Mr. Gaezler, and two other Missionaries, medical gentlemen, who, we understand, have relinquished professorships in Berlin for the service of the Cross in India.

The Wesleyan Centenary Fund, commenced a few weeks ago, now amounts to about 500,000.

ROME.—Lords Shrewsbury and Stafford, who were among the British visitors at Rome, have both had audiences of the Pope, who conversed with them for a considerable time. Their Lordships are said to have submitted to his holiness the statutes of a society established under their auspices in London, for the propagation of the Roman Catholic religion in England.—Pail.

PERSECUTION OF JEWS IN PRUSSIA.—According to the Prussian State Gazette, all Jews resident in Prussia who cannot establish their claim to the character of proprietors, are to quit the empire on the 1st of January, and remove to a distance of five miles from the frontier. Those who are proprietors will be required to give security that they will not be concerned in any overseas trade.

THE MORAL BASIS OF WEALTH.—It does appear to me

* This is done by an English Newspaper.—An alterable one: but has no, as a dispensary might also be attached.

* I submit that this might be the germ of much good.

that there is a certain staidness and sobriety, a certain pressure of circumstances that is good for man. His body was not made for luxuries; it sickens, sinks, and dies under them. His mind was not made for indolence; it grows weak, effeminate, and gasps under that condition. It is good for us to hear the yoke; and it is especially good for us to hear the yoke in our youth. I am positive many children are injured by too much attention to such care; by too many servants at home; by too many lessons at school; by too many indulgences in society; they are not left sufficiently to exert their own powers, to invent their own amusements, to make their own way; they are often inefficient and unhappy; they lack ingenuity and energy; because they are taken out of the school of providence, and placed in one which our own foolish fondness and pride have built for them. Wealth without a law of entail to help it, has always lacked the energy even to keep its own resources; they drop from its inertile hand. What an extraordinary revolution in domestic life is that which, in this respect, is presented to us all over the world! A man trained in the school of industry and frugality acquires a large estate; his children possibly keep it; but the third generation almost inevitably go down the rolling wheel of fortune, and there learn the energy necessary to rise again. And yet we are almost all of us, anxious to put our children, or to ensure that our grandchildren shall be out, on this road to indolence, vice, degradation, and ruin!—Dewey.

SCIENTIFIC.

AUSTRALIA.—Several interesting papers on subjects connected with this colony were read on Monday evening at the third meeting of the Geographical Society. A complete map was exhibited belonging to the Australian Commissioners of Port Adelaide. It was stated, as much as the value of land increased, that Governor Hindmarsh, for two places for which he gave 800, each, obtained the best for 1,000, on leaving the Colony. There had been no less than fourteen sail in the harbour at one time, and at the last accounts there were twelve, of which three were of 500 tons burden. A fresh flock of bulls, consisting of 800, had arrived overland, following the first troop of 350, so that the colony was then well stocked; and at the last accounts there were 127 horses, 1,527 cattle, 18,910 sheep, and 218 pigs. Capt. Wellington also stated that 9000 guineas had that day been given for 10,000 acres of land, on which to establish two secondary towns in that thriving colony. A communication on the subject of Australia from Mr. Gouan recommended the introduction of the camel into that country, as not only well adapted to the climate, but also to the exigencies of intercourse between its straggled population, as well as the best instrument for exploring the interior. Capt. Wellington gave some particulars of his recent expedition, with Lieutenant Grey, to explore the interior of Australia. It was also stated that the latter who had just recovered from the effects of his wound, had returned to the Swan River, to make a new attempt to enter the interior.—Pat.

THE LATE GALE, &c.

At the monthly meeting of the Meteorological Society on Tuesday evening, Dr. Lee, F.R.S., in the chair, the principal subject of the various communications and journals was an account of the gales between the end of November and the 3rd of December.

It appeared that the gale could be satisfactorily traced to the south of the Island of Jamaica, in the West Indies, about the 17th of November. From thence it passed over the Bahama Islands, where it did considerable damage, and laid waste a great many of the plantations. From the Bahama it took a north-easterly direction across the Atlantic, and reached Truro on the 26th of November, at noon. It here continued to blow a hard gale all night, which, on the 27th, increased to a perfect hurricane. In Ireland its effects were of a frightful character, and in the Bay of Dublin, on the 28th, the barometer indicated 27.60 inches, the lowest in record for many years at that place. The storm reached London on the 28th, and was attended in the whole of its track with much thunder and violent rain, and in some places with great falls of rain. After it had left England the storm seems soon to have expended itself upon the Continent. A paper was read from Mr. J. G. Tait on the subject of the easterly wind blowing with the declining sun, and on the increase of the wind in rivers just before high water, denominated by sailors high-water squalls; and a second communication from the same gentleman, on a luminous arch and aurora borealis, seen at Hill Woomie, on the 16th of September last. There were exhibited, from a merchant at Norwich, plans of three new anemometers, for measuring the force and velocity of the wind, with its direction at any given period.—Pat.

Mount Vesuvius. We find, by a recent letter from Naples, is again in a state of eruption. The weather has been so mild in the south of Italy and at Naples, that many people have not yet put on their winter clothing.—Ibid.

MISCELLANEOUS.

STEAM NAVIGATION TO INDIA.—The Indian Steam Ship

Company have announced that their first vessel, the India, will be launched on the 3rd of January next, and be ready to take in stores in the Thames by the middle of April. The vessel is building by Messrs. Scott and Sons, and the engines by Messrs. Scott and Stirling, of Greenwich; she is of 1200 tons burthen, with accommodation for 80 cabin passengers, and 400 tons of goods. She is provided with a safety apparatus, and built with two strong bulk-heads of plate-iron across the engine-room, in order to confine accidental fire, and prevent a leak springing in one division from spreading to another. It is also announced, that another vessel of 1500 tons burthen is on the stocks, and that a third will be ready within eighteen months, and that there were about to be commenced. With this number of vessels, it is expected that twelve voyages out and twelve voyages home will be performed in each year, allowing 55 days to accomplish the distance from Plymouth to Calcutta, by the Cape of Good Hope.—Pat, Dec. 13.

TRUCKY, RUSSIA, PERSIA, &c.

The Anglo-British Gazette of the 14th contains a long article, dated Moscow, the 2nd inst. (communicated by the Russian Government), which, after remarking that the predilections of certain parties that a rupture between Great Britain and Russia would grow out of the new commercial treaty between the former and the Porte had not taken, nor was likely to take, place, proceeds to justify Russia against the charge of having induced the Shah of Persia to undertake the siege of Herat in order to open a passage for himself to British India or to establish himself in Persia. The writer contends that the Shah had undertaken the siege for the sole purpose of obtaining the payment of a tribute due to him by the Afghans. The British Government, conceiving erroneously that the siege of Herat was a pre-text with the above object, ordered Mr. M-Niel to summon the Shah to raise the siege, and the latter not acquiescing in it at demand, Mr. M-Niel retired, and Great Britain made preparations to attack Persia. After some commentaries on the steps taken by Mr. M-Niel, and after observing that the British Government had viewed previous similar movements, they were wrong all at once to act upon suspicion of the Shah's good faith. Instead of an embarrassing the Shah, Great Britain was bound, as was Russia, to establish in the centre of Asia a solid government (like him), capable of maintaining order, and of preventing the recurrence of revolutions, which had but too often been detrimental to neighbouring states. The writer proceeds to contend that the hostility of England had been provoked by the "liberal" commercial ideas of the Shah, who had extended the commerce of his state, and in a particular manner to increase it with Russia. Thus England desired to maintain in her own interest a monopoly in Persia, at the very moment when at Constantinople she called for the suppression of one of which was not the favoured object.

The article (for which in detail we have not room to-day) proceeds to state, that Russia is determined on defending her interests in the East, and that if compulsion to enter the British which England has thrown in herself in a manner to our capricious and indolence, she will not hesitate to accept the challenge. The writer trusts, however, that matters will not proceed to extremities.—Pat.

The Rev. James Carille, of Dublin, having long desired to be relieved from the weight of secular business connected with his office as Commissioner of the National Education Board, has retired from the Board; but we have authority, for saying, not from any change of views, but solely for the purpose of being more constantly employed in his proper work as a minister of the Gospel.—Pat.

ABSTINENCE SOCIETIES.—Judging from our own experience, we unhesitatingly declare that the too-total abstinence societies are producing a silent but effectual revolution for the better in the condition of the working classes. Comfort and peace now prevail where formerly there were misery and strife. In the domestic establishment, good order has taken the place of disorder. In workshops, masters and men go on together in harmony, instead of being in a state of mutual hatred. And it is indubitable that much of this improvement is owing to the spread of abstinence associations. That there are instances in which the human frame will suffer injury, if spirits or wines are abstained from, there can be no question; for it is notorious that physicians frequently save lives which are sinking, by the timely administration of draughts of brandy. But these, and such like, are the legitimate exceptions to the rule, and will always be regulated by the common sense of mankind. Philanthropists need be in no alarm that the people will hurt themselves by being too temperate.—Chambers's Journal.

WINE.—SIR WALTER RALEIGH'S ADVICE.—Take especial care that you do not get into wine, for there never was any man that came to honour or preferment that loved it; for it transformeth a man into a beast, decayeth health, diminisheth the breath, destroyeth natural heat, brings a man's stomach to an artificial heat, deformeth the face, rotteth the teeth, and, to conclude, maketh a man contemptible, worn old, and despised of all wise and worthy men; hated in his servants, in himself, and compensate, for it is a heaving and infectious vice. A drunkard will never shake off the delight of inebriation; for the longer he possesses a man the more he will delight in it, and the older he grows the more he will be subject to it; for it dulls the spirit, and destroys the body, as it does the old tree, or as the worm that engendereth in the kernel of the nut. Take heed, therefore, that such a careless carter pass not thy youth, nor such a heastly infection thy old age; for then shall all thy life be but as the life of a beast, and after thy death thou shalt only have a shameful infamy to thy poverty, who shall study to forget that such a one was their father.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

LAW MAKING.—The Parliamentary Papers for 1837-8, amount, exclusive of maps and plans, to 35,000 folio pages.—Pat.

EDUCATION.—FAGGING AT WINCHESTER-SCHOOL.—We have received a letter on the subject of a punishment of six or seven years having been inflicted, with a stick, by a big boy at Winchester School on his bag. The heads of the school were merely written to the father of the boy to remove him, instead of expelling him. Our correspondent observes, that the heads of schools are anxious to avoid taking steps which may draw attention to the abuses in them, and he recommends the sufferer to go before a magistrate, to let his wounded body be shown to suitable witnesses, and the offender may be sent to goal and tried at the assizes, when no English jury would admit any pollution of such monstrous cruelty.—Chronicle.

EDUCATION.—FRANCE.—The Minister of Public Instruction has ordered that in all the colleges of the kingdom, at least one foreign language shall be comprehended in the course of instruction, and that in all the royal colleges both English and German shall be taught. In the chief towns in the south of France, near the frontiers of Italy and Spain, the language of one or other of these countries may be respectively substituted for either of those prescribed above.—Advertiser.

BLACKWALL COMMERCIAL RAILWAY.—Already there are nearly one hundred foundations of piers erected, (including the foundations of several bridges across the streets,) the footings of more than 50 piers are completed, and the brickwork of 25 is raised springing high. The centres for some of the arches are, and in the course of a fortnight several will be bricked over; one of the iron bridges is expected to be completed about the same time. The whole line will be completed in the course of the ensuing year, and besides its advantages as a means of communication between the heart of the city, the docks, and the river, will do much good by throwing open a number of the busy and crowded streets and lanes in the neighbourhood of the Commercial road. The trains will be impelled by stationary engines, thus obviating the objections which some persons entertain to the passage of locomotives through or near populous districts of the metropolis.—Pat.

THE SULTAN'S GATES.—A short time since there were two pairs of massive iron gates made by Messrs. Dean and Co., iron-founders, Bolton, for the Grand Turk's Seraglio, and which many thousands went to see, which weigh nearly forty tons. They are twenty-eight feet in height, and cost 1,250*l.* When trouble gilt, which they are intended to be, they will doubtless surpass in splendour any thing in the world. The design is exquisite.—Pat.

SOUTH AUSTRALIA.—Since our last publication six vessels have departed for Adelaide, conveying about 1,000 emigrants, to be added to its thickening population, so that, in about ten years and a half after the colony was proclaimed, it will host a population of between 7,000 and 8,000 souls! What with imports, and native growth, the colony bids fair soon to realise its constitutional number!—South Australian Record.

TACKLE FOR VAGRANTS.—In the course of an inquiry at Hatten-garden Police-office, on Tuesday, it was stated that in Mill-lane, Deptford, there is a regular depot, whence vagrants may borrow ink-bots at the rate of 6*d.* per day each, for the purpose of exciting the compassion of the humane.—Pat.

Gold is 167 per cent. dearer at Hamburgh than in London. Gold is the same price at Paris as in London.—Ibid.

The Course of Exchange at New York on London is 110 per cent., and the par of Exchange between England and America being 109 23-40 per cent., it follows that the exchange is 0.43 per cent., in favour of England.—Ibid.

In the West India commercial enterprise seems to progress rapidly. Jamaica has made arrangements for opening a "Planters' Bank," with a capital of 900,000*l.* for advances on crops, produce, houses, lands, and other property, which would not be received as security by the existing banks. They were also endeavouring to establish Marine, Fire, and Life Assurance Company in the island, and the shares were eagerly subscribed.—Ibid.

BAHIA.—Accounts from Bahia to the 28th of October have been received at Liverpool. The following account of the latest news has been received by a house in the city from a correspondent in Liverpool:—"A revolution has again broken out in Bahia, which threatens to cause separation of the province.

The republican party took advantage of the bad news from Rio de Janeiro of the defeat of the imperial army in Rio Grande, and having seized the forts, deposed the governor, and formed a junta, with a view to declare their independence. No British ship of war being there, the merchants were much alarmed. The account from Rio de Janeiro that no money could be procured, and the junta had fallen to 71, having been down to 69, Ex. 28."—Ibid.

MR. THOMAS CLARKSON.—The rebound of the attack made by the young Messrs. Wilberforce on the venerable Clarkson, has been far more vehement, no imagine, than either they or their reviewer anticipated. The Birmingham, Bury, Ipswich, and other Anti-slavery Committees have passed resolutions of a similar tenor to those of the Convention Council of London, the latest exception; and we have no doubt the example will be imitated by kindred bodies throughout the country.—Ibid.

Religious Medical Practitioners for Jamaica have been invited to dine by the Rev. Mr. Knibb. Mr. Sirrge states, in the British Emancipator, he has not heard that any one has accepted Mr. Knibb's urgent invitation, and that he should be glad to give all the information in his power on the subject.—Ibid.

POST OFFICE DELIVERY OF LETTERS ON FRIDAYS.—The proposed desertion of the Lord's Day by the Post-office authorities has aroused vast numbers of mercantile men, and different parochial authorities and individuals in London, to meet and adopt resolutions of solemn protest and remonstrance against the wicked perpetration contemplated.—Ibid.

ROGER LEE, Esq., of Topham-common, having been appointed a magistrate for Surrey, qualified for the bench on Monday week. He is the first Dissenter who has become a magistrate in that county. Benjamin Hauser, Esq. M.P., likewise qualified at the same time, but did not receive the Saturday before the meeting of magistrates.—Ibid.

SCURGE DELUGE, AND LOSS OF FORTY-THREE LIVES.—At Blackwall, on Wednesday, the 28th ult., after two days of incessant rain, following a heavy snow of the same duration, about mid-day the sky was suddenly darkened by dense clouds, about eleven o'clock, in the direction of the Varieg, when an immediate discharge occurred, which inundated the works, and almost filled the valley, causing an instantaneous rise in the river of many feet additional, which burst over an embankment protecting the mouth of an old lead, leading to the deep coal mine and mine works of the Blackwall Company. Miners were despatched to the different workings, and several hundreds of miners and colliers immediately came out. Every effort to divert and elude the torrent was most energetically made, which, from the numerous workmen in the employment of the Company, and the almost immediate cessation of the rain, was accomplished in a few hours, but not before some of the very distant headings were filled with water. In one, there is no doubt fourteen lives are lost. The damage to the works is trifling. The pumping, which alone can enable these unfortunate workmen to be rescued, has been urged with every possible speed, yet it will be several days or a week before the boilers can be obtained. The number missing consists of eleven men, seven of whom are unmarried, two girls, and one boy! It is to be feared that a part of these have lost their lives from not feeling sufficiently alarmed to leave with the same rapidity as their fellow miners. One, an old man returned to fetch his lanterns, and was not seen afterwards! Another, and the most distant, we are told by a man who worked the next shift, replied that he would not leave his son behind, and both are missing! We hear of the flood being so sudden at the Varieg, on the other side of the hill, that three young people were drowned in a house near the river. Residents of forty years' duration speak of the water pouring down the face of the mountain in quantity and rapidly surpassing anything known on the hills; they describe it, in its foam and volume, like rolling packs of wool.—Monmouthshire Beacon.

A TRAM IN EQUITY.—On an interlocutory motion at the Rolls' Court, in a celebrated will-case, not long since, no less than 23 counsel are said to have appeared for various opposing and consenting parties.—Pat.

The late Sir James Allan Park was the only son of a medical gentleman, who, after practising with much reputation in Edinburgh, settled at Newington, in Surrey. He received a liberal education, and was placed under an eminent council in conveyancing. Called to the bar, he acquired notice by his skill in mercantile law and marine insurances, and after succeeding to the honours of a skill-gown was promoted, about 30 years back, to the bench. In 1767 he published "A System of the Law of Marine Insurances." He also wrote "An Exhortation to the Holy Sacrament of the Lord's Supper."—Ibid.

3d.—The articles must not be garbled but bona fide the average produce of the land on which they are grown, or of the manufacture.

4th.—All candidates for Medals must deliver with their specimens, statements of the places at which the articles were produced, the quality or nature of the soil and of the mode of cultivation and manufacture, and the cost of production.

5th.—A majority of the specimens which shall be declared rural to the Gold Medal, shall be the property of the Society the remainder will be returned to the candidates.

6th.—Candidates are requested to affix to their specimens, a number or mark, and to accompany them with a sealed letter, and to mark the letter addressed to the Secretary with the words "Competition Letter," which letter will remain unopened till after adjudication.

7th.—When two or more Samples shall be considered to be of equal quality, the Medal will be awarded to the Sample which may appear to have been raised in the best soil, and with reference also to the greatest quantity produced upon a given area.

8th.—All candidates are expected to have their specimens in the possession of the Secretary of the Society on or before the 1st May, 1849.

It was also resolved that the same prizes should be awarded on the same conditions, for the year 1849.

SULPHURIC ACID.—Messrs. BATHGATE AND CO. of Calcutta, having built extensive Chambers for the preparation of Sulphuric Acid, are now ready to supply it from their Manufactory of the usual commercial strength and purity.

Nitric and Mariatic Acids can also be supplied.

Messrs. BATHGATE AND CO. will be glad to enter into contracts to supply any of the above to parties requiring Acids, in large quantities.

Chemical Works, Gussoree.

I have examined the Sulphuric, Nitric, and Mariatic Acids supplied by Messrs. BATHGATE AND CO. at their Gussoree Works, and have much pleasure in certifying that in strength and purity, they are equal to the best European Acids.

PASSING EVENTS.—In the great military and political movements of the past and present year in India, there is a peculiar character which distinguishes them from all preceding occurrences. Almost all the warlike enterprises in which we have hitherto been engaged, have been directed against enemies in this country, and the interest they have excited has scarcely spread beyond the Indian circle in England. But on the present occasion we have taken up arms to anticipate the designs of a colossal power, which aims at a universal monarchy; and our advance into the plains of Central Asia is intended to counteract the designs of European ambition. The present military movements bring together the politics of Europe and Asia; and impart a European interest to our expedition. They are intimately connected with the vigorous and judicious stand which, after years of inglorious hesitation, the administration at home has determined to make against a new irruption of northern barbarism. The march on Cabul and Candahar belongs to the same category of events, as the recent treaties with Austria and Turkey. They have the same object in view; to prevent the extinction of all national independence by the ambition of Russia. We have, therefore, with us not only, to a certain extent, the sympathy of all those throughout Europe who are alive to the dangers which threaten its social system, but we have that confidence which arises from the assurance that we are struggling in a common cause, the loss of which will involve mankind in the shades of despotism.

Our progress hitherto has been animating. Every thing has conspired to smooth our way. Never, in the annals of Indian warfare, has the commencement of hostilities on so large a scale been attended with so much to encourage the mind. The firm friendship of Ranjeet Singh; our peaceful march to the point of embarkation on the Indus; the surrender of Bukkur, the key of that river; the unexpected subjugation of all Scinde, form a chain of circumstances which imparts to our progress all the liveliness of a tournament. The 'fainting of heart' among the nations beyond the Indus, is likewise an auspicious omen. It is now reported with confidence, that the Chiefs of Candahar have resolved to come into our views, and will offer no opposition; and that Dost Mahomed himself has thought of a refuge in the mountains. These favorable reports may be the shadow of coming events, or they may be exaggerations; but if there had been any spirit beyond the Indus, the Chiefs would have followed our course, and met danger half way, instead of allowing us an undisputed entrance into their country. We cannot but augur a favorable result from the combination of these circumstances; and it would be no matter of surprise, if we were allowed to walk over the course from Ferozapore to Herat.

In the circumstance of the last few months, it is instructive to remark how brief a period has, in several instances, been allowed to elapse between the condemnation of particular lines of policy, and the vindication of them by the progress of events. When Lord Auckland left Calcutta for the Western Provinces, at a time in which a Burmese war appeared inevitable, he was severely censured for abandoning his post. Scarcely, however, had His Lordship reached Simlah, than political clouds began to gather on the Himalays, beyond the Indus; a Persian army laid siege to Herat, with the avowed intention of marching into India; and the approach of Russian influence, like that of a portentous comet, began to disturb all the relations of our Indian empire. It then appeared that Lord Auckland had acted opportunely in taking up his residence, just at that juncture, in a position the most favorable for directing the political negotiations and military movements which the safety of the empire demanded.

Then, again, the policy was censured of marching a British army down the Indus, and up through the Bulan Pass, instead of stretching at once across the Panjab, by which much time, and great fatigue and expense would have been saved. But as circumstances have now developed the unequivocal hostility of the Amiers of Scinde, we are enabled to appreciate the wisdom of sweeping the whole extent of the Indus, from the sea to Ferozapore, with our troops, and trying the metal of all the Chiefs on its banks, before we committed ourselves to the untold region beyond it. Whether the march along the Indus, north and south to Bukkur, instead of a straight forward march across the Panjab was the result of choice or necessity, we shall not, we fear, know, till some Member of the Lower House shall take compassion on our curiosity, and move for the printing of all orders and documents connected with this war, at the nation's expense; but of all events, it is now demonstratively the path of wisdom. Had we marched across the Panjab, out at the ordinary gate of India, into Central Asia, all that has been accomplished on the Indus; the permanent acquisition of Bukkur; the subjugation of Scinde; the opening of the navigation of the Indus, with its military advantages, and its commercial prospects, would have been to be looked for in some future page of our history.

Lastly, the division of the Army of the Indus, and the order for half of it to stand still on the banks of the Sutledge, was not a little censured, as another instance of the penny wise and pound foolish arrangements of Government; yet circumstances have fully vindicated its propriety. Allard is dead; Ranjeet Singh is dying; the Panjab is on the eve of a commotion, the influence of which will extend, not only to every state, great and small, within the Indus, but to the states beyond it. So widely has the fame of this Lion of the North been diffused among the credulous millions of Asia, that by no Court is our dominion in India considered either permanent or undisputed, while he lives. That just at the period of so important a crisis, a large British force should be encamped, without exciting suspicion, on the borders of his kingdom, to act as circumstances may dictate, is a most happy coincidence;—and these things may, we think, teach us, like sage prophets, to suspend our judgements till the upshot of events shall have given some safe clue for our vaccination.

We have yet some accounts unsettled with our eastern neighbors at Kutch and Awa. It is much to be feared that neither of them will remain quiet, and leave us in peace, without another demonstration of our power. No-paul has given the most solemn assurances of a most pacific disposition; but the Court has imbibed the idea that our influence may be shaken off; and hence every idle rumour to our disadvantage is eagerly swallowed, and lends to a renewal of intrigue. A long array of troops, posted on the line of frontier facing Nepal, gives us present security from all apprehensions; but we cannot long afford so expensive a precaution, and we may soon feel the necessity of exchanging the policy of watching the enemy for that of alarming him.

In Burmah every thing is placid, serene and tranquil to all outward appearance; but the flame of war is only smothered. Government is collecting troops, horse, guns and all the munitions of war at Moulmein; and Col. Benson is quietly equipped on a lonely sand bank in the frantically insulted by Tharrawadde, and neglected by his Court. Meanwhile four British ships of war, without leave asked, are riding at anchor in the chief Burmese port, and the Burmese mind is kept in a state of wholesome perturbation. The ships, which may any day level Rangoon with the ground, are, we hope, a good guarantee for the personal safety of our envoy. Such a state of things cannot, of course, last. The next cold season must bring matters to a point. If Col. Benson can prolong his sanguinity for four or five months longer, and then retire unmolested, there can be little doubt that Tharrawadde will be obliged ere long to content himself with Burmah Proper, and that the fertile plains of Pega will be added to our dominions.

CHINA—THE OPIUM TRADE.—The past week has brought us farther intelligence from the Celestial Empire, of the progress made in the great experiment of suppressing the use and sale of Opium. There is no symptom yet of relaxation on the part of the Chinese authorities, in the security of their measures against the smokers and dealers. On the contrary, strict laws edict in the same tone of fixed determination. Neither are the edicts allowed to lie by unheeded. Offenders against them are continually paraded in gangs of forty or fifty, through the several quarters of Canton, with shackles of iron upon their necks and feet; and similar proceedings throughout the empire are threatening the whole people into a dangerous ferment. The Police underlings of China are as ready as our own drungas and their followers to make a profit out of the execution of the laws. Not content with exacting contributions from the innocent, for not being apprehended as guilty, they have secreted opium in their houses, and then convicted them as dealers in the prohibited drug. The tragical issue of some instances of this sort has evoked a singularly loud resistance to the police. Their approach is the signal for a general turn out of the people, who search the intruders before they are allowed to search any one else. And so the tranquillity of the whole country is disturbed; and the officers of government are in a new-erect at defiance. Here in itself is an evil of no trifling magnitude, which we may truly say is inflicted on China, by the British Government of India.

It is very plain that if the people of China have the spirit, and, by combination, the ability, to resist the police in their nefarious proceedings, they can also resist them, if they choose, in the proper execution of the law. It is not to be supposed, therefore, that the use of opium will pass away by the mere spell of imperial edicts. We are told, indeed, on good authority, that they are by no means ineffectual; for many in the interior have given up smoking, and are not at all likely to resume it. It is not by severity of punishment alone that they operate. Public employment in China depends honour and emolument, is open to every Chinaman without distinction. Ambition, therefore, pervades the entire population; and if the use of opium becomes, by the firmness of government, even but a probable bar to promotion, the several indulgence will, in numberless cases, give way to the dictates of interest and honour. The consumption of the poisonous drug is, for the present, nearly stopped; and it is not probable that it can ever rise again to its late terrific height. The delivery of opium at Lintin, up to the 3d of January, was only eight chests. May it never be greater!

Nevertheless, as we have said, the use of opium is not likely to cease altogether. Consequently there will still be some demand for the drug. Our government have, therefore, even yet opportunity for showing some signs of grace in this matter. It may be thought of as a consequence, to sell some trifle more to the demand so accumulation of infamy we here first find in the opium trade, by persisting in a determination to secure the last piece of profit that can be made out of the innumerable inventory of that vice, which we have created and socribed in the Chinese. Yet it would look more generous—it would seem to have some redemptive virtue—were our Government candidly to confess they had fallen into an unjustifiable course, and now stand reprimanded by the very people by whose degradation they had been prodding; and were they to resolve, though there was a reckoning of their antebellum gains to be rather red, they would forgive it, and wash their hands of the iniquity in which they have been so deeply engaged. If virtue will not produce the renunciation so desirable, a few opium sales without leaders will supply its place—and so the opium revenue is gone.

CALCUTTA'S FANAM MAGAZINE.—Calcutta, in a letter which we published last week, proposes to the benevolent community at Bombay, the publication of a Fanam or People's Magazine at that Presidency, with the view of diffusing such useful knowledge among the Natives, as may prepare the Native mind for the reception of scripture truth. The idea is marked with benevolence but unwise; the Native community at Bombay differ essentially from that of our Presidency, in its for the present impracticable. The result of twenty years of experience shows, that the Natives are not yet prepared for such a publication, however small the demand it may make on their purses. Although during these twenty years education has made great progress at this Presidency, there is nothing more difficult than to secure adequate support to any such work. At Asian Magazine, published in the most alluring form, with an English translation in a parallel column, was put forth a year or two ago, but it did not survive a twelvemonth. There is no shift to which a Native will not resort to evade payment for a periodical publication. A weekly paper is now published in Calcutta at the incredibly low rate of four annas a month, or an anna a number; and the Editor is supposed to have obtained five or six hundred subscribers; but we have it from very good authority, that one-half the subscribers do not pay at all; the other half only with extreme reluctance; yet the spirited Editor nobly perseveres in his undertaking, in the hope of being able to work a gradual reform in the national character; and if he succeeds, he will certainly have achieved a greater undertaking than the British Government with its two hundred thousand soldiers could expect to do in half a century. We conjecture the causes for this national apathy; first, a Native seems more reluctant to part with small than with large sums; and never co-siders it dishonourable to postpone a trifling debt. We have seen instances of Natives spending thirty thousand Rupees upon the wedding of a son, and priding themselves as having made a good bargain when they have lent down the price of his absconding from ten to nine Rupees a month; and after all, making the poor polyglot send him a dozen times for the pittance, while thousands of Rupees were lying idle in the house. Scarcely, the Natives do not want means, but motives, to use one of Cassandra's own happy expressions. There is at present no motive in the country sufficient to induce ninety-nine men out of a hundred to pay an anna a month for a hawk that may enlarge their mind. We are yet too much in the infancy of Indian civilization, to be able to calculate upon such a stride. Government has not yet thought of bringing the vast apparatus of motives which lies at its disposal, to assist in the gradual regeneration of the country. Till this is done; till the first step has been taken in the enactment of a law, that no man shall be received into the public service who cannot read and write, a Panjab Magazine will be as unpalatable as a Rope Magazine.

CALCUTTA DISTRICT CHARITABLE SOCIETY.—The Report of this most estimable Association, for the eighth year of its labours, has just appeared. It exhibits a continued increase of charitable benefactions, with a rigorous adherence to the same principles which at first secured to the Society the universal favour it has hitherto enjoyed. The Receipts during the past year, amounted to Rs. 52,720-1-4; and the Disbursements to Rs. 53,183-0-3. The deficiency was made up from a balance of Rs. 10,042-3-3, on hand in the beginning of the year; of which Rs. 7,507-6-4 remained at the commencement of the present year. The income of the Society might have been larger, had it not been for the extraordinary demand made upon public charity, for the relief of the Western Provinces, during the late famine. Its amounts, nevertheless, is honourable to the community, and enrolling to all who are affected, as they ought to be, by the necessities of the poor and afflicted. The Society does not claim to have as yet overtaken all the misery within the range of its care. There is still much poverty smothered by its beauty; and here resources are required for the poor. We hope they will be provided with the accustomed liberality of the Calcutta public.

The Report expresses a confident hope that the Society has succeeded, to a considerable extent, in putting down the system of systematic begging. We fear the success of this nature is less than the Society imagines. But, as we lately took occasion to urge, it is not the fault of the Society that the success has not been greater. The blame rests with those, whose easy, kind disposition leads them to give without inquiry, and without thought of consequences. It is strong presumptive proof against any beggar, that he says he does not know of the District Charitable Society, and has not applied to its officers for relief. It is a fact, and the Society have a good-right to take pleasure in it, "that under the system they have adopted, a positive and important diminution of the sufferings of the destitute, the infirm, and the sick, has been effected." And the fact is of a kind not to be kept concealed from those who really are in want. The poor live with the poor; and no sources of relief are opened to them which can be kept private for the benefit of certain individuals only. Frank beggars know the Society well enough; but they have good reason for keeping aloof from its Secretaries. They fear their serfing, and dislike their practice of endeavouring to restrain the destitute to independence by their own industry. A mendicant who refuses to apply to the Society is, ipso facto, condemned as unworthy of help.

Persons generally may imagine how likely they are to be imposed upon, when even the Society, with all its character for care and information, is not in your attempts at imposition. Last year a man possessing a thousand Rupees in Company's Paper brought it and story of his destination to the Committee; but his signature was recognized by one of the Members, before whom his Company's Paper had passed in the way of business. Every rogue is not met with a detection so opportune.

The Ladies' Committee is a very interesting part of the Society's system. Under their care work-mans are opened for the employment of females, and such as are fit for service are appointed to families who apply for them. Needle-work will be gratefully received, and more is wanted to supply the number of women under the direction of the Committee. So recent young persons, too, who are willing and able to take service as apprentices to be dependent on charity for want of situations; whilst those who have gone into service are acquiring themselves to the entire satisfaction of their employers.

But the most remarkable portion of the Society's Report is that which is devoted to the Darknath Feud for Poor Blind. The unselfish donation by Baloo Darknath Tagore, of one lakh of Rupees, for the genuine objects of charity, forms a sort of era in Native liberality. The selection of their bounty to principles of utility and good sense is so exceedingly rare amongst the Natives of India, that the present instance is justly considered an innovation upon their established habits; and it is a splendid one. It brings the Baloo to feel a return of esteem and applause, that one can scarcely speak with propriety of his being disinterested in the business. But there can be no mistake in commending the soundness of his understanding and the justice of his feelings, in seeking applause by such means. The donation was entirely the spontaneous act of the Baloo; and the selection of its objects in the poor blind was likewise his own. Few have stronger claims on humanity.

We cannot say that we are satisfied with the appropriation of the 500 Rupees per annum, which the Baloo's donation forms. It does little more than relieve it a general funds of the Society, from the charge of the blind poor as its pensioners. A few more such objects of pity, too, the Society is thus enabled to maintain, whom it might otherwise have been unable to succour. But surely it would have been better to have profited by this opportunity of showing the people of India at large, that the blind can both be educated and employed in profitable industry—and need, therefore, be no burden to themselves or their friends. The Blind Asylum are amongst the most interesting institutions of our native land. No one who has once passed through their busy work-shops, and witnessed the lively cheerfulness of their inmates, can forget the delight they then experienced. The last triumph of benevolence on behalf of the blind has been lately gained, in creating a literature for them; and it is not to the objects of public charity that the blessing is confined. Whatever is done for them spreads through the community, and the blind of every rank share in the benefit. It is not long since we met with an instance of this which gratified us exceedingly. Going from London to Leith in one of the magnificent steamers on that station, we had a blind musician of much respectability amongst the passengers. On the Sabbath evening, when most of the company were at deck, we saw him come into the Saloon with a green bag, seat himself in a quiet corner, and draw out a large book, which he began tracing with the tip of his fingers; and in that employment he continued, evidently with great satisfaction, for several hours. It was a most beautiful sight. We thought it would be impatience to break in upon his tranquil enjoyment; but at another time we entered into conversation with him on the subject. His book consisted of two of the gospels, printed in unbossed Roman capitals. Three months before, he did not know the form of a letter, and could not spell his own name. But a kind gentleman had procured an alphabet and some spelling lessons for him, and then given him a little instruction in their use. He needed no more. With the Bible he was happily familiar, and now he could grope his own way through chapter after chapter. The good man was independent in every way; and a more contented, happy individual there was not in the ship.

It may be long before the Indian tilled can furnish such examples; but it is high time to begin our efforts for their deliverance from the gloom and degradation in which they are now sunk. It is almost throwing Diakunath's splendid benediction away, to deal it out amongst some hundreds of blind pensioners. It is sufficient for higher purposes.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY FOR 1838—We have just been favoured with a printed copy of the Report of this useful and interesting Society, during the past year; of which we proceed to lay a brief analysis before our readers.

The Society now numbers four hundred and twenty members; of whom more than a fourth forms the addition of the last year. Of this increase we are happy to perceive that forty-three, or one-tenth, consists of Indigo Planters, or gentlemen engaged in Agricultural pursuits. The number of supporters from this class of the community has been doubled in the course of the last year, which is a matter of sincere congratulation, because it is chiefly to them that we are to look for the practical application of the information which the Society is able to collect.

The Native Members of the Society are limited to twenty-nine; they are to the Europeans in the proportion of one to fifteen. The Report says, and with great truth; 'The few who have allied themselves with their European brethren, if we may judge from their neglect in attending the meetings, care little about its concerns.' The Zemindars care nothing about its concerns. Nothing can be farther from their anxiety than any real improvement of the land, of which the British Government has for the first time made them mahals, or proprietors. There are three principal objects of concern among the Zemindars; to rack-rent the tenants, to overreach Government, and to play the fool at weddings, funeral obsequies and poojals. The Report hopes the next generation will see an improvement on the present. We hope so too; although against appearances.

The Society has been deprived by death of its indefatigable Secretary, the late Mr. John Bell, to whose exertions it is so greatly indebted for the eminent position which it is now enabled to occupy among the Institutions at this Presidency. We are happy to find that the Society has not limited the expression of its gratitude for those services to a barren resolution, but has justly,—we will not say generously,—voted a year's allowances to his widow and destitute orphan.

Among the new efforts of the Society during the past year, we find that a handsome schedule of rewards has been voted as an encouragement to individuals to import foreign cattle into this part of India. The award was made in February for the best bred cow, and best woolled merino ram. In this department the Society will have a sharp competition to sustain with the Agricultural Society of Bombay, where the production of superior wool has advanced in the course of three or four years with unexampled strides.

As it regards Otahite Cane, in the propagation of which Major Steeman has been so successful at Ambulpoore, 2,047 canes have been received from that station, four cases from Singapore, and twenty-two from the Island of Bourbon, which have yielded a harvest that has enabled the Society to distribute thirty four thousand canes to different applicants in various parts of Lower Hindoostan. It is to be hoped that the Society will be enabled to obtain and to publish in its next Report the results which have attended the dispatch of this superior species of cane, and the prospects which are held out from these exertions of improving generally the character of Indian Sugars.

Great attention has been paid to the introduction of the fine grained Cochineal Insects into India; and it appears, after much controversy, to be ascertained, that the insect which has been obtained, is really the fine grained insect The Society's Gold and Silver Medals have been liberally distributed to those who have been instrumental in promoting its views in this respect; and we find that it is now proposed to make an application to Government for the high premium, we believe of 20,000 Rs., which was offered for the introduction of this insect some thirty years ago, when commercial views predominated in the councils of Leadenhall Street.

In addition to the twelve existing Branch Societies, two have been formed this year; the one at Dacca; the other, at Sagur; and the Parent Society has wisely determined to appropriate silver medals and pecuniary rewards to each of its Branch Institutions, that the Native gentry and Agriculturists may be stimulated to increased exertions.

The Report then proceeds to recapitulate the various objects for which prizes have been voted and which yet remain open to competition. The Society has determined to keep up a small plantation for rearing fruit trees; and the Nursery Committee are now prepared to distribute plants to members for their own use. As it regards the publication of the Society's Transactions, the fifth volume appeared at the beginning of last year; the sixth is now on the eve of publication, and will contain various papers and documents of the highest interest. The great demand which has been made for the preceding volumes of its Transactions which have been far sometimes out of print, has induced the Society to commit a second edition of the first three volumes to the press.

As it regards funds, the Society appears to be in a flourishing condition. The sum of twenty thousand Rupees which Lord William Bentinck gave to the Society during the currency of the old Charter, to be distributed in prizes for various objects of national utility, perished in the wreck of Alexander and Co.'s House. But by the indefatigable exertions of Mr. Bell, and by his able financial arrangements, the Society is now in possession of a similar sum of 20,000 Rs., vested in Government Securities, and partly pledged as prizes for various objects. The receipts of the year amounted to 15,160 Rs., and the expenditure to 14,971. We see the Madras community rather envious of our prosperity, and ready to attribute it to the advantage which Bengal enjoys as being the seat of the Supreme Government. Even if that were the case, which it is not, for the Supreme Government is at Simlah, a glance at the account will show how little the flourishing state of the funds is owing to the encouragement of the State. The whole sum received from Government in the last year, did not amount to more than two thousand, six hundred and seventy-five Rupees, two annas. The strength of the Society lies not in its locality, nor even in the smiles of Government, but in the number and zeal of its members; and whenever either Madras or Bombay can number four hundred and twenty members in its Agricultural Society, it will cease to sigh for the patronage of the State.

THE MILITARY ORPHAN PRESS.—The Calcutta Courier has just put forth a notice, with the sanction of Government, that the public authorities, with the view of aiding the Military Orphan Society, had entered into an engagement for the execution of all public printing at its Press, on condition that 30,000 Rupees of the profits of the establishment should be devoted to the Institution at Kishorepore. We have heard that the contract has just been renewed for three years, though the Managers desired a longer extension of the monopoly. The Commercial Advertiser remarks upon this notice, that "if Government are disposed to be liberal towards the Serampore Printing Establishment, we are certain their liberality is highly merited by it; but whether Government can be justly liberal at the expense of the Military Orphan Society, is quite another thing." At the risk of being suspected of egotism, we cannot allow the fallacy implied in this remark to pass without correction. We never heard that Government felt any disposition to extend its liberality to the establishment at which this Journal is printed; and certainly the individual on whose shoulders the establishment rests, is the last person to seek it. The Serampore Press has long ceased to maintain any competition of interest with kindred establishments in Calcutta. It is more than a twelvemonth since the Proprietor, who was then the sole Editor of this Journal, finding the mechanical supervision of a Press incompatible with the intellectual duties connected with the Friend of India, and other publications to which he was engaged, was obliged to come to the determination of engaging the Press to those works in which he was habitually engaged; and he entrusted those who had entrusted him with the execution of their works, to remove them to other establishments; which was done in every instance in which it was practicable. Since that period, the operations of the Press have been strictly limited by the determination then formed, with the exception of one or two instances, in which the Proprietor was unable to withstand the wishes of his personal friends to superintend the progress of their writings through the Press. Whatever pecuniary loss this resolution may have occasioned, has been amply compensated by the generous encouragement which the public has afforded to this Journal. There is, therefore, no room for the exercise of public liberality toward the Serampore Press on the part of Government.

The proposal made last year to publish a Government Gazette, which should comprize a Bengalee translation of legislative orders which had never been made known in the vernacular tongue, was announced under the idea that it could never be considered as in the remotest degree infringing the monopoly of gala which the Orphan Press enjoyed. The price at which it was proposed to fix it, combined with the labour involved in getting it up, furnished any suspicion that the Orphan Press would condescend to touch it. And this has been fully corroborated by the fact, that although the negotiation has fallen through, and the field is open to the Orphan Press, the Management of the Bengal Military Orphan Society, with a dozen Bengalee translators, as they say, in their office, have not made one step toward the establishment of such a Journal. All that Dr. Corbyn and the Management have gained, therefore, has been to deprive the country of a publication most eagerly called for by the Native community, without at the same time securing a source of revenue for the Society.

This publication would have put the Natives immediately in possession of public orders, which it has always been unjust in Government to withhold from them. Of the extent to which the want of such a paper operates as an obstacle to justice, one instance out of fifty may suffice. In June, 1837, scarcely one month ago, the rules for the settlement of resumed free tenures, which had been approved by the Supreme Government and the Government of Bengal, and by which the proceedings of the officers conducting or resuming settlements were to be regulated, were sent to the various officers of Government; and it was stated that they would be embodied in a law then under preparation. This law has never been passed; and those rules, though they have now been in operation for nearly two years, have never been communicated in any shape, in English or in Bengalee, to the tens of thousands of persons affected by them. Again, the orders of the Privy Council, lowering the value of suits open to appeal to England, from 3000*l.* to 1000*l.* has never been published to the Native community. By slipping the Bengalee Gazette in the hole, the anomaly of requiring the Natives to conform to laws and ordinances of which they have never heard, has been prolonged; and it is impossible to say how long it may continue; for the Orphan Society will assuredly make no advance, and the projector can make no effort on his part to terminate the abeyance into which the negotiation has fallen.

It is a subject, however, which Government cannot neglect, consistently with its own honour and credit. Would it be believed in Europe, or if believed, would it rebound to the honour of the British Government in the East, that not one of the laws which have been passed during the last fifteen months, for the guidance of seventy millions of people, have been translated into their own vernacular languages? So far as the Natives are concerned, it would be an act of simple justice to place the labours of the Legislative Council, and thus to avoid the multiplication of practices, while the people are kept in ignorance of the laws. The Madras community is raising a cry respecting the partiality and preference which this Presidency receives from the Supreme Government, under the arrangements of the new Charter. Are we to take it as a token of this partiality, that while Madras, with fourteen millions of subjects, has five European translators, for the five languages which prevail at that Presidency, we have not one for five times that number of inhabitants?

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, MARCH 7.

The Bombay papers state, that Capt. Hennell, the British Resident at Bhubire, has received notice to quit that city, from the Persian Government; but this would amount to a declaration of war, for which that Court is not yet prepared.—Information has been received from Canton, on the 10th January; it is even more unfavourable as regards the Chinese authorities continued unimpaired. The vessels which had proceeded to the Eastern Coast had returned without having been able to effect any sales, owing to the vigilance of the Mandarins. The loss which this state of things would fall in bringing upon the mercantile community, must be ruinous.—Capt. Abbott is blamed for this by the Opium speculators; but it is not he who has stopped the trade, but the Chinese. By adding the weight of his authority to prohibitions which needed no such support, he has dexterously contrived to restore the legitimate trade.—Letters from the scene of operations on the Indus state, that Mr. Macgregor was in direct communication with Dost Mahomed, and that the Chiefs of Candahar had agreed to his proposals.—Ranjee Singh seems to cling to life with extraordinary tenacity; but his sands appear to be ebbing fast. His death will throw the whole of the Punjab into a state of commotion. Three corps are ordered to march on Ferozepore, and the ground has been already marked out for them.—The Agra Ukher states, that Sir William Campbell is now on his way to Calcutta, to take his seat in Council, after the departure of Col. Morrison; and that Mr. B. travels in a camel carriage, fitted up somewhat like Napoleon's, and drawn by three camels.—The Demerita went ashore at high water mark, and cannot, then, have been taken off before the next spring-tide. The treasure contained in her, sixty boxes, has been sent on to Bombay; her coal has been a narrow margin; and her engines it is proposed to take out; but she will be lost to the cause of strict navigation between India and Bombay, if not her crew, at least for the present season.—Capt. Foster, of the Bombay Engineers, has been ordered to Aden, to determine what improvements will be necessary in the fortification. Government, it is said, are anxious to lose no time in developing its commercial facilities.

THURSDAY, MARCH 8.

The Englishman gives an amusing scrap from a Scottish paper, which tells us that a package of seeds, addressed from Calcutta to Messrs. Lawson and Son, Narserymen, at Edinburgh, was lately presented to them with a demand for 112*s.* postage.—A singular case has just turned up in the Supreme Court. The Master's report had allowed Messrs. O'Brien and Co., and their bailiwick, as fit and proper securities for entering into recognizances with Mr. Charles Reed, in the sum of 3,82,000 Rupees, to enable that gentleman to take out of the Court a sum of 1,60,000 Rs. Mr. Clark and Mr. Osborne started objections to this. The Advocate General and Mr. Prince contended that it would introduce an extraordinary principle, if commercial security was to be in every case refused by the Court, and the Court allowed mercantile security to be good security, but advised that where the property exceeded a lakh of Rupees, the Master should require distinct and independent securities for each lakh.—The Draught—an Actio non published, showing pictures the Lament of Counsel's address, in cases of felony as well as of misdemeanors.—The Officiating Post Master General has just published a notification, that full steam postage will be demanded on all letters sent to Mr. Waghorn's care. This is right and proper; but what if the authorities in England, who set very independently, should demand the two and sixpence in London, before the delivery of the letters?—The Strand Mills have just been sold for the sum of one lakh and twenty thousand Rupees. They must have cost originally three or four times that sum.

FRIDAY, MARCH 9.

A full length portrait of Lord William Bentinck, painted by Mr. Phillips, has been received from England, at Madras; and with the permission of the Honorable the Governor, placed in the hanging gallery, room.—The Bombay papers state, that in consequence of strong representations from Mr. McNell, the Wellsley has been ordered to Bushire, with positive orders to take the place.—Intelligence has been received from Raungoon to the end of January. The troops had gone out against the insurgents; and, it is said, totally defeated them; the Chivan their return were crowned with success, and some of the unfortunate prisoners were put to death with the most execrating tortures. But none of the prisoners belonged to the insurgent army, and there is reason to suppose that the insurrection is only a pretence for sending troops into Raungoon, which now enjoys the presence of four British vessels of war.—Letters from the banks of the Indus state, that the Bengal troops which had been pushed on towards Hyderabad, commenced their retrograde movement to Roree, on the 11th February.—Letters from Arracan state, that the Burmese were engaged in erecting stockades on their own side of the pass leading to the valley of the Irrawaddy; but that on our side of the mountains there was no single stockade in which to place the magazine and commissariat stores.—Mr. Ripper, of the Bombay Bar, has been appointed to a seat on the bench in that Court, which affords a hope that the home authorities are at length returning to the wise old plan of rewarding distinguished talent at the Indian bar, by a seat on the bench, instead of the modern system of filling the bench invariably with gentlemen totally unacquainted with the country or its institutions.—The report of the District Charitable Society in this day published at full length in the Calcutta papers. We have given an analysis of this interesting document in our editorial columns.

MONDAY, MARCH 11.

The Bombay papers state that Sir John Keane, after having settled every thing in the most satisfactory manner, is now increasing with his troops up the right bank of the Indus. The wisdom of His Excellency's conduct towards the Amers of Hyderabad will admit of much controversy. They offered to come down to the east bank of the Indus, if Sir John Keane would cross the river to meet them; but he refused to see them, unless they came across the river to his tent. Whether this degree of hauteur was politic, remains to be proved by events. We have become so incontrovertibly great by the submission of the Scindians, that the Commander of a British Division of troops might have afforded a little condescension, without much loss of dignity.—The Willsch is not going to leave down Bushire, and for the best of all reasons, because Lady Malabar accompanies the Admiral in his ship.—Capt. Taylor, who has been for some time past employed in making enquiries connected with the Post Office, resigns his office, and is to be succeeded by Mr. Baubin. A horse hawk is talked of for the road between Calcutta and Raungoon; and it is said, somewhat prematurely, that the projector will make three or four hundred Rupees by his enterprise.—A letter from the Court of Directors states, that a Mr. Thomas Barber, of the Bombay Civil Service, has served them a shabby turn. He has sent home a private memorial to each of the Directors, for which they have been charged twelve pounds each; they refused to receive the memorial or to pay the money. They only returned for such acts, to the sender both here and at home to be called on to pay his own postage.—The intelligence from Moultan, up to the 12th February, looks warlike. Military stores continue to pour into Moultan; and it is said that Col. Baines's position is not a safe one; that Chattranah is not likely to let him rest. At Raungoon, there are three vessels of war, besides the Willsch, which has put the Burmese into a wholesome fright. But there will be no war till October next, if then, Douglas Col. Baines has received directions from Government to practise the magnanimous virtue of patience till the rains are over, and then to come away, after which there can be no doubt that England will be annexed to the British empire in the East, and surveyed to be employed to lay down a road, which shall enable the efficient Moultan to receive letters from their brothers in arms at Calcutta, in six weeks.—The last despatch of officers by the Willsch, amounted to fourteen thousand, four hundred and forty Prançions; but not half what it would be under the conservative scheme.

TUESDAY, MARCH 12.

The Madras papers state, that the de-patch of details and material for the troops at Moultan continues unabated. Three vessels had tendered for the conveyance of them, of which two have just come out from England on speculation.—The Governor General was recently robbed of his gold watch, and other valuable property, at mid-day. No trace of the depredateur has been discovered. The Aggra Chattr calls this the march of civilization; we should rather call it the march of roguery.—A case of what is called "heavy pecuniary involvement," has just come to light at Suvaorad. A young officer reported to have property at home, drew heavily on it. It now appears he had no property to draw against; and he is said to have been committed. A fashionable tradesman has been duped by him out of 12,000 Rupees worth of jewellery. What business has a tradesman, fashionable or otherwise, to trust a suitor with jewellery, fit for a countess?—Intelligence has been received that the 70th N. I. now at Sighet, has received orders to march across the Cossyah Hills, to Assam, without delay, as the Assamese have lately been much alarmed with sallies from the neighbouring states, and the Commissioner has no faith in his men.—A letter from Chittagong states, that a Church is about to be built there, and that a clergyman will be located there at no distant time. The Baptist Chapel begun by the old Serampore Missionaries, is nearly finished. The Roman Catholic Clergyman at the Station has it is said, just opened a school there, which is very large.—The sum which has been subscribed to the Mechanics Institute is said to amount to 2,200 Rs., and a hundred and twenty persons have enrolled their names as members.—Among the late

Bombay, and the elevation of Mr. Henry Roper to the bench of that presidency; and we feel assured that sufficient good must result from these selections to induce the Home Authorities to make previous service in this country, the rule, instead of the exception, on all future occasions of the occurrence of a vacancy.

Sir James Carnaroe will, we apprehend, be extensively popular in India,—at all events he rendered efficient service to the country during his occupation of a seat in the Direction, to entitle him to the zealous co-operation of the subordinate officers of Government, at least at the commencement of his administration. His long residence in the West of India, where, as Major Carnaroe, he filled an important political office with great success, will have sufficiently prepared him for the climate, the usages of the country, its language, &c., while his close attention to Indian affairs during his five and twenty years' residence in England, will have kept him au courant of all that has passed in the interval of absence.

Mr. Roper's rise has been remarkably rapid, but it has been fairly earned, and cannot fail to give satisfaction to the presidency to which he is appointed. Twelve years ago, Mr. Roper came to Bombay to practise as a barrister, having had but little previous experience in England, and earnestly animated by the hope of finding an opening in India. The bar was full, and the practice monopolized by men above the usual average of talent, each of whom was making from two to six thousand pounds a year (and in some instances more than that) by his lawness, or his official station. Accident, however,—an accident that does not occur once in a hundred years,—threw Mr. Roper into practice almost immediately after his arrival. It happened that an attorney, in a large way of business, had given high offence to one of the most eminent men at the bar, by his unceremonious treatment of certain aids, which, for want of a better word, we will call aristocratical. The irritated barrister caused one of his brethren to move that the offending attorney should be struck off the rolls. The attorney endeavored to find a counsel amongst the experienced practitioners to defend him, but they were all so linked by the ties of friendship, interest, or etiquette, that he did not succeed. A Mr. Mill, indeed, took the matter up, but in so lukewarm and reluctant a manner that his defence threatened to do more harm to the attorney, than the dictates of Mr. (afterwards Sir James) Dewar, who had recently arrived, and was to lead the attack. In this extremity, the attorney threw himself upon Mr. Roper, and though it was that gentleman's first appearance in the Court, and his position was one of peculiar delicacy, he nevertheless took up the cause from a sense of duty and justice, and manfully fought the battle of his client. The result was a complete triumph. The Judges (even the one, Sir Ralph Rier, notoriously most favourable to the bar,) complimented him upon his independence and skill as an advocate,—the attorneys thereforth overhauled him with bricks,—and the discomfited barrister, a Mr. Parry, went to England, in disgust, almost immediately. The appointment of another leading member of the bar to the Advocate Generalship of Malacca,—the elevation of Mr. Dewar to the bench, as one of Lord Eilenborough's tame elephants,—the return to England of Mr. Mill, the standing counsel, and the illness of one or two other barristers,—no new practitioners coming in the interim,—soon left Mr. Roper without any competitors of consequence. In fact, as we once heard Mr. Taiton say in his usual drab suit, 'Mr. Roper had every thing in the Court, except the doubtful satisfaction of being engaged by both sides.' He was clerk of the Crown, and Advocate General, acted also, we believe, as Master in Equity, and held some other offices, while he was employed in every case, and consulted by almost every body who had anything to do with lawyers and the law. This monopoly enabled him to return home in the prime of life, with a handsome fortune, and we believe he did not intend coming to India again. The prize now offered him, however, is too brilliant and honourable, and he certainly would have done wrong not to have accepted it. We hope, and believe, that he will follow in the footsteps of other eminent men in the judicial office, and give the educational, and other public institutions at Bombay, the benefit of his high intelligence and liberal patronage. We know him to be animated by the noblest feelings that do honour to human nature, though his duty to his clients, and to the Court, prevented him, when last in India, from applying much of his time to purposes not purely professional.—Eng. March 9.

ADDRESS TO COLONEL JERVIS.

We have much pleasure in laying the following address before the public:—

A deputation of the Native friends and pupils of Colonel Jervis, the late Superintendent of Public Instruction, waited on him (at Captain Whitlock on the Esplanade) on Friday, at 11 o'clock A. M. to present him with an address, on his approaching departure to England. The deputation was attended by several of the Hindoo and East Indian subscribers; but most of them being at a distance from the presidency, and others prevented from unavoidable engagements, only a few could be present on the occasion. The following address was read and presented by Ball Goughathur Shastree, in accordance with the resolution of the subscribers.

LIEUT. COL. G. R. JERVIS,

Sir,—We, the undersigned Pupils, School Masters, Assistant Surveyors, and Builders, and others, cannot permit you to take your leave of us without offering you a humble but sincere expression of our gratitude for the many obligations which we have received from you, and of the indebtedness with which we view your approaching departure from this country.

The inhabitants of this presidency, in general, have any reason to be grateful to you for the benevolence and liberality with which you volunteered your services in the cause of the diffusion of useful knowledge among the natives of this country for the ardour and energy with which you laboured to carry into effect the enlightened views of the noble-minded Governor, the Hon'ble Mr. Elphinstone, in connection with the accomplishment of the objects of the Native Education Society and the late Engineer Institution; for the indefatigable zeal with which you commenced and successfully prosecuted the arduous and then unanticipated task of translating works on Science from the languages of Europe into the vernacular dialects of the country, and bringing the latter to a state of improvement from the rude and colloquial forms in which they previously existed; for the perseverance with which you laboured to surmount the many obstacles that impeded the progress of education, and to lay down the foundation of the most rational and practicable method of imparting instruction to our countrymen, the fruits of which are gradually developing themselves in the increased desire of the native community for the publication of additional works on European literature and science, the establishment of schools, and the education of the rising generation in the English language and the inexhaustible store of knowledge which it contains; and, lastly, for the powerful aid and co-operation which you afforded to the natives of this side of India, in the realization of their wishes with regard to the establishment of a superior seminary of instruction in honor of Mr. Elphinstone. For these important services, the benefits of which are calculated to extend not only to the farthest ends of the presidency, but even to our latest posterity, any expression of gratitude which we can offer, is, we are persuaded, utterly inadequate.

But we have more particular reason to be grateful to you. Most of us have been educated under your own personal superintendence, in the schools of the Native Education Society and the late Engineer Institution; and we feel that we owe, in a great measure, to your kindness the means of respectable maintenance, which we have the good fortune to enjoy at a time like the present.—As a small token of our gratitude for these obligations and for the kindness and urbanity which marked your private intercourse with us on all occasions, we beg leave to solicit your acceptance of a piece of plate, which will be prepared and presented to you in England by Messrs R. Scott, Fairlie and Co. Permit us to assure you that we shall never cease to remember the warm interest which you have taken in our welfare ever since the time we placed ourselves under your care and instruction.

With the most hearty wishes and earnest prayers to the Almighty for your long life and for your speedy restoration to this country in improved vigour and health, from your present temporary retirement to England.

Worthy Sir,

We remain, with the greatest respect and esteem,
Your most obedient humble servant,
(Signed) KANCHIYERNA SHASTREE, Inspector of Mat-tala Schools.

BAPU SHASTREE SHOOKLE, Mameetar of Poona.

MORESHWAR SHASTREE, of the Poona College.

BALL GUNADHUP SHASTREE, Assistant Professor, Elphinstone College.

WISWAS NORDEN COCHRAY, Native RASCHUTTA VIZIANATH, Assistant

PURCHURAN NARAYAN, Surveyors.

VINAKK BICKAJEE, Assistant Surveyors.

W. WENDE, Assistant Surveyors.

W. H. BELL, of the Revenue Survey.

JESHER RAMCHANDRA, Native School

RASATYU PANDIT, Master.

DEWATYU, NAKKA NARAYAN, late Tutor to the Rajah of Jhalra.

BALLAJEE SHONDERJEE, Commissary General's Office.

MURUGA CANOBA, Sitters Receiver.

And about 100 others, Pundits, Assistant Surveyors, School Masters, &c.

Bombay, Feb. 22, 1859.

After the address was read, Colonel Jervis returned the following reply:—

My Friends,—It is now nearly seventeen years since I became engaged under the patronage of the Honorable Mountstuart Elphinstone, in the arduous task of carrying into effect his wish to introduce a system of useful practical education among the natives of this presidency. On the eve, therefore, of my departure in Europe, perhaps never to return to this country, I write with the utmost gratification the address with which you have just presented me, as it shows an expressively that you are fully sensible of the inevitable benefits which that most distinguished and enlightened Governor was so anxious to confer on you; and that you at the same time, appreciate, although much too highly, the merit which may be ascribed to me for the manner in which I devoted my time and attention to the perfecting of that system, and to the instruction of the natives in the learning of Europe. But these labours would have been ineffectual, had not the natives themselves, notwithstanding the prejudice naturally opposed to a new system of Education, been desirous to receive that instruction, and had they not possessed the capacity to acquire that knowledge which can alone promote the improvement of the human mind. It is, consequently, with much satisfaction, but perfect sincerity, that I now assure you of my conviction, derived from long and intimate intercourse with the natives, that the inhabitants of India are endowed with intellectual capabilities which admit of their acquiring as high a degree of culture and refinement, as any people in Europe; and my well grounded expectation that they will continue to avail themselves of those means of mental improvement, which Mr. Elphinstone first placed at their disposal. But they should, also, recollect that ability and literary acquirements will be of no advantage, unless they are, at all times, accompanied with propriety of conduct and incorruptible integrity; and it is, therefore, a gratifying reflection that (with only one or two unfortunate exceptions) all the young men who have been educated under me, are universally respected and sought after, not only for their talents, but for their rectitude and probity.

Thus entertaining towards you, and the Natives in general, the sentiments which I have now, but inadequately expressed, and feeling a deep interest in all that relates to Native Education, I receive your highly flattering but most acceptable address, and also the mark of respect and esteem now offered, with sincere pleasure, as testimonials that I have not misunderstood the Native character, and as assurances that the enlightened intentions of Mr. Elphinstone have produced these effects, which he so benevolently contemplated. These testimonials, too, as well as the handsome memorial presented to me by my esteemed Native friends on the 10th May, 1850, I shall have much pride and gratification in transmitting to my children, as incentives to induce them to use their exertions whenever in their power, in the promotion of useful and philanthropic undertakings.

Believe me with every good and kind wish,

Your sincere friend,

GEORGE JERVIS, Esq. Col.

Late Superintendent of Public Instruction.

EDICT AGAINST THE SMOKING OF OPIUM.

Another edict against the smoking of Opium has been issued by the Viceroy during the week, as will be seen from our columns, and the Opium trade continues absolutely stopped. It is, however, remarked that in many parts of the country the Police have met with resistance when intending to search houses, and it is even said that in a town in this province, the people have bid open defiance to the Government—have not only not permitted the attempted search after Opium—but have, to show the little esteem in which they hold the Government orders, openly posted over their shop doors "Opium sold here." This boldness appears to be almost incredible, and this report needs confirmation to be believed. It is also confidently asserted, that the Governor of the Province of Pe-che-lee has addressed a strong memorial to the Court (and of this document several copies have reached Canton, though we have as yet not been able to obtain one,) representing the injustice and illegality of awarding the punishment of death to Opium-smokers, and denying the right of the Government to make any such sanguinary laws. It also appears that among the Chinese these rumours or accusations have caused a belief in a speedy abatement of the Government's severity against the Opium trade; we, for the present are nothing to justify such a belief, for though the severity against the smokers may be relaxed, it does not follow that equal leniency will be shown to dealers, and, in fact, two men were seized in a painter's shop in old China-street, only a few days ago, charged with having concealed Opium there. It is perhaps not so much the severity of the Government's measures against the dealers in Opium, as the abuses these measures give rise to that excite them to be looked upon unfavourably by the Chinese in general, as much so, indeed, it is said, as to have caused the determination in Canton to be general among them, to oppose forcibly any attempted search. It is said that for the sake of extortion, the Police-runners themselves, or their friends, manage to hide some balls of Opium in a man's house—then denounce him to the authorities—are permitted to search—and of course find the Opium where they concealed it. An instance of this happened lately in a village near the Bogue. A young man was celebrating his marriage, and among the party feast, were some who clandestinely entering his bedroom, concealed under it a small quantity of Opium. On the morrow Police runners entered the house, and charging him with dealing in Opium, took it, with the young man, before the magistrate, who ordered him to be thrown into prison. The aged father of this young man, hearing of what had happened, immediately went to the magistrate, protested in the strongest terms that his son had never been engaged in the smuggling of Opium and offered him one hundred taels and that of many of his friends, that his son might be released. The Magistrate treated these assurances with contempt, on which the old man, in despair, dashed his brains out against the table and expired on the spot. The young wife of the prisoner then appeared to implore the release of her husband, but her interests meeting with no better success than those of the father, she in presence of the Magistrate cut her throat. An account of these proceedings is said to have been forwarded to the authorities of Canton, and this must lead to strict investigation. Many similar instances of the dishonest practices of magistrates and Police runners are related, but none where the consequences have been so tragical.—Canton Press, January 12.

MISSENGER AND ECCLESIASTICAL MOVEMENTS.

We regret to announce the death of our esteemed and beloved friend the Rev. J. P. Coney. He died of syphilis and cholera. His end was sudden but peaceful.—The Rev. Messrs. Wilkinson and Parsons, of the Baptist Mission, with their ladies arrived on the Mofussil—all well. We understand some brethren connected with the American Presbyterian Mission have also arrived and departed for the Upper Provinces. We regret not having seen them even once! May our new brethren long live and labour with success amongst the natives.

The Rev. J. Williams, the enterprising South Sea Missionary, has been exciting deep interest in New South Wales. The Governor of that colony has sanctioned in every way, his laudable enterprise.—The Bishop of Calcutta and his Chaplain, the Rev. H. Pratt, have undertaken for the present, the duties of Professors at Bishop's College. We regret to state that this is owing to the indisposition of Professor Machin, who leaves immediately for China, and to the absence of Professor Withers from the same cause. May they both be speedily restored to their important sphere of labour.—Calcutta Christian Observer.

MEMORIALS OF THE MONTH.

A meeting has been held of the pupils and friends of Mr. Penney, to consider the best method of extending their regard for that noble, forgotten servant of God. It was unanimously resolved a tablet either in the school or in the Church of St. Charles, to be in his honour. The Rev. clergyman held the first anniversary of a Free School in connection with Mrs. W. and Mr. A. and Mr. B. Three Clergymen in Liverpool have, we understand, undertaken to support the Missionary, who is labouring in connection with this interesting establishment. We hope he will soon arrive and be a laborious faithful servant of God.—It is said that about 8000 natives have exhibited opposition at the labours of the Church Missionary, the Rev. W. Deane, of Kishmagur. The history of this remarkable manifestation is, we hear, deeply interesting. They are a set who have long been separated from the idolatrous Hindoos. The Archbishop has visited the applicants on the spot, and is, we believe, satisfied with the sincerity of their desires. Our prayer is, that they may in fact be devout, pious, and successful after truth, and that this may be the first fruit of India to Christ, in such a scale as we believe conversion will be made when the work of God once begins to prosper as it must do before the end come.—Happily for the character of Christian Britain the Opium trade is at an end! The prophesies, a few months back, though denied at the time have proved true. China has brought England to her knees.—The Friend of India says, that a true and exempted opinion, "as every true truth has exempted injustice, immorality and non-moral conduct." It is in contemplation to form a Society for the protection of Native Christians from the oppression of Zemindars and others, and also an Anti-Slavery Society to watch over the movements of the slave-traders of India and Africa, to be incorporated with the Society. Before this number goes to press, the friends of the M. C. Society will have met for the fourth, and that excellent Society, "The Friends of the Slave," have held the First Annual Meeting of that Society at the Town Hall, during the month. The Society is present—participating in one more.—Ibid.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Friend of India the Friend of India.

Sirs,—Embarking the opinion that no opportunity should be lost of discussing the important question of the improvement of the Mofussil Police in all its bearings, I beg to offer a few remarks on the subject.

Notwithstanding all that has been said and written in abuse of the present Police system, I still think that if the causes which operate in rendering that system inefficient, were removed, it would be as well adapted for this country as any other that could be devised, not even excepting Mr. Haliday's, which, however ingenuously conceded, would, I strongly suspect, prove to be a total failure when put into practice. The chief cause which has rendered the Police of this country inefficient of late years, is the little interest which has been taken by Government in that branch of the administration, compared with the Revenue department, to the improvement of which all the best energies of the State have of late been directed. However great and meritorious the exertions of a Magistrate may have been in maintaining the peace of his district, they have met with little or no encouragement; while the exertions of the Collector and Revenue Officer were sure to open a road to honours and emolument. That the Police duties should be neglected under such a system is not to be wondered at—and as long as those duties are considered of secondary importance, so long will the Police be inefficient, whether managed by a high sounding and complicated system of machinery, or by the present abused and despised agents.

In former days, when the Judicial department held its proper place in the estimation of Government, an active Magistrate used to take a pride in having his district in good order; and the effects of this were apparent in the improved state of the Police of such districts, and in the attention paid to the state of the roads; the comforts of the prisoners in jail, and all such matters. Let any one compare the present state of one of these districts under any one of the modern Collector-Magistrates with the former, and mark the difference. Police Officers left to their own devices; little or no security of property, roads neglected, prisoners not cared for, &c. Let Government separate the Magisterial from the Revenue functions, and make it generally understood, that exertions in the first named department, will meet with at least as much encouragement as in the last—and there will be no occasion for the introduction of any changes into the present system, beyond those suggested by the Police Committee, which I quite approve of.

It has been suggested that it would be advisable to extend the operations of Major Maclean and his Assistants, to the suppression of Dacoity—but this suggestion is founded on the erroneous supposition, that an organized system of Dacoity exists throughout the country—requiring a combined system of operations to put it down. Such (at least as far as my experience goes,) is not the case; and even if it were, the ordinary Police agents would have no difficulty in coping with it. I have known Dacoities entirely suppressed in one of the most troublesome districts in Bengal,* where they were extremely prevalent, and of the most sanguinary kind, merely by a little exertion on the part of the Magistrate, (who was also Collector,) and by a little vigilance being thereby infused into the Police. There is a wide difference between Dacoity and Thuggee; the former is openly committed, and offenders can rarely escape detection, if proper measures are adopted to secure it. The latter crime is perpetrated by stealth, and every means, which human ingenuity can devise, are adopted to conceal against detection. Such a system, of course, requires the exertions of a distinct set of officers to hunt out, and bring the offenders to justice; but such is not the case with Dacoity, in which I have rarely known the exertions of the Police to fail, when properly directed and encouraged. Dacoities are almost invariably put up by one or more of the Bhadras of a village, who collect together some of the idle and dissipated characters in the neighbourhood, by the promise of a division of the spoil (a promise rarely kept). These men, have, perhaps, never met before, and after the completion of the robbery, the party is dispersed, not to meet again, even if they happen to do so in jail. To call such a system organized, is as great a mistake, as to compare it with Thuggee.

Your obedient servant,
WILLIAM

ATLASBURG.—Dr. Wolff.—On Sunday evening last, the Rev. J. Wolff, L.L.D., preached to a very large congregation in our parish church, which was densely crowded on the occasion. The sermon occupied two hours in the delivery, and consisted of arguments and quotations from Scripture in favour of the millennial doctrine of the personal reign of our blessed Saviour on this earth, and the return of the Jews to their own promised land with their conversion, as a nation, to Christianity. The collection amounting to £11. 0. 0. the following evening (Monday) the learned and reverend gentleman gave another address, which consisted chiefly of relations of his personal adventures and travels in the Oriental world. The address was announced to take place in the Free School, but so great was the crowd which attended, that accommodation was impossible, and the audience was adjourned, by mutual consent, to the church; which was hardly large enough to contain the numbers that thronged to hear the rev. gentleman. The address was amusing and instructive, from the novelty of the relations and the lively manner in which they were told, as illustrating many passages of Scripture not generally understood. A narrative of Dr. Wolff's personal adventures is on the eve of publication. Dr. Wolff has been lecturing at High Wycombe, and preaching at Great Kimble. The Bishop of London not only strongly recommends Dr. Wolff to the attention of all serious divines, but has lately presented him to the living of Litchwain, in Lancashire, near Huddersfield.—Asbury News.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE PATRIOT.

DEAR SIR,—Allow me, through your columns, to avail myself of the earliest opportunity of correcting some important errors into which I have fallen in "A Summary" of the ecclesiastical statistics of London, which forms one of the articles of the Supplement to the Congregational Magazine, which is just published.

They relate to the extent of church and chapel room, and the distribution of the means of grace in this vast city. It is my intention to cancel the four pages in which they occur, by publishing, with the January Magazine, a quarter of a sheet, containing a correct summary of those extensive and minute inquiries which have been presented on that subject. Last, however, these inaccurate statements should be quitted, allow me to present you with the corrected returns of the accommodation for public worship throughout the cities and boroughs of this metropolis, as under:—

191 Parish and district churches, .....	207,121	Sittings,
64 Proprietary Episcopial chapels, .....	52,835	—
408 Nonconformist places, .....	219,958	—

1038 Places of worship, with ..... 479,909 —
As the population of the seven cities and boroughs amounts to 1,384,254 persons, so they require church accommodation to the extent of 117,125 sittings. Now, there are 479,909 sittings provided, leaving a deficiency of 21,610.—Pat.

MISCELLANEOUS.

"The sub-committee appointed to prepare a condensed statement of the income and expenditure of the City of London Corporation, from the report of the revenue committee appointed by the Court of Common Council on the accounts of 1838, and from other city and parliamentary documents, and to report the sums to the general committee, have, pursuant to such order, implored into the matter to them referred, and agreed to the following report:—

"Your committee find that the income of the City of London for the year 1837 amounted, according to the report published by the revenue committee appointed by the Court of Common Council to be applied to the same, to the sum of £71,347. 16s. 7d., and £ 82. 0s. 0d. respectively. It is your committee's considered statement that the sum of £ 82. 0s. 0d. is the correct sum."

"Your committee also find that the income of the City of London for the year 1837 amounted, according to the chamberlain's published returns, which they have examined, to the sum of £82,090. 10s. 6d.

"To test your committee also find that the said sum of £82,090. 10s. 6d. does not include the rateable value of the real-estate revenue, the house duty, the tax levied by the officers of the corporation, the tax of ad valorem on the value of the Corporation's Approaches Fund, the Court of Raggeds fund, and sundry other sources of income, the amount of which your committee are unable to ascertain; but, on referring to the report of the revenue of 1836, your committee find that such sources then amounted to the sum of £23,200. 10s. 6d., which, added to the said sum of £82,090. 10s. 6d., increases the income of 1837 to the sum of £105,290. 10s. 6d., which your committee believe to be considerably below the actual amount received for the year."

"Your committee are confirmed in their opinion that they have been accurately stated the income of 1837, in assuming the amount of the population of the City of London on the basis of 1833, inasmuch as in the following and other instances, in which they have obtained other data to guide them, they have found that to be invariably the case; thus they have taken the watch-rate at the sum of £6,151. 10s. 9d., whereas Mr. Alderman Venables officially reported to the common hall, on the 31st of October last, that the watch-rate for 1837 was £7,200. 10s. 6d., being an increase of £1,048. 10s. 6d. above the standard taken by your committee; and the house duty is reported by a committee of Common Council to average £8,000 per annum, whereas your committee have taken them at £7,000 only."

"Your committee have prepared, and beg to present to the general committee a detailed account of the incomes of the said years 1833 and 1837; and also of the expenditure of 1838; but find it impossible, from the imperfect statements of the accounts published by the corporation, to give any adequate idea of the actual disbursements of the Corporation. They feel it, however, to be their duty to direct attention to the following items:—

Expenses (chiefly tavern) of 18 committees of the
Common Council, .....	£1,564 16 8
Ditto of the navigation committee, .....	2,938 4 1
Law clerks, &c., besides the regular salaries of the law officers of the corporation, and 10,788 11s. 10d. on account of London-bridge, .....	16,908 4 10
Expenses of the (magistral) magistracy, .....	7,075 4 11
Expenses of collecting corn, coal, and putrescible duties, being a charge of 32 per cent. on the amount collected, .....	50,220 6 8
"The item of expenditure of 41,422. 17s. 4d. for the day and night police, and the great expenses of the magistracy, have also attracted the attention of your committee, who cannot close their report without expressing a hope that this unnecessary expenditure by an irresponsible body will receive the deliberate attention which so important a subject demands, since your committee cannot understand why a sum exceeding £32,200. 15s. 4d.,

which was received by the corporation of the city of London in the past year, is necessary to supply the municipal wants of 132,893 persons, forming only one-sixth of the inhabitants of the metropolis, and the city of London containing only 17,313 houses, the said sum makes an average tax of 31*l*. 6*s*. 3*d*. per annum for every house.

"All which your committee beg respectfully to submit."

NAPLES, Nov. 16.—The Queen of France of England attended Mount Vesuvius a few days since. Her Majesty's suite was very numerous, and required 25 pairs of mules, each borne by two men, to enable them to reach the summit without fatigue.—Idid.

DEAR LUTHER.—On Saturday morning the letter carrier presented to Messrs. Peter Lawson and Son, surveyors and auctioneers, Hunter-square, Edinburgh, a package addressed to them from Calcutta, marked "Seeds," for which the sum of 11*l*. 0*s*. 4*d*. was charged for the postage!—Idid.

The most recent accounts from the West Indies show that much oppression is still practised in various ways, especially by the demand of exorbitant rents for the lots which the negroes inhabit and have no means of quitting. These amounts, in some cases, are seven or eight shillings a week, and for the whole year. Thus, in some instances, a man has been called upon to pay this rent for himself, his wife, the same rent for herself, and his children, residing with their parents, and the same for his life. The rate of wages is also still a matter of every dispute. It has been estimated on some of our islands, for the high demands in which they are sold to exhaust their resources to preserve. But even if the facts were precisely as their adversaries state, it should be remembered that the highest rate of wages mentioned is not higher than, under the old system, a man was said by his employers to be worth per day, when they were asked to sell him, and he was himself to be the purchaser. Then they boasted that his labour was worth half a crown a day; this was the current price in Jamaica—half a crown was no more than his value then; but now that he has his labour to sell, and they are to be purchasers, half a crown a day is an enormous sum, and none but extortioners would encourage him to ask it!—Baptist Magazine.

CANADA.—The President of the United States has issued a proclamation on the 31st Nov., stating that there was too much reason to believe that citizens of the United States, in disregard of the solemn warnings heretofore given them, and combined to disturb the peace of the dominions of a neighbouring and friendly nation; and counselling as follows:—"I hereby warn all those who have engaged in these criminal enterprises, if persisted in, that whatever may be the condition to which they may be reduced, they must not expect the interference of this Government, in any form, on their behalf; but will be left, reproached by every virtuous fellow citizen, to be dealt with according to the policy and justice of that Government whose dominions they have, in defiance of the known wishes and efforts of their own Government, and without the shadow of justification or excuse, unlawfully invaded."—Pat.

THE LATE ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION.—Désiré Rousselle, the man charged with having attempted to assassinate the ex-lieutenant Duke of Nemours, was on Friday brought up at Union Hall, and discharged from custody, the "Duke" declining to prosecute. A correspondence of some length relative to the affair was laid before the magistrates, which showed that certain parties had accused the "Duke" of shooting himself for the purpose of creating a sensation in this country and in France.—Idid.

A GOOD PARLIAMENTARY MAN.—"I think," said a farmer, "I should make a good Parliament Man for my mother's language. I received two bills the other day, with requests for immediate payment; the one I ordered to be laid on the table—the other to be read that day six months!"—Idid.

TROUBLE OF TRIFLES.—Within these six weeks past, Mr. Benjamin Greig, an affluent and respectable individual, had various quarrels with a decent woman, now dead, who kept a poultry shop in Fife-place, in the neighbourhood of Mr. Greig's residence. The disagreement always arose about the deceased's poultry, which Mr. G. complained trespassed on his property, and annoyed him extremely. On the 31st of this month, as we understand, Mr. Greig, who is an aged gentleman, commenced an attack on Mrs. Kirk's hens with his stick, on which the deceased came out with a broom in her hand to protect her property, and a scuffle was the consequence. She fell, and soon after took to her bed. In the police book, of date 10th Nov., we see that "Benjamin Greig, wine-merchant, and Mrs. John Kirk, residing in Fife-place, are charged with disorderly conduct and fighting on Monday last." The day after the scuffle, the deceased got up, and continued to go about her usual employment all that day, and, if we have not been misinformed, the next day, when she was again confined to bed, and died of fever on Wednesday last.—Glasgow Herald.

SUMMONING THE QUEEN.—On Monday as the new police van drove into the yard of the Queen Square Police-office, Stowell, the informer, ordered the driver to stop. The van at this office has only been in operation three or four days, and the police constable who drove it refused to draw up. The informer then produced from under his arm a large quarto volume containing statutes of every description, and pointed out, in the acknowledgment of the constable, the act 5th and 6th of William IV., cap. 50, by which he was in the first instance empowered to lay an information against the proprietor, driver, or conductor, of any carriage, van, or other vehicle, upon which the name and address of the owner did not appear in legible characters. There were only pointed upon this vehicle the letters V. R. & J. Stowell, after producing the act, plainly told the driver that unless he immediately told him his name he should give him in, the custody of one of his brother policemen. Stowell had left information against the present King of Hanover, Lord M., Bourne, &c., in which he had obtained convictions; and he did not see why the Queen should be spared. The driver gave the name of Charles Smith, 66 A division; and the informer, after detaining the van for about a quarter of an hour, applied for his summons, which was granted by Mr. Gregorie, the sitting magistrate. The charge will be heard to-day.—Pat.

COLORED TRADE.—By the Glasgow Gazette of the 9th of October, we find that the good people of that colony are busily employed in their scheme for encouraging civilization. A meeting of the Board of Policy was held on the subject on the 21st of September, when certain effective resolutions were passed, one of them being to the following tenor:—"That the Executive Government, hereafter, be now requested and authorized to appoint emigration agents in such places as he may think advisable, and to give a premium to such agents of ten shillings sterling per head for every effective field labourer." &c.; and that "the passage-money for such emigrants be paid out of the public treasury." This is doing the thing with a vengeance. Great professions are made of what the agents are to do, in the way of seeing "that too many passengers are not embarked on board one vessel, and that a sufficient quantity of water and provisions are shipped before they leave the port;" as also in telling the labourers, free they will be to choose their own masters, and what facilities they will have for carrying with them "children, or aged parents"—nothing being said, at the same time, about their wives. Notwithstanding all this, however, we are unconquerably jealous of this fair-looking scheme. These resolutions, upon which we see as though they were meant for England and the colonies, as a sop for the Cerberus, whose insatiable and voraciousness and clamour have disturbed their former operations, and whom they wish to silence before they begin their new ones. It is to us a suspicious feature of this business, that Governor Light should be so perfectly hand and glove with the planters in it. Another suspicious feature is, that the agents are to be paid by a premium of so much per head on the labourers shipped. This is the very thing that has made the agents (milliners) in India so industrious in kidnapping the Hindus, and it must operate in the same way in the West as in the East.—Idid.

The United States Newspapers are computed at 1,200; from which 100,000,000 copies are annually issued.—Idid.

LUCK MADE BY CATERPILLARS.—A most extraordinary species of manufacture has been contrived by an order of engineers residing at Munich. It consists of lace and velvet, with open patterns in them, made entirely by caterpillars. The following is the mode of proceeding adopted:—Having made a paste of the leaves of the plant on which the species of caterpillar he employs feeds, he spreads it thinly over a stone, or other flat substance of the proper size. He then, with a camel-hair pencil dipped in oil or oil, draws the pattern he wishes the insect to leave upon. This stone is then placed in an inclined position, and a considerable number of the caterpillars are placed at the bottom. A peculiar species is chosen, which spins a strong web; and the animals commence at the bottom, eating and spinning their way up to the top, carefully avoiding every part touched by the oil, but devouring every other part of the paste. The extreme lightness of these webs, combined with some strength, is truly surprising. One of them measuring 27" by 17 inches, weighed only a grain and a half, a degree of lightness which will appear more strongly by contrast with other fabrics. One square yard of the substance of which these webs are made weighs 4½ grains, whilst one square yard of silk gauze weighs 137 grains, and one square yard of the finest net weighs 20½ grains.—Idid.

ROMAN ANTIQUITIES.—Farther discoveries have been made by the excavations of the line of the Great Western Railway, on the summit of a hill of slight elevation near the Towers at Streatham. A very beautiful tessellated pavement was found, about eight feet square. Orders were given to fence in the spot, and protect it from being disturbed; a Roman coin was also found near the spot.—Pat.

BLACKWOOD ON THE AFFAIRS OF THE EAST.—Blackwood's Magazine for December last, contains an article on the affairs of the East, evidently from a Correspondent, written with all the vigour which characterizes that publication, but ill calculated to afford an accurate view of the measures of Government, or of the present position of affairs. The interest which has been awakened in England on the subject of India, in consequence of the machinations of Russia, renders it imperative on the conductors of the Press in this country, to watch with diligence the impressions which it is attempted from time to time to fix on the public mind at home, and to correct whatever may appear erroneous in the statements which are put forward. More especially is this vigilance necessary in reference to those Journals which exercise so extensive a sway over the opinions of the nation. We need not, therefore, offer any strong apology for the following brief observations on the article to which we allude, and which will be found in another part of our paper. Its contents are evidently influenced by the Conservative views of the writer, who traces up the measures which have been pursued in the East, and those which have been adopted in England, to one common Liberal source, and involves both in the same common censure. But this is a partial, and, therefore, unjust view of Indian affairs. The Indian reforms which he deprecates, were introduced by Lord Auckland Bentinck, who was appointed to the Government of this country by a Conservative administration, three years before the formation of the Reform Ministry. These measures were enforced upon His Lordship's mind by no servile submission to the pressure of reform principles from home, but were recommended by his own clear discernment of the actual posture and exigencies of affairs in this country. No man can have taken a comprehensive and statesman-like view of this empire, who attributes these reforms to an "infatuation," which, for the last ten years, has pervaded our Indian councils, under the influence of the parsimonious and niggardly ideas of the masses at home. When the finances of a country are in a state of the deepest embarrassment, and when the expenditure so far exceeds the income, that every day augments the embarrassments, is the policy which dictates economy worthy of no better term than infatuation? Is it impossible to review overgrown establishments, and to bring them within the compass of the means by which they are fed, upon such comprehensive principles of justice and equity, as to obviate all necessity for tracing the impulse of economy to the parsimony and the niggardliness of "masses," fifteen thousand miles off?

Having denounced the general character of the Indian administration as "infatuation," the writer descends to particulars; but they partake so much of the colour and complexion of his own pre-conceived notions, as to reduce the value of their evidence to a very narrow point. Indeed, anyone who might sit down to the subject in a different feeling of mind, would find little difficulty in enlisting them on his own side.

"We possessed," says the writer, "fifteen years ago, two line of battle ships and several frigates." This was the costly pageant of the Bombay Marine. "We have sold off, or dismantled, the whole of this fleet, in order to make a show of reduced expenditure." But this 'show' must, we suppose, have been preceded by something of a real substantial reduction. If the writer means to affirm, that Government dismantled the ships and discharged the crews, without saving a farthing by it, we think he is fully justified in calling it an infatuation; but it was an infatuation most certainly not based on niggardly views. But, instead of this Bombay Marine, we have what is infinitely more valuable, a steam flotilla, by which our 'predominance' in the Persian Gulf, and in all the waters to the west and south west of Bombay, will be secured, with ten times the energy and efficacy with which two line of battle ships, with all the frigates to boot, could have maintained it. With an efficient steam flotilla, not only is the command of the sea, but of every bay and corner of the coast, emphatically ours; and our presence in those seas will enjoy a measure of ubiquity, which sailing vessels could never have given us.

"We had till lately three weak battalions on the Indus." True; while there appeared no enemy beyond the Indus to disturb our empire, no extraordinary exertions appeared necessary to maintain its security; but no sooner have the intrigues in Western Asia assumed a tangible form, than we have set ourselves vigorously to the re-establishment of military camps on the banks of that river; and to the creation of forts to support the operations of the British troops. We have obtained the entire command of that important junction with the sea; and, strange to say, all this has been effected while the military "show," which is supposed to be in favour of niggardly or parsimonious influence of the masses at home, directs the councils of India. But it seems to us that we have more abundantly made use of our internal resources. We have reduced the European troops from 55,000 to 15,000, and the Native army from 2,50,000 to 1,50,000. We much question whether the reduction of European troops has been correctly stated by the writer; but whether it has been or not, we cordially unite with him in deprecating any diminution of our European forces, because of the vital importance of this branch of the army, and of the impossibility of making up deficiencies in time to meet unexpected dangers. But the case is different with regard to the Native army. If financial embarrassments demand a temporary reduction of expense, it is in this, among other departments, that it can be made with the least comparative risk; because the country affords an inexhaustible field for recruits, of which Government may avail itself at the shortest notice. So far is it from being true, that the disposition to enlist in our service has been 'chilled,' that the order for the recent augmentation of the Native army, to the extent of thirteen thousand men, was carried into effect with incredible alacrity. We beseech those who wish to obtain a calm and impartial view of Indian affairs, to consider whether that Government can be deemed worthy of the high trust of this empire, which, with a heavy load of debt on its finances, should persist in keeping up a civil and military establishment utterly beyond the means of the country to sustain. That in the enlarged associations into which we have been led, and from which there is no escaping, a permanent increase of the Native army, and more particularly, of the European Officers in that army, is rendered necessary, must be obviated to all. But surely after the Burmese war had more than exhausted our resources, it would have been an act of nefarious folly to have neglected the opportunity afforded by the twelve years of peace which succeeded it, to prepare for future contingencies, by a reduction of our debt and expenditure. It is easy to cry out against reduction. It is easy to say, that when war suddenly appeared last year to threaten us on the east, the west, and the north, we had not at our disposal so complete and efficient an army as if no reductions had taken place. But it must be self-evident, that if military establishments are to be always kept up to their highest strength, notwithstanding every embourgeoisement, such a course can only end in a disgraceful dissolution of all government. We think, therefore, that on general principles, the economy which has been practised, has been the salvation of the State. By the aid of this economy we are now, when possibly on the eve of a grand contest, in possession of the sinews of war, unimpaired; and it only requires skill and courage to make a right use of them. Had we neglected the counsels of economy, we might have been constrained to enter on this struggle, with a large and disciplined army, it is true, but without funds to set it in motion.

The fifth paragraph refers to our domestic economy; and it will be found, on close examination, to present such a confusion of facts, and such anomalies of argument, as to deprive it of all evidence. The writer begins with an attack on the Permanent Settlement of Lord Cornwallis; a measure which can have no connection with his denunciations, for it was not adopted during the last ten years, under the influence of "the parsimonious and niggardly ideas of the masses at home;" but forty-five years ago, when the most magnificent notions of expenditure flourished in our home counsels. The writer describes the settlement as "exhaustive, and productive of discontent;" but surely the attempt to disturb that settlement would be calamitous beyond all precedent, and would create a degree of discontent, before which the holdest Indian statesman might well quail, without any impeachment of his political courage. The writer proceeds to say, "Regulations should have been introduced to protect the cultivators; [from the mischiefs, of course, of the Permanent Settlement.] and yet nothing of the kind has been attempted. So far from this, the power of judging in revenue cases has been vested in the European Collector." This power of judging is afterwards explained to refer to cases between the Government and the people, in revenue questions; but what connexion has this with the demerits of the Permanent Settlement, which left the cultivator, as it is said, at the mercy of the landholder? And how has "the power of judging between the Government and the people been left to the Collector, whom the writer supposes to be thereby placed in a dilemma, justice inclining him to the people, and his interest to the Government? What cases does the writer refer to? The business of the Collector is to collect the revenue, which has been permanently, and for ever assessed on the lands within his beat, and in case of failure to put up estates to auction.

The writer now comes to the Resumption question. He is right in stating that it is a subject of discontent. All payments are deeply painful to the Natives of this country; and if Government wishes to free itself from all the murmurs of discontent, and to restore the golden age, the path is plain; it is only to abolish taxation altogether. Government, says the writer, have, it seems, called upon all the holders of land, who had been confirmed in their possessions, when the British Government was first established, to produce their titles; and though these titles have been lost, or burnt, or devoured by white ants and insects, the lands are forfeited, if the titles are not produced. The error in this sentence consists in the omission of the shik; but the emphatical word "not." Insert it, and the sentence will read thus: Government have called upon all the holders of land who were not confirmed in their possessions, on the original establishment of our rule, to produce their titles. But the writer in order to put his readers in possession of the whole truth, should not have omitted to state, that of the lands which the Natives claim to hold for ever, three fourths are confirmed to the State, nine-tenths were fraudulently obtained after our accession to the Government. It is equally mistaken, in fact, when he states that Government is taking advantage of its own wrong; and that having refused to register the deeds according to the regulations, which were produced, or to return them, is now indiscriminately confiscating all property which has not been legally registered, or of which the deeds are not forthcoming. He proceeds to affirm, that the peril of such a proceeding, affecting so numerous a class as the Indian cultivators, is obvious. But what have the poor cultivators, for whose protection he laments that no laws had been made, to do with the rent-free lands? They pay rent for all the lands they cultivate, whether Government obtains its share of that rent or not. The class which is affected by the operation of these resumptions, is that of the Zemindars, who make the cultivators pay directly for their lands, but themselves receive no share of the rent to the State. Finally, the writer draws a comparison between France and India; and most gravely affirms, that the demand made by Government in India of its share of the produce of the lands which have been fraudulently alienated, is the same thing as those "Louis Philippe were to commence a general reduction of all the titles of the whole revolutionary proprietors in France." As the writer has travelled to France for analogies, it is a pity he should not have been more fortunate in the selection of them. He should have said, "The principle of such a proceeding, affecting so numerous a class as the Indian cultivators, is obvious; it is no though Louis the XVIIIth had commenced a general abolition of these exemptions from all taxation, which the aristocratie had long claimed and enjoyed."

THE FREELYN ON THE EDUCATION OF THE PEOPLE OF INDIA.—There may, perhaps, be as much doing in Native education, as when Mr. Trevelyan was amongst us; but there are not the same outward signs of it. There is a quietness which may be attributable to busy industry, but possibly may be taken as an approach to slumber; and we confess a little of the former stir would please us better. It was our fortune to have much agreement with the principles and schemes which Mr. Trevelyan was wont to advocate; but whether his schemes were right or wrong, he extended and maintained a busy activity in the communication of knowledge to the people of India. In that, every one could rejoice; and we regret there is none we can look upon as supplying his place. If, however, his influence is withdrawn from the East, there is consolation in finding it in exercise in the West. There it may work as much for our advantage. A brief spell of it may be of great use amongst those who have the supreme direction of Indian affairs; and thus we hope to see him again in his more natural position, in the Committee of Public Instruction.

Mr. Trevelyan had no sooner reached the shores of England, than he brought out the volume of which we have placed the title at the head of this article. In closing it, he thus explains his object: "The commercial, the political, the judicial, the revenue departments, have in turn been the subject of special consideration; and decisive of have been taken to put them on a satisfactory footing. My object will be sufficiently attained, if I succeed in producing a conviction that the time has arrived for taking up the question of public instruction in the same spirit, and with the same determination to employ whatever means may be requisite, for accomplishing the object in view." The aim is both just and reasonable: and to us it appears to have been successful in a good degree. Nevertheless we are far from thinking that the book deserves unqualified praise. The object, as stated at the end of it, does not appear to have been definitely before the author at the outset of his argument. It is, therefore, rather incidentally, and consequently but feebly, wrought out. In the argument, too, there are mingled up many contradictory statements both of fact and theory: and the plan with which Mr. Trevelyan desires to occupy the public attention for the future, appears to us to be exceedingly defective.

Mr. Trevelyan has divided his book into seven chapters; which, however, rather break it into so many parts, than dispose of its matter in systematic order. Perhaps it might all be reduced to three subjects of discussion: the past history of Native education; the present demand for its extension; and the plan to be adopted for its promotion.

To the first of these subjects, the past history of Native education, nearly three-fourths of the whole work are devoted. Yet nothing can be well conceived more defective, or more delusive than the narrative of these hundred and forty-two pages. According to Mr. Trevelyan's showing, there was literally nothing done in India in Native education, before the Resolution of Government of the 7th March, 1835, except that the Mohammedan College at Calcutta was founded in 1781, and the Sanscrit College at Benares in 1792; in 1818, on the renewal of the Charter, a lakh of Rupees were ordered to be spent annually in reviving literature and introducing science; in July, 1823, the Committee of Public Instruction was first instituted for carrying that order into effect; by this Committee, the Sanscrit College at Calcutta was fully organized, the Hindoo College was greatly improved, new Colleges were founded at Delhi and Agra for the cultivation of Oriental literature, the printing of Sanscrit and Arabic books was undertaken and patronized on a grand scale, Dr. Tyer was employed at a great expense in translating European scientific works into Arabic, English classes were appended to the Mohammedan and the Sanscrit College at Calcutta, the Sanscrit College at Benares, and the Agra College, and a separate institution was founded at Delhi in 1829, for the cultivation of Western learning, in compliance with the earnest solicitation of the authorities at that place. Up to March, 1835, Native education was regarded with almost universal indifference: but then it became an object of universal interest.

It is truly marvellous that any combination of circumstances, any intensity of interest in the measures in which he took himself a part, could lead Mr. Trevelyan to make so unjustified a representation of the case. In 1835 he began to take a lead in the proceedings of the Education Committee, and thenceforward he seems to have become incapable of remembering that any thing had been done before, either by the Committee, or by others. Till he awoke all were asleep: till he began to work nothing was done. Dr. Wilson, in the Asiatic Journal for August last, protests indignantly against such a representation in reference to himself and other older members of the Committee. "On the 1st of August," he says, "it was they who, by their zealous advocacy of English, first gave the Natives of Bengal a deep impression, in favour not of the language, but of literature and science; it was they who, by their exertions, first introduced to a degree of success, the taught, the English education of the Natives, and who created that popularity for the study, of which their opponents have resented the advantage, and would unjustly appropriate the credit." There is much truth in this statement, although Dr. Wilson greatly errs in the estimate of what has been done in India since he left it.

But neither Government nor their Committee did any thing worthy of being spoken of, till others by example and by remonstrance had made them ashamed of their apathy. We will not speak of Native education as we saw it first begun, and for years continued. But after it had declined, through neglect, enough still remained, at the time when Mr. Trevelyan came on the field, to deserve mention. In 1835, he says there were about 3,398 pupils in all the Government Colleges and Schools in Bengal and Hindoostan: of whom 1,818 were learning English. Now in the same year, Mr. Adam drew up his first Report on the State of Education in Bengal, an abstract of which may be seen in the Friend of India for January, 1836, and from it we gather that in Bengal alone there were about 10,300 Native youths receiving education in European schools altogether independent of Government. Of these 1,736 were learning English, and the remaining 8,544, of whom about 1,690 were females, were acquiring the same knowledge in their own tongue, in vernacular schools under European superintendence. All this goes for nothing with Mr. Trevelyan. It will not, however, so fare with those who think calmly and impartially of the education of the people of India.

In fact Mr. Trevelyan's history of Native education consists of a very brief notice of the celebrated Order of the 7th March, 1835, and the measures taken by the Committee of Public Instruction in consequence of it: and a long recapitulation of the chief points of the controversy which arose, and in which he took so large a part at the time, on the question, whether English, or Arabic and Sanscrit literature is best calculated for the improvement of the people of India; and whether, supposing English literature to be best adapted for that purpose, the Natives are willing to cultivate it.

The purport of the Government Order was, that it being the proper object of Government to promote European literature and science amongst the Natives of India, the stipends of students in schools of Native learning were to be withdrawn, as the individuals enjoying them passed away, and those of the Pundits and Munsees, on vacancies occurring, if the number and state of each vacant class were not such as to shew the expediency of continuing it; no part of the education funds were hereafter to be spent in the printing of Oriental works, but the entire funds at the disposal of the Committee were to be employed in imparting to the Native population a knowledge of English literature and science, through the medium of the English language. On this the Committee set to work with all diligence; and the result is thus stated by Mr. Trevelyan: "When these operations commenced, there were fourteen seminaries under the controul of the Committee: there are now forty. At the first mentioned period there were about 3,398 pupils; of whom 1,818 were learning English, 218 Arabic, and 573 Sanscrit. There are now upwards of 6000. The number of Sanscrit and Arabic students is smaller than before. A small number study Persian, or learn the vernacular language only; all the rest receive an English education. The seminary which was last established completely exhausted the funds at the disposal of the Committee. It was for the district of Dinagpur, which is computed to contain 6000 square miles, above 12,300 towns and villages, and a population exceeding 2,300,000." In the general animation now prevailing in the system of education, the system of medical

Thomson and Sanders, is one of the most remarkable structures which have ever been seen in India. Sir Henry Fane declared that he had seen nothing like it throughout the peninsula war. The season is irretrievably lost, and unless some vigorous measures are adopted by Government to remedy the present deficiency, it is to be feared that the plan of a Sanatorium must be abandoned.—The 5th Regiment which had been ordered across the Coosyah Hills to Assam, is ordered to remain at Sylhet, as every thing again is quiet.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 20.

Letters from the camp in the 21st February have been received; the European Regiment and other corps had arrived at Sikkim; the Engineers and some of the Cavalry had moved on towards the Bhotan Pass, where it is said is defended, and there is one stretch of twenty-nine miles to be got through. ## CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

ARRIVAL OF MISSIONARIES.

The strength of the Bombay Mission has been increased by the arrival, during the past month, of three additional agents, Mr. and Mrs. Robertson, of the Church Missionary Society, and Miss Reid, of the Church of Scotland's Mission. Mr. Robertson is to be engaged, we believe, in the Money School; and Miss Reid is to act as a superintendent of Gojairid Female Schools. Few circumstances can be more satisfactory to every philanthropist than the brightening prospects connected with a Christian education in this Presidency.—Oriental Christ. Spectator, Feb.

VISITATION OF THE SCHOOLS OF THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND'S MISSION.

From the report of the Auxiliary Society, which has just been published, we extract a few notices. The Schools in Bombay contain 739 pupils, of whom more than one half are readers, and the rest board-writers. They are supported at a comparatively small expense: and are instrumental in diffusing much scriptural and useful knowledge among the people. Some of their most respectable scholars have entered the English Institution during the past year; and great are the advantages which they enjoy over many of their associates, in having learned their own languages in connexion with the holy doctrines and precepts of Christ, instead of the impure legends and degrading and degrading institutes of superstition and idolatry. It is worthy of particular notice that all the boys to whom Marathi is vernacular, who gained prizes for their knowledge of the Scriptures at the late examinations, or those who had been educated in the schools, in which we now refer, or converts connected with the Mission. We cannot too soon get a hold of the youthful mind in our endeavours to impress upon it divine truth.

The number of boys receiving instruction in the schools of Puna is nearly 400. Mr. Mitchell says, "that they have been in a more efficient state for the communication of religious knowledge than ever they were before. Besides attending them by self as formerly, they have had the benefit of the superintendence of a pious European visitor, Mr. B. Drake, who is well acquainted with the language, and who visits and examines at least, one of them daily. He hears them read their Scriptures and other lessons, and catechizes them concerning what they read. I hope through his means to introduce into them, through the medium of their own tongue, other branches of knowledge; such as grammar, geography &c., not heretofore particularly attended to, owing to the incapacity of the teachers."

Amidst much that is more brilliant and attractive in other educational institutions, these humble seminaries are apt to be much overlooked by the friends of the Propagation of the Gospel. It ought ever to be remembered that they are most important auxiliaries in the cause, as far as the great body of the people is concerned; and to them sufficient support should ever be extended.—Ibid.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE CANNPORE RELIEF SOCIETY, FOR THE YEAR 1838.

The Committee of the Cannpore Relief Society in submitting a Report of their proceedings for the past year, a year passed in the midst of misery and wretchedness to an extent seldom witnessed, have but little to add to what has already been said before. The subscribers and the public in their monthly reports published during the year; but as these may have been overlooked or misapprehended, the Committee deem it desirable to record here a brief statement of their proceedings during the year; exhibiting a detail of relief and the effects derived therefrom in checking the devastating progress of famine and starvation.

Until March the relief was confined to the station, the funds of the Society being barely sufficient to meet the wants of the numerous starving poor who had flocked thither. At this period, however, the community of Calcutta and other places, feeling that so awful a visitation required efforts and assistance beyond the power of any individual station, most liberally continued their support; and the result of a public meeting, held at Calcutta, to take measures to alleviate the distress, placed in the hands of your Committee, sufficient means to enable them to extend their relief as far as Futtighur, Mynpoore, Chulpo, and Munseepore. Measures were, in consequence, immediately adopted, through the instrumentality of residents near the stations, to relieve those around them, employing such as were able to work.

For this purpose the sum of Co's Rs. 26,201-8 was expended. The labourers were employed in works of public utility, such as the excavation of tanks, repairing roads, erecting boundary walls, &c., and although the work performed may not be so efficient as European superintendence would have made it, still the employment of the able-bodied poor, instead of gratuitously relieving them, was deemed most advisable. In the encampments of Cannpore, the poor were chiefly employed in excavating a large tank in the neighbourhood of the Dragon and Artillery lines, and those unable, from disease and starvation, to work, and who formed a very large injury, were removed into the Society's asylum, where they were supplied with victuals.

Every information connected with the nature and mode of relief, has already been stated in the bi-monthly reports; it is, therefore, unnecessary to enter again upon the subject.

Your committee will, therefore, lay before you a statement, exhibiting the number relieved monthly, (both gratuitously and by the exaction of labour,) and the number of deaths.

In the month of May, Doctor McRae, Staff Surgeon, having not instantaneously volunteered his services to superintend and edit the Register, who were now greatly increasing and inadequately assisted by, your committee took immediate steps to establish an hospital, where all was done that skill, judgement, and unremitting attention could do; but the extent of disease from the effects of famine and exposure, nearly baffled all endeavours.

Annexed is a statement of the admissions, discharges, and deaths, for each month during the year, since the existence of the epidemic.

The number of deaths here mentioned is included in the preceding statement A.

Appended is an abstract statement of receipts and disbursements during the year, classifying them as far as possible. The statement showing the number of persons relieved during the year is testimony sufficient of the vast benefits derived from the Society during the past year of fearful suffering, and it may be safely said of much satisfaction to all those who have contributed to the support of the distressed, to know that their generosity has fed thousands of fellow creatures from starvation and death.

Great and lamentable as the number of deaths have been, they do not appear low in comparison with what they assuredly would have been, had not a generous public stepped between the thousands of perishing sufferers and destruction.

The number relieved during the year is 5,207,541 making a monthly average of above 43,396! and though much might have been done by individual exertion and individual charity, to relieve this numerous body, yet all endeavours, however strenuous and varied, must utterly have failed to save from starvation the tens of thousands who looked in thousands on our gates. Nothing but an organized institution, similar to this Society, could have met the evil with any hope at all of effectually checking it.

The private charity might for a time have relieved numbers, yet would they have been wanderers through our streets unprotected, and the thousands of starving emaciated wretches who were monthly received into the Society's asylum, fed, clothed and carefully attended, would, without the place of refuge, have wandered our streets, our scene of squalid misery and loathsome disease too horrible to look upon.

The Committee would, therefore, in closing their labours, our only real appeal around to give their support to an institution, useful at all times, to relieve the really distressed, to expunge the maddening and to suppress the vagrancy, and during a season like the last, of inestimable value.

The accounts for the year show a balance on the 1st of January of rupees 19,888-12-10, but as the present rate of expenditure, which, for the Hospital alone, amounts to, on an average, 400 rupees a month, is most soon to be disbursed; and as the violent effects of the late famine are yet far from having ceased, the Committee do not expect any great decrease in the number of sick for many months. The subscriptions amount to—contributions less than 20 rupees a month; unless, therefore, further support be given to the Society, the Committee fear that their successors will be obliged either to abolish the hospital, or to be left without the means of supporting the numerous distressed pensioners, and hence poor disposing solely upon the Society for subsistence.

It is with feelings akin to pride that your Committee direct attention to the names of donors and subscribers in the abstract statement of receipts during the year. Harvesting as have been the seasons of war and wretchedness, which have necessarily caused some distress, they would not at all gladly and arrogantly assume your alms; under circumstances which demand so highly to the credit of the community, and they have the gratification to feel, on looking back upon the past year, that for such the kind liberality of a generous public. In its labours have not been in vain. The work have produced by the association still remains to be done, with feelings of deep gratification, the benevolence which has rescued them from fearful suffering and an untimely grave, and which cheered the survivors of the dead upon life and relief. As your Committee feel assured that the noble conduct of the European community, in so readily coming forward to succour the victims of misery and war, must greatly have raised the European character in the estimation of the native population in general.

In closing this report your Committee desire to recognize with grateful pride the hand of grace to Providence in the abundant means which have been placed at their disposal to meet the appalling famine.

AFFAIRS IN THE EAST.

(From Blackburn's Magazine for Dec. 1858.)

Every body knows that our empire in the East is entirely one of opinion; that the vast regions of Hindoostan have been won by the sword; and must be retained only by the sword; and that they depend upon the chance of perpetual success, not merely for their prosperity, but for its existence. Forty or fifty thousand Europeans, including five-and-twenty thousand soldiers, are there to be found scattered among ninety millions of Asiatics, directly subjected to their empire, and a still greater number in the tributary and allied states. How so small a body of Europeans should ever have succeeded in acquiring and maintaining an empire at the distance of eight thousand miles from the British islands, over so immense a body, most of them fully inferior to the European race in hardihood and valor, trained to discipline, and supplied with military implements of war fully as powerful, will be a subject of never-ceasing astonishment, and is not rightly appreciated by this generation, only because, like any other prodigy, with which we have long been familiar, it has ceased to be an object of present surprise. But one thing is perfectly plain, and must be quite obvious even to the most superficial observer,—that such an empire can be maintained only by the most consummate wisdom and firmness on the part of the local government—by the maintenance of a powerful European force, and by the most sedulous attention, both to the material interests and the rights of property in the immense mass of our Oriental subjects. Even if no external danger threatened; if no northern power was at hand to take advantage of any weakness in our Indian administration, and no northern diplomacy to combine the Courts of Central Asia into a powerful league against us, still, common sense has long demonstrated to every man capable of thinking and acquainted with the subject, that our Indian empire stood on the most precarious foundation; and that by disaffection among the native troops, almost before the alarming tidings could reach the British shores, the splendid fabric might be levelled with the dust.

What, then, has been the policy of the British Government? Have they employed the precious years of peace in our Eastern dominions in increasing our European force—augmenting our native military establishment—consolidating the affections of the native soldiers—strengthening our frontier towards the north and west, and securing ourselves by alliances among the powers of Central Asia? Have we established a powerful fleet, armed steam-boats on the Indus, and ruled that great river, seven-tenths of its length, the true frontier of Hindoostan against European or Asiatic power, an impeneable barrier to hostile arms? Have we established military camps on its shores, and created forts to support the operations of the frontier troops, and established a national force capable of supporting those in front in case of disaster? Have we consolidated the affections of the inhabitants in our rear, and secured the attachment of the native troops by liberal allowances and retired establishments held safely? Have we promoted industry through Hindoostan, by opening to it the unobstructed market of the British Empire, and won the hearts of all classes by the impartial administration of the revenue, and the steady security given to existing land rights? And have we done the very reverse of all these things; and in order to enable our readers to form some estimate of the infatuation which, for the last ten years, has pervaded our Indian Councils, under the influence of the parsimonious, niggardly ideas of the masses at home, we shall subjoin a slight sketch of the steps which have been taken to injure our magnificent Eastern dominions during the disastrous era of Reform, and which will probably excite some attention from the evident approach of the time when the effects of our policy and the strength of our empire there are to be put to the test.

We possessed, fifteen years ago, two line of battle ships, and several strong frigates in the Indian ocean, having their principal station at Bombay—a force amply sufficient to have secured our pre-eminence in the Persian Gulf, and rendered certain the co-operation of Muscat, and all the powers on the shores of Persia and Arabia. We have sold off, or dismantled, the whole of this fleet, in order to make a show of reduced expenditure. The India Company have not a ship of war of their own in the Indian Ocean, and whatever ships we may send there will form a deduction from the naval strength of Great Britain. We had till very lately just three weak battalions on the Indus, and the nearest troops to support them in the rear were a hundred and fifty miles distant. While neglecting thus our foreign defences, we have still more ruinously weakened our internal resources. We have reduced the European police force, which, in 1827, was 35,000, to twenty-five regiments, making a reduction of an 19,000 men, and the native army, which in the former year was 210,000, to 135,000. All this we have done in the full knowledge of the truth emphatically impressed upon our Government by war-grievous considerations in India, even at the moment of their most signal triumphs, that, without an 18,000 man proportion of European troops, which is about 1 man to 1000, there is no soldier for a fourth of that of the soldiers, it was impossible to expect success in India, and that our empire in the East, as the apex of the first European power, would be actually endangered.

Nor is this all. In addition to this diminution of the numbers of our military establishments, we have taken steps still more decisively calculated to alienate the affections of those whom we retained under our standards. Forgetting that there can be no ingenuous loyalty in a black Musulman, or Hindoo, to a white Caribbean, and distant Crown, we have done much to destroy the firm bond of union that has hitherto held us together—a bond of permanent self-interest. Influenced by a blind and selfish spirit of economy, the Indian Government have successively reduced the allowances, retired pensions, and other advantages accruing to the soldiers, European and Native, as well as private of the native army, so that not only has the attachment of the actually in the ranks been seriously weakened, but the disposition to enlist under the British colours, throughout the whole peninsula, been chilled and discouraged to a most alarming degree.

Serious as are the dangers that threaten our Indian possessions from these measures of reduction and economy, there are other internal changes which are, perhaps, still more calamitous, because productive of discontent more deep-seated and chronic, and incurable. The error committed by Lord Cornwallis of introducing European ideas of feudal property into the East, and holding, contrary to all Asiatic principle, that the zemindar or collector is the real proprietor, instead of the ryot or cultivator, had been attended in many of the provinces where it has been established with the most disastrous consequences, and lost, in some districts, to the great impoverishment of the inhabitants. The land-rent, constituting two-thirds of the whole revenue of India, has fallen off two millions of late years, from the impossibility of extracting their rents from the cultivators, ruled by oppressive management. The perpetual settlement, established in 1792, could, perhaps, be altogether abandoned, but regulations should have been introduced to protect the cultivator, and yet nothing of the kind official has been attempted. Still from this, the power of judging in revenue cases, which continues by far the most important in the Indian Courts, has been vested in the European Collectors of the revenue. This is not only a dangerous proceeding, but it throws discredit upon the whole system of our Indian administration. There is not, indeed, a more upright and conscientious set of men than the Company's Servants in India; but human nature is weak, and it may easily be conceived what a host of contagious must swell a Court when, at the very moment when his regular income has been materially reduced by economical parings of late years, he finds himself entrusted with the decision of all questions between the Government and the people connected with the land revenue within his jurisdiction, and knows by experience that the regular remittance of a large sum quarterly from head quarters is the best possible means of securing the favours of the dispensers of patronage on which his future fortune depends. Then, a most alarming step has been taken of late years which has spread an indescribable panic throughout all Hindoostan, in calling upon all the holders of land, who had been confirmed in their possessions by the East India Company in former times, when the Civil Government of Bengal was first assumed by their functionaries to produce their titles. Great part of these titles cannot now be produced, having been given in to be registered in terms of the regulations of the Company, and neither correctly registered nor returned to the owners by the registering officers. The subsequent acquiesces have often no regular title to produce at all. Nevertheless they have all been recently called upon to produce their land rights, under the penalty of the property reverting to the Government, if they can show none such. The peril of such a proceeding, affecting, as unnumbered a class as the Indian cultivators, is obvious; it is the same thing as if Louis Philippe were to commence a general reduction of all the titles of the whole revolutionary proprietors in France. Nevertheless this dangerous step has been adopted by the East India Government, and a great extent of their possessions, at the very time when they were destroying the naval establishments, reducing their military strength, and shaking the fidelity of the remaining half by the impolitic reduction of their military allowances.

No man of sense ever imagined that the Russians would set out from the extreme point of their own frontier to march across Persia, Cabul, and all the intervening countries to the Indus.

fighting all the way, and without either alliances, fortresses, magazines, or stores to facilitate their advance. The way in which it was all along foreseen Russia would act, would be to go on step by step, consolidating her power by successive acquisitions, and taking care always to precede her legions by subsidiary treaties and alliances which might enable her to march through all the intervening country as through her own dominions, and pour at last, with an accumulated force, upon the northern provinces of Hindoostan. It is in vain to say that it is impossible for the Russian troops to march down from Russia to India, when the British troops are preparing to march from Delhi and Agra to Cabul and Candahar, a distance of 2000 miles. If any person will look at the map he will find that, if our troops arrive in these regions, they will have gone more than half way from Calcutta to the shores of the Caspian, from which the Russian troops have to set out. They are setting out expressly to anticipate the Russians in the possession of Cabul, and in all probability to assist the Shah of Herat in his resistance to the Russian guile and Persian forces.

After all, however, it may confidently be predicted that it is not in Central Asia that the British and Russian powers will first come in contact. The decisive point lies nearer home; Constantinople is the glittering prize which is destined to bring these two mighty empires into collision. In fact, such is the importance of Constantinople, both in a political and commercial point of view, that it may safely be said to be the gate to India, as well as the key to all the political influence of Central Asia. Marshal Marmont has declared, in his late interesting and valuable travels, that such is the strength of Constantinople, arising from the impregnable fortifications of the Bosphorus and Thracianus, by which alone it can be approached by sea, and the extraordinary difficulty of bringing any considerable army either over the Balkan, or through Asia Minor by land, that whichever party first gets possession of it, will, in all probability, be able to maintain it against the utmost efforts of the other. No one can doubt that if the Turks were to admit an English fleet through the Dardanelles, and Admiral Sturford were to anchor with an adequate force off the Seraglio Point, all the efforts of Russia would be unable to achieve the conquest of Constantinople. Every thing, therefore, in this great struggle depends upon priority of occupation, and we devoutly hope that the franchise, both of the Ottoman and the English Government, may lead, ere long, to results which will arrest the haughty supremacy which Russia has so long exercised in the east of Europe.

Shikarpore, February 17, 1859.—We have at length reached Shikarpore, after a tiresome, uninteresting, retrograde march. There is at all times something very miserable in retracing one's steps over the same ground we had so lately trodden. In this instance we not only suffer from want of the excitement we have hitherto experienced in the constant change of scene, but from unusual depression of spirits, at the termination of our Hyderabad campaign. We started buoyed up with hopes of honour, glory, and prize money; these visions, alas! are all knocked on the head, by the pusillanimity of the Amiers of Hyderabad, and the successful diplomacy of Colonel Pottinger. As the bridge of boats was completely finished, the Park and Heavy Ordnance crossed on the 12th and 13th; the 2nd Brigade on the 14th; 1st Brigade on the 15th; 4th Brigade on the 16th; and the Cavalry and Horse Artillery are now crossing.

It was truly a beautiful sight to see the different Corps, with their bands playing, followed by long strings of camels, and camp followers, wending their way over the bridge, the glittering of their arms in the sun, the Fort of Bikkur, with its picturesque battlements frowning over the bridge, the ancient town of Roosa and Sukkur overhanging the mighty stream, formed altogether a delightful picture. The bridge has answered its purpose admirably, and is much to the credit of Captain Thomson, under whose able superintendence it was constructed. In passing over the troops, scarcely one accident has occurred; a few festive Camels fell with their loads into the boats, but were got out again without injury.—Engl.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

Sirs,—As we shall before many weeks be passed have the S. W. Monsoon upon us, and very likely an interruption in the Steam communication, arising from this cause, to say nothing of the loss of the Stratagem, I think it would be well to ascertain if a communication may not be kept up from Bombay with Suva during the S. W. Monsoon; and it appears to me that it can be; and first of all let us be satisfied—whether a well or ill wishes of the comprehensive—that until affairs on the N. W. Frontier look much more peaceable than at present, the point of departure for the Mails must be Bombay.

It must be known to most, if not all, of your mercantile subscribers, that last year at the very time when the Scutaria was coming back defeated, that a ship (the Juba Woodell) left Bombay on the 22d July, and arrived at the Sand Heads on the 11th August, or making a passage in 21 days, sailors account—now she must have made one fair course from Bombay, until she was clear of Cape Comorin; I say not, for a 2d day's passage from Bombay will not admit of much beating about.

And, suppose the Bombay Government send and make a depot for coals at either Allepore, which is at 9° 20' N. or at Cutchin, which is at 10° N. and during the S. W. Monsoon dispatch a Steamer for the Red Sea, with orders, instead of going in the teeth of the gale, to make a fair course down the Malabar Coast for whichever of the above ports the depot may be formed at and there, completing her stock of fuel, to make a fair course to the Red Sea always, whenever the weather will permit of it, working to windward. We may thus have, if not a fair weekly, a six weekly communication, which in the present state of Indian affairs, the Home Directors of our Government will most gladly see established.

I remain, Sir,

Your very obedient servant,

LETT AMB BHAHAWAT.

THE LOVE OF THE TRUTH.—There is the love of the good for the good's sake, and the love of the truth for the truth's sake. I have known many, especially women, love the good for the good's sake; but very few, indeed, and scarcely one woman, love the truth for the truth's sake. Yet without the latter, the former may become, as it has a thousand times been, the source of persecution of the truth,—the pretext and motive of inhuman cruelty and party rivalry. To see clearly that the love of the good and the true is ultimately identical—is given only to those who have both sincerely and without any foreign ends. Consistent truth and goodness will necessarily in the end overcome every thing; but inconsistent good can never be a match for consistent evil. Alas! I look in vain for some wise and vigorous man to sound the moral duty in the ears of this generation.

—Coleridge's Table Talk.

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW ON RELIGIOUS CONVERSIONS.—“The day-dreams,” “on the subject of religious conversions, which they who list may have on every side, are like other dreams, the types of substantial realities. Though the workings of the Almighty hand are distinctly visible only in the omniscient eye, yet even our narrow faculties can often trace the movements of that perennial under-current which controls the sequences of human life, and imparts to them the character of moral discipline. In the comprehensive scheme of the supreme Governor of the world, for the progressive advancement of the human race, are comprised innumerable subordinate plans for the improvement of the individuals of which it is composed; and whether we conceive of these as the result of some unordained system, or as produced by the immediate interposition of God, we equally acknowledge the doctrine of His providence, and refer to Him as the author of these salutary revolutions of human character, of which the reality is beyond dispute. It is a simple matter of fact, of which these volumes afford the most conclusive proofs, that about the twenty-sixth year of his life, Mr. Wilberforce was the subject of such a change, and that it continued for half a century to give an altered direction to his whole system of thought and action.—Missionary Chronicle.

AN ORDINAL OF THE FOUNT.—The Rev. R. S. Hawker, Vicar of Morleston, regarding the extreme opposite to that with which his persons has been so long and closely identified, has issued an address to the young people of his parish calling them to Confirmation. He begins, "A children of the Font! born by your baptism unto God!" and in the course of the address covers the following ground:—"The bishop will confirm into you the promise of the Holy Ghost. Seek the everliving life of this life. This Confirmation is appointed for the week-end of the 1st, which followed and blessed the first day of the week instead of the seventh. The apostles, the ancestors of the church, did deliver to the bishops whom they ordained, &c., many ceremonies of obligation, whereof this is one. The apostles delivered this invisible grace, as the present bishops do, by a ceremonial secure and good. It is called 'The sign of the Holy Ghost.' In Confirmation there is a confirmation to the grace of grace. In this ceremony we receive weapons for the battle against the world, the devil, and the flesh. Though in baptism we are inward and bathed with the Holy Ghost, yet in Confirmation we are armed with 'fresh oil,' we receive and trim our lamps. As by baptism we are made temples of the Holy Ghost, so by Confirmation that Spirit each needs to become our settled guest. You are of age to inherit Christ. Take possession of your spiritual estate. Become the heirs of God, heirs of the kingdom of age."—Christian Advocate.

RELIGIOUS EQUALITY.—The Disenting body in London have issued a plan of a General Union for the Promotion of Religious Equality, which proposes that, in order to secure a cordial understanding and effective co-operation between all parties in this country, concerned for the general objects of this Union, a Central Committee be formed of persons annually chosen by Local Committees or Associations, according to certain regulations; to hold their meetings in the Metropolis, having power to elect a Chairman, Treasurer, and all other necessary officers. The plan gives a summary of the objects of the Association, which are, briefly,—"co-operation among all friends of religious liberty—stringent watchfulness of proposed legislative measures affecting rights of conscience—the registry of all legal cases of religion—the affording of legal advice to parties exposed to prosecution for conscientious sake—furtherance of the public cause in the courts of justices of religious communities—a strict and in returning members to Parliament attached to religious liberty—and the promotion of religious liberty everywhere."—Dutch and Cheltenham Gazette.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY FOR THE POOR.—The Committee of the House of Commons appointed to inquire into the working of the New Poor Law, have made their final report, wherein they state that "in accordance with a minute issued by the Poor Law Commissioners on the 12th of March, 1858, and subject to the regulations therein contained, it does seem desirable that on the Sabbath-day labourers of the workhouses should attend divine service in the church of the parish in which such workhouse is situated; and that those paupers who cannot conveniently join in the service of the established church, should be permitted to attend their respective places of worship."—Baptist Magazine.

DR. WARREN.—We believe it may now be considered certain that this gentleman will take orders in the Church. Notwithstanding the efforts of some persons in the Old Methodist Connection to dissuade the Bishop of Chester from ordaining him, that prelate only waits till Dr. Warren shall have received a pre-ordination. We hear that a church is about to be built specially for him; that Sir Oswald Mosely has given the ground, and that several very liberal contributions to the expense of building have been made. The site is in the town of Manchester. We believe that Dr. Warren's attachment to the Established Church, is no wonder in an article from his pen in "Blackburn's Magazine," written several years since.—Christ, &c.

A QUAKER PRIEST.—At the ordination recently held by the Bishop of Hereford, a young gentleman named Nevins, lately a member of the Society of Friends, was admitted to holy orders.—Ibid.

GRADUATE OF SPRING HILL COLLEGE, BIRMINGHAM.—This interesting ceremony took place on the 2nd and 3rd inst. The following ministers were present:—The Rev. Drs. J. Fry Smith, Baileys, Rolland, (teen, and Matheson; and Messrs. East, J. A. James, T. Morgan, F. Watts, J. Barber, M. A., J. Gilbert, C. Galloway, M. A., J. Noyes, J. Hill, M. A., T. Tinsford, J. Varty, &c., being 43 in number.—On Tuesday evening a large congregation assembled in Ebenezer Chapel, when Dr. Fry Smith delivered an appropriate discourse, followed by a T. Tinsford, in which he presented in illustration the true nature of apostolical succession, and the supreme importance of personal piety, combined with varied learning, in order to the effectual discharge of the ministerial office.—On Wednesday morning, in the same place, the Rev. F. Watts delivered an address on the character and requisites of an efficient ministerial education, and gave the outlines of the proposed theological course. The Rev. T. East, the treasurer, afterwards entered into some very interesting details with regard to the principles of the endowment, and the nature and extent of the present and future resources of the institution. Provision is made for preserving the institution from being perverted by requiring from every member of the committee a declaration of his belief in the essential doctrines of the Gospel, and from every trustee, tutor, and student the like declaration that he is a Pious Baptist Disenter; and in case of suspicion arising that any individual has ceased to hold the sentiments included in such declaration, by rendering his removal necessary in his continued connection with the institution. Though the tutors, trustees, and students on the foundation must be Pious Baptists and Pious Baptist Disenters, Evangelical Churchmen and Baptists are eligible as members of the committee; and it was explicitly stated that the admission of pious students of other denominations to all such advantages of the institution was a measure which, though not provided for in the terms of the trust-deed, was in perfect unison with the feelings and wishes of the founders. The present available income of the institution arising from trust property is about £500, per annum, besides which, a special donation of £500, per annum, has been made by Mrs. Oliver and Miss Mansel, &c., in aid of the trustees' salaries. A further sum of £500, has been secured by the disposal of the committee by John Lee, Esq., of Kidderminster, which has been appropriated to the purchase of a scholarship. The college premises are the freehold property of the institution; and a well-selected library of upwards of 800 volumes, principally theological, but comprising many valuable works in the departments of classical literature, metaphysics, philosophy, purchased by monies specially devoted to that object by the late Mr. Mansel and his sisters, is about to be made over to the trustees for the benefit of the college. The ultimate income of the institution, according to the bequest of the original founders is expected to amount to upwards of £17,000. The present funds being barely sufficient for the support and education of the students already admitted, who number twelve, several other applications have been made to be declined. Alterations in the college premises were provided for by a reserve of the last year's annual income, as the trustees decided forbade the sinking of any portion of the principal endowment in building expenses; but further improvements and alterations are necessary for the comfort of the students. A salary has to be provided for a third tutor. The library requires considerable augmentation; and preparations are on foot made for the erection, at no very distant period, of a new wing on a more eligible site. The amazing increase of population in Birmingham and its environs, especially in South and Northfordshire, was pressed on the attention of the trustees, as rendering it very important that, by an effective co-operation, on the part of the Christian public in the midland counties, the committee might be relieved from the painful necessity of declining suitable application for admission, from the inundation of their funds.—Ibid.

MISSIONARY INTELLIGENCE.—The Rev. John Leechman, A. M., late missionary at Serampore, is compelled, on account of Mrs. Leechman's health, most reluctantly to give up the idea of returning to India, and again joining his beloved wife, in that most interesting field of missionary labour. He has therefore accepted the invitation of the church at Irvine, where under the pastoral care of his late father-in-law, the Rev. George Barclay, and commenced his stated labours at Irvine on the first Sabbath of November. May the God of missions raise up, and qualify, and thrust into the missionary warfare, others, who shall occupy the place of those who are thus, in his mysterious Providence, obliged to leave the high places of his field.—Ibid. Nov. 25.

ORDINATION OF MISSIONARIES.—On Thursday evening, Sept. 6, 1858, Ferdinand Soumeir, D. D., and M. D., and J. H. E. Roper, D. D., and M. D., of the University of Berlin, having been accepted by the Directors, and appointed as Missionaries to Bengal, were ordained at Dover-street Chapel, London. Rev. N. M. Harry commenced by reading appropriate Scriptures and prayer. Rev. F. Crip described, in a most affecting manner, the moral condition of our heathen and infidel millions of the human family in India. The Rev. John Arundel cordially welcomed the two German brethren to the British shores, and to the fellowship of the British churches, and received from them most satisfactory answers to the questions on their personal religion, and on their views of the great doctrines of the Holy Scriptures. The Rev. Dr. Hennessy offered the ordination prayer, with imposition of hands. The Rev. Dr. Bennett explained the missionary and the Missionary course, which the brethren were to adopt, from Acts xiii. 46. And the Rev. E. Manning concluded a service which was of an impressive order, and of unusual interest.—Ibid.—These are the Missionary Brethren who lately visited in Calcutta with Messrs. Gogery and Kennedy.—Friend of India.

TRAVELVAN ON THE EDUCATION OF THE PEOPLE OF INDIA.
(Continued).—Our previous notice of Mr. Travelyan's book has brought us to the supersession of the Oriental by the Anglican scheme, in the operations of the Committee of Public Instruction. The change we allow to have been much for the better. Yet the mania generated by it has done mischief—exceeding mischief, by its interference with the vernacular education of the people. Mr. Travelyan disclaims for himself and his party any intention of producing such an effect. In the first year of their labours they endeavoured to parry a charge of this sort, by declaring "the formation of a vernacular literature to be the ultimate object to which all our efforts must be directed." Yet what is the fact? We shewed last week that in 1835, about 8,344 children were receiving European instruction in vernacular schools in the province of Bengal. It was intimated that that number was a reduction from former times. The reduction has continued its progress. From our own knowledge of a considerable proportion of the schools in which those 8,344 children were taught, we are led to believe that by this time the number must have fallen at least to 3000. How much greater the decrease may have been, we have not opportunity at present of knowing; we shall, however, endeavour to ascertain the point. Now this decrease, we think, be justly attributed to the influence of Mr. Travelyan and his colleagues, in and out of the Education Committee. The Vernacular Schools were nearly all supported either by the various Missionary Societies or by local voluntary associations connected with them. This decrease, therefore, has been caused by a change in those bodies; and that change may be clearly traced to two influences. The Government Committee made so great a noise about their new schools and extended operations, and excited so much hope by the mission of Mr. Adam through the length and breadth of the land, that the Missionaries and their Societies naturally thought the time was now come for their being relieved from the task of popular education, and addressing themselves directly to their proper duty, the preaching of the gospel. It turned into a generally acknowledged principle, therefore, that Missionary funds were no longer to be appropriated to schools. As to the local associations by which Missionary Schools had at least in part been supported, their members became generally infected with the Calcutta mania. They lost their interest in vernacular education, and applied their contributions to the raising of sums which would entitle them to demand the institution of a Government English School at their respective stations. In this all their liberality was absorbed.

Perhaps it may be imagined by some, that the Anglican scheme of the Education Committee, and this general change in the feelings of the European and Missionary communities were merely simultaneous, but not in any wise connected as cause and effect. But let it be remembered what was the course pursued by Mr. Travelyan and his friends. The actual advantages of European knowledge—of genuine truth—were lost sight of in the exaggerated, talismanic power attributed to the English vehicle of its communication. On the other hand the vernacular tongues were vilified by those who knew nothing of them, as if they were little better than the jabbering sounds of monkeys. Mr. Travelyan thus expresses himself on the subject even now: "In Bengal and Hindustan no thing is fixed; every thing is yet to be done, and a new literature has to be formed, almost from the very foundation. The established associations, which are liable to be outraged by the intrusion of strange words, have, therefore, no existence in this case. Such refinement is the last stage in the progress of improvement. It is the very luxury of language; and to speak of the delicate sensibility of a Bengalee or Hindustanee being offended by the introduction of new words to express new ideas, is to transfer to a poor and uneducated tongue the feelings which are connected only with a rich and cultivated one." Our personal respect for Mr. Travelyan will not allow us to characterize such an estimate of our Indian languages, by the terms which alone built it. But this we had before; and it was reiterated so often, that it very widely passed current for a true representation. The celebrated romanizing trio in Calcutta could not even tolerate the inane characters of our alphabets. There was idleness in them, and ignorance, and falsehood, and all possible corruption. When, therefore, so much condescension was to be shewn the Native tongues, no to allow of a new literature being attempted in them, it was to be made new "from the very foundation;" its very letters were to be Roman. No wonder that before this pitiless crusade vernacular education fell back into neglect.

Now for the future. In opening his Vth Chapter, Mr. Travelyan says well and truly: "Many circumstances in the history of our country have conspired to prevent the introduction of Indian national instruction in a way in which it has never yet been taken up. Obstacles, which formerly prevented the Government from taking decisive steps, have disappeared: unexpected facilities have come to light. The mind of India has taken a new spring. Substitutes are required to fill up the void created by the passing away of antiquated systems. The people want instruction; the Government wants well educated servants to fill the responsible situations which have been opened to the Natives. Every thing concurs to prove that this important subject ought no longer to be regarded only as an amusement for the leisure hours of benevolent persons. It must now be taken up as a great public question, with that seriousness and resolution to make the necessary sacrifices which the interests at stake require."

These are so much our own sentiments, that it afforded us extreme satisfaction to see them thus propounded, by one so near the springs of government. We took it for granted that in high quarters there was now a readiness to prosecute with vigour the education of the people; and we were anxious to catch some indication of the course likely to be pursued, and the magnitude of effort to be made. In this we have met with grievous disappointment. When Mr. Travelyan comes to explain how much is to be done, and what sacrifices are to be made, it all dwindles into this poor conclusion: "All we have to do is, to follow out the plan which has been steadily pursued since March, 1836. Seminaries have been established at the head stations of about half the zillahs in the Bengal and Agra Presidencies; and the first thing to be done is, to establish similar institutions in the remaining forty zillahs. At the average rate of 250 Rupees per mensem for each seminary, this would require an annual addition to the fund of 190,000 Rupees." or about £12,000 a year." And after this mighty effort, national education is to be launched, at some indefinitely distant hereafter, into the parganahs and villages, by a sort of natural growth and extension of its own. Is it just—is it decided, in Mr. Trevelyan, thus to stigmatize with meanness the Government under which he serves? Has he such thoughts of it that he did not dare to dream of its making any larger sacrifice than £12,000 a year, for one of the noblest, and most essential national objects it can ever have to undertake? Proh pudor!

Consistency requires that Government should proceed with this work in a different fashion. Our rulers have already done wisely and nobly in clearing away so many obstacles to justice, by admitting the people to the use of their own tongue in all the Courts, and in matters of revenue and taxation—in bringing justice so near to every man's door by the multiplication of efficient judicial officers—and in fostering honorable emulation by the new appointments of Native Judges, Deputy Collectors and such like officers of respectability, both of rank and emolument. The value of these measures consists not so much in the increased security they must give to person and property by the better administration of justice, as in their effect upon the intelligence, morals and loyalty of the people. Mr. Trevelyan urges justly, that, in order that each zillah may furnish its own Native functionaries, who at home will be most favourably situated for the influence of public opinion to guard their integrity, and their previous experience in life to be advantageously applied in the discharge of their official duties, the English Zillah Schools must immediately be brought into operation. From them alone, he thinks, can be obtained, fit candidates for promotion to the new dignities. So be it. But are we in think only of the functionaries of the new system? Put them into office the best taught men in the world, and full of high resolves to win honour and distinction by the purity and efficiency of their administration—and yet leave the crowds of suitors who come for their decisions, and the innumerable multitude of witnesses they bring with them to support their claims, in the same ignorance and inhumanity to moral obligation in which they now are, and what will be the issue? More refined and more inveterate corruption.

It may be questioned whether there is one sutor in fifty, in all the Courts of Bengal, who does not come into Court anxious, and prepared to avail himself of whatever opportunity may occur, to purchase by a bribe justice for himself, or wrong to his opponent. Nor does any one doubt, that witnesses are to be had, in any number, to maintain whatever allegation may be desired. Can the mass in our Courts be thus corrupt, and continue so, without the corruption spreading upwards? It is impossible. There may be a struggle against it—and in individual cases a noble and successful struggle to the end—but there will be general contamination; and the people, as a nation, will be little the better for our reforms. Even their increased attachment to the English Government, under which office has become accessible to them, may be suspected. Tasting the sweets of corruption in the limited sphere of authority to which our new functionaries have been admitted, their impatience may only become more urgent, for a political change which would give higher offices, and greater scope for rapacity.

We must elevate and purify the people—the whole people. And we have no means at command for the glorious undertaking, but universally diffused vernacular education. To this we must again turn next week.

MEMOIR OF THE LATE HENRY THOMAS COLEBROOKE.

We have lately received our copy of the ninth number of the Journal of the Asiatic Society, published in London, the first article of which contains a memoir of that distinguished Orientalist, the late Mr. Colebrooke, of which we propose in our present and succeeding number to offer a brief analysis to our readers. It is drawn up by his son, chiefly from data furnished by his own interesting correspondence with his father at home, who occupied a distinguished station in the administration at the India House. The only fault which we have to find with the memoir, is its brevity. Whether we consider the liberality of his views, at a time when that liberality was considered little short of treason, upon Government conducted upon the narrow principles of monopoly; the clearness of his political vision; the share he bore in the transactions of this empire, or the distinguished place he occupied in the circle of our Indian literature, we look for a more complete memoir of Mr. Colebrooke with no little anxiety. We shall be satisfied with nothing short of a Life of Colebrooke, corresponding in the magnitude of its details, with the life of Sir W. Jones. There is one individual on whom this task seems to devolve by a natural succession; we mean the scholar on whom his mantle fell, when he departed to Europe, and who filled up the void created in the Asiatic Society, by the absence of Colebrooke. We invite Dr. Horace Wilson to perform the same generous office by the memoir of Colebrooke, which Lord Teignmouth performed to that of Sir William Jones. If there be no other means of securing so desirable an object, we would invite the Asiatic Society to urge the matter upon his consideration, by a unanimous vote.

This memoir is rendered doubly interesting by the extracts which the biographer has given from the letters of his illustrious father. But instead of these ingenuously extracted we want the entire correspondence. It would throw a new light upon Egypt and the history of the period in which it was written, than all the descriptions to be found in the Asiatic Researches. Not only should we obtain notices of facts which would illustrate the history of the time, but we should have the views of a powerful and independent mind, upon transactions which we are now unable to view but through the distorted spectacles of party. It is through the private and unofficial correspondence of past times, for which a successful copy has lately been made in England, that we are enabled to contemplate the history of our own country with so much greater advantage than our predecessors. We require that a similar flood of light should be poured from the same source upon Indian history. We want the private letters of the actors in the scene of Indian politics. Already have we been enabled, through the private letters given in Clive's Life, to fix with a degree of confidence the character of the chief events of his administration. Hastings's letters were promised to the world ten years ago, and we look for them with great desire. To complete the series we ask for the entire series of Mr. Colebrooke's letters to his father; and we shall then possess an unbroken line of correspondence from the battle of Plassey to the departure of Lord Wellesley for England.

Henry Thomas Colebrooke, the youngest son of Sir George Colebrooke, who was for some years Chairman of the Court of Directors, was born in London on the 15th June, 1768. He was never sent either to a private seminary or to a public school, but pursued his studies under the paternal roof, partly in England, partly in France, under a private tutor. At the age of fifteen, when he quitted the instructions of his tutor, he was well versed in the Greek and Roman Classics, and in Mathematics, and had mastered the French and German languages. In the spring of 1782 he was appointed to a writership on the Bengal inhibition, and proceeded to Portsmouth; where he may be said almost to have seen the loss of the Royal George, with the " brave Kempenfeldt and his eight hundred men." He was standing on the bench gazing at the vessel, but turning his head aside for a moment, a bystander exclaimed, where is the Royal George? He turned to look for her, but she had disappeared. He sailed in a store ship to Gibraltar, and thus had an opportunity of witnessing the immortal defence of that place, by General Elliott. He arrived in Calcutta in April, 1783, and remained for ten months unemployed either in public business, or in studying the language. In a letter of this period to his father, he says, " There is no danger of my applying too intensely to the languages. The one, and that the most necessary, the Moors, by not being written, have all close application. The other, the Persian, is too dry to entice, and is so seldom of use, that I seek its acquisition very leisurely." We have here conclusive evidence that for twenty-five years after we had conquered Bengal with its twenty millions of people, no attempt was made to bring the vernacular tongue into use. It is not so much as named among the languages which had any official existence. But Mr. Colebrooke, though he had none to direct his studies, was not idle. He laid down a plan for study, altogether European, and indebted on his father for a complete set of the Roman and Greek Classics.

After ten months of inactivity in the metropolis, he was placed in a subordinate situation in the Board of Accounts, and continued to perform its light and unimportant duties for more than two years. His biographer says, that " the society of Calcutta at that time is far from being favourably described in his own, or his brother's letters, and did not admit of his devoting his time much to study." But why has not the son given us these invaluable letters of his father and his uncle, describing the state of society at the close of Hastings's sanguinary triumph, when those who survived the ruins, were sent to congratulate one another on having a new lease of life, and when every European regularly took his stroll at two and woke at five, so that the streets were empty and silent the whole afternoon? Of this interesting period we have no memorial, but in the meagre letters of Mr. Fay.

Mr. Colebrooke soon became disgusted with the service and the country. His allowances did not exceed fifty Rupees a month, and even this pittance was put in jeopardy by the measures then in progress in England, and which it was feared would issue in taking away the political power of the Company, and turning their servants adrift. The whole service trembled for its existence. At length came Mr. Pitt's East India Bill of 1784, which renewed the political and commercial privileges of the Company, but restricted the whole Civil Service to its salaries. The Service was in dismay; there were few of its members who were not in debt, and the bare pay, so far from furnishing any means for liquidating arrears, was totally inadequate to their support as gentlemen, in the most moderate sense of the word. Mr. Colebrooke has drawn a strange picture of the condition of the Service, under the pernicious system of the Court of Directors. " Many of them had derived a great portion of their subsistence from Nuzzers. Others, by their knowledge of the languages were able to do work for Natives, from whom they received a consideration. All these sources were dried up." " It would alarm you," says Mr. Colebrooke, " could you transport yourself for an instant to this place, to see the distress depicted on almost every countenance. The truth is, India is no longer a mine; every one is disgusted, and all whose affairs permit, abandon it as rapidly as possible." Was ever any system devised for governing a distant empire so preposterous as that of stultifying the highest public functionaries to the most contemptible allowances, in a rich country, and yet exhorting of them zeal, public spirit and honesty? Lord Cornwallis soon after this period assumed the government of India, and perceiving the monstrous anomaly of the system upon which the Court had acted from time immemorial, at once raised the allowances of the Service to a scale which placed them beyond the necessity of receiving Nuzzers, or of doing little jobs for the Natives. Mr. Courtenay Smith, in alluding to this fact in his evidence before the House of Commons, stated that the honesty of the European servant had been improved, in proportion with his salary; and he advised that the same experiment should be made on the Native character. These remarks were at the time supposed to have emanated from his own cynical humour; but we find the fact distinctly confirmed by Mr. Colebrooke, when, in alluding to the Civil Servants under the old regime, he says, " I am induced to hope that near a third of the servants of the Company employed in such posts can boast of unspotted consciences."

Mr. Colebrooke is not favourable to Mr. Hastings's administration. It must be remembered, however, that he arrived in India in April, 1783; that Mr. Hastings quitted it in January, 1783; and that he was absent during the greater portion of this period in the Western Provinces. We must take Mr. Colebrooke's ideas, therefore, as conveying the impression which prevailed in society of the character of those measures. He says, " It has been regarded only for a few chosen spirits to shock the religious prejudices of the Natives; to take their property by violence, fraud, or any of the modes which rapacity dictates. Nor do I believe that many instances occurred of that kind in this part of Hindoostan, except during the administration of Mr. Hastings. It was Mr. Hastings who filled the country with Collectors and Judges, who adopted one pursuit—a fortune. Ignorant of the abuses to which they were employed, the members of the Provincial Councils, and the Collectors entrusted the management of affairs to their Dewans. These hordes were no sooner let loose upon the country, than they plundered the country with or without pretences, and at price of the sacrifice of every principle of honour, rendered to their employers a portion of their ill-gotten pelf. Justice was dealt out to the highest bidder by the Judges, and thieves paid a regular revenue to rob with impunity." Farther on he says; " But it is not alone for the employing Europeans in administering justice and collecting the revenues, that the administration of Mr. Hastings has excited the murmurs of the Hindoos. Nor did his crooked politics and shameless breach of faith affect any but the prierees and great men; the deposition of Zemindars, the plundering of Begums, the extermination of the Rohillas, may be forgotten, but the cruelties acted in Gurruckpore will for ever be quoted to the dishonour of the British name. My pen could not be equal to do justice to my feelings upon this subject. Mr. Burke, no doubt, will paint the scenes in glowing colours, and many witnesses are now in England, able and willing to prove the tyranny. This is, no doubt, but something, the prosecutors have to prodge against Mr. H., the masked battery mentioned in your letter before me." Yet this charge was not brought forward even by his enemies! But within a little more than three years after Mr. Hastings had left the country, Mr. Colebrooke thus characterizes the service. " The matter is now altered; the revenue servants for the most part understand and perform their duties; justice is impartially administered; crimes repressed, as far as in them lies; and the people are not oppressed for private lucre." Could so radical a change have been effected throughout the service during the short and feeble administration of Sir John Clive?

pherson? The fact is, that the persons whom Mr. Hastings was constrained to employ in the early part of his administration, were men who had been accustomed to rapine and injustices during the preceding ten or twelve years. We believe it will be found, that it was through his steady and determined spirit of reform, that the Service presented so different an aspect in the days of his immediate successor. As to the wrongs given to the Natives by Mr. Hastings's employment of Europeans in the administration of justice, and in the collection of the revenues, it is easily accounted for. For seven years after we assumed the Durnany, all power was in the hands of the Natives, and seven years of such anarchy and misery Bengal had not suffered for centuries. The new principle which Hastings introduced of employing European functionaries in the public business, was not only good, but indispensable. Without it, the country must have become a desert, and the Government bankrupt. The hesitancy of the European agency he was obliged to employ, is not to be hid at his door. The Civil Servants had been trained up in the principles of rapacity. They were men of the same stamp whom he had opposed in Council ten years before, when they laboured on dep. King Meer Jaffer, and going to war with Meer Cassim.

Of one of the most atrocious charges brought against Mr. Hastings's administration, this memoir furnishes us with a satisfactory refutation. In his opening speech upon the impeachment of the Governor General, Mr. Burke laid hold of the resources of his fertile and brilliant imagination upon a description of the cruelties practised on the people of Rangoon and Dinapore by one of his agents, Rajah Dey Sing. His portrait of the barbarities inflicted on the people, produced the most powerful effect on the auditory. "Mr. Burke's descriptions," says the historian of the trial, "were more vivid, more interesting, and more horrible, than human attention can conceive for so fancy, perhaps, even feigned before. A American was so overcome that she fainted." On this, Mr. Colebrooke writing to a friend in England says, "I beg to enter my solemn protest against your belief of Mr. Patterson's merits"—who furnished the data, which Mr. Burke's genius worked up into so terrible a picture. "Mr. Patterson's report was not founded on evidence but a trifling accident. A respectable commission, consisting of three gentlemen of known abilities and integrity, with diligence unattended, during many months investigated matters, and the result of their enquiries, and the whole purport of a large body of evidence from witnesses produced on both sides, proved the assertions in Patterson's report groundless." Here we have irresistible proof of the groundless nature of one of the gravest accusations by which the popular mind in England was roused to such a pitch of indignation. The whole story of Dey Sing's atrocities, and of Mr. Hastings's participation in them, turns out to be—fudge, and nothing more; and poor Mrs. Sheridan fainted in vain at the recital of cruelties, as imaginary as the fictions of her own husband's imagination.

After remaining three years in Calcutta, Mr. Colebrooke was removed into the revenue department in the country, in which he continued, at first in a subordinate, and then in an independent capacity, for nine years. His first location was in Tirhoot, among the Pundits in which district we may suppose him to have acquired the rudiments of his taste for Sanskrit literature; though it was not till eight years after, that he applied himself seriously to the study of it. Here also he acquired a taste for field sports, which never left him till the approach of old age. In a letter written after his arrival, he says, "that to desert his occupations would be little more than to give a list of game;—and this from a man destined to take the lead among our Oriental literati! "Prudence made him an excellent shot," says his son, "a circumstance in which he took some pride." And we may add, from undoubted authority, that Sir W. Jones prized himself more on being a good shooter, than on being the first scholar of his age. Colebrooke priding himself on being a good shot, and Jones on being a good dancer, are among the most amusing vagaries of genius on record.

After continuing three years Assistant to the Collector of Tirhoot, he was removed to a subordinate situation in Purneah, in April, 1789, just at the period when the important investigations were in progress which preceded the Permanent Settlement. Happily for him, and happily for the country, his superior, "the Collector, filled away his time," so as to leave the whole weight of the settlement upon him; and it was this circumstance which first introduced him to the notice and confidence of Government, and paved his way to the Council Board. During the hours in which he took the recreation of field sports, he collected that mass of information which was subsequently embodied in the first publication which he gave the public: A Treatise on the History and Commerce of Bengal. This work, as he says in one of his letters, was written in a fit of ill humour, occasioned by the narrow and liberal views upon which the Charter of 1783 was based. Mr. Colebrooke was, perhaps, the first among the servants of the Company, during the dark ages of its domination, to repudiate the contracted principles of its monopoly, and to advocate the most liberal notions respecting free trade and colonization. He was forty years of age; for it was not till the year 1833 that the modern principles which he had espoused, were legalized by the approval of the British Ministry and Legislature. Soon after the appearance of the work, when he required of an officer in high station how it was received, he was met with this rebuff: "You may think yourself fortunate, Sir, if you remain in the Service." But nothing can more distinctly prove the advance of Mr. Colebrooke's sentiments beyond those of the age in which he lived, than the fact that in the year 1792, the Marquis of Wellesley being Governor General, and Mr. Colebrooke Chief Judge of the Sadar Dewanny Adawlat, he published an edition of this work, in which the "general tone of it was considerably changed," because "the feelings under which it was written had been softened and altered by time," and "the sentiments he formerly avowed, were not to be taken as evidence of the principles he then held." Yet to us who live in this more enlightened age, the sentiments of the Assistant to the Collector of Purneah, must always appear more enviable than those of the Chief Judge of the Sadar.

THE CALCUTTA COPIER.—We are very anxious that this discussion, relative to the People's Government Gazette, should terminate; we will not, therefore, provoke a continuation of it by a lengthened reply to the remarks of last Friday's Courier.

Our defence is simple. In the letter to Dr. Corbyn we stated that the Circular Orders of the Sadar Board, the Circular Orders of the Sadar Dewanny, and the Official Constitutions of the Regulations were practically part and parcel of the law of the land, to which the Natives were personally bound to conform themselves, yet to this moment they had never been promulgated in any Native language. And we proposed that they should be officially published in a Brass-lee Government Gazette.

On this Dr. Corbyn said, "seeing our contemporary has published a popular newspaper for the last twenty years, we do not know why he should have withheld the publication of official intelligence in it,"—meaning, if he meant his article to have any bearing upon the point, the Circular Orders of the Sudder Board and Council and the Constructions, which are part and parcel of the law of the land. The Doctor further said, "It is the custom in our English newspapers to publish all such intelligence; why should his valuable Native paper have been the only exception to such a laudable custom?"

To this we reply, that these legislative rules have not been generally published, as he admits, in the English newspapers; and that we did not, therefore, enjoy access to them for publication in the Native languages. The Constructions have never appeared in any journal; but a year or two ago, the Editor of the Hurkaru obtained possession of some of the Circular Orders, and for a time continued to publish them; though the publication has since been discontinued. We asserted that when they were thus given to the public, we availed ourselves of this opportunity of transferring them in a Bengalee form to the Durpana. And we are happy to find this statement so fully corroborated by the Editor of the Chatterjee. He says, "that after a careful examination of the files of the Durpana, he found Circular Orders figure away repeatedly."

We did not propose to publish in the Bengalee Gazette either the Financial, Territorial, Judicial, or Military Orders; and the reason that we had neglected to publish those orders in the Durpana which we proposed to publish in the Bengalee Gazette, lies in the ground. Military Orders would be interesting only to the sepoys, who do not understand Bengalee. Judicial Orders are, we suppose, the same with the Circular Orders of the Court of Sudder Dewanny; and Territorial Orders are, we suppose, synonymous with those of the Sudder Board; Financial Orders, which appear sometimes once in the year, we did not propose to publish in the Durpana or to propose for the Gazette.

When we said that the order of the Privy Council robbing the value of seats appraisable to the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty had never been promulgated among the Native community, we, of course, meant "officially." Unofficially we gave full notice of the change to the readers of the Durpana in an editorial article; but to enable the Natives to act upon a rule so directly opposed to existing and unrepudiated laws, it was necessary that the modification should be promulgated with the same official sanction as the original regulation.

The proposal which we made, that the donation of Government to the Orphans of the brave men who defend the State should be given in a direct, open and generous form, instead of being doled out through the profits of a Press, was one which appeared likely to combine economy with dignity. Government now pays a monopoly price for its printing, with the understanding that the monopolist shall contribute to a national institution, in the prosperity of which Government is deeply interested. Let all public works be printed on fair competition prices, and the saving be presented to the Orphan Schools, as the unfettered donation from the State. Government can lose nothing by such an arrangement.

In taking leave of this subject, we trust for ever, we must be permitted to add one word, and that the last, on the kind of treatment which the Bengalee Government Gazette, and its projector, has experienced. He says, year after year, the publications of the State printed at private Presses, to the extent of twenty, thirty and forty thousand Rupces, without one word of remembrance from the Management. He was, therefore, emboldened to make his proposal to Government, for the publication of the Gazette, at a price ridiculously low, never dreaming that it could be interpreted as an infringement of a contract with the Orphan Press, of which he had never heard. Immediately, however, the Management was up in arms against the interloper; and Dr. Carlyon, who had signified his zeal for the Orphan by withholding his own journal from their Press, and setting up a printing office for himself, came forward in breathless haste to denounce this nefarious proposal. The proposer of the work on whom found that it was considered an infringement of certain rights which Government were supposed to have conferred on the Orphan Society, then he declared that they were perfectly welcome to the publication; that it restored him to him where it was published; and that he should cease to press the publication of it by himself—a resolution to which he has strictly adhered. In these circumstances it is either fair or generous to reiterate the assertion that the proprietor of the Gazette had proposed to draw a portion of the State printing from the Orphan Press, and that the purity of his motive was questionable?

We have many apologies to offer for having inadvertently omitted to re-publish the remarks of the Chatterjee; which we made all the animals in our power by publishing both articles in the present number.

CHINA.—OPPIUM AFFAIRS.—Last week news arrived from China to the 29th of January to the same effect as our previous communications. The Chinese not only continue firm in their suppression of Opium eating and smoking, but seem determined to carry their measures for expelling the drug from their coasts to the last extremity. The Viceroy at Canton has put forth another edict of warning and remonstrance to the foreigners, in which they are told that the Opium traffic is to be extinguished, not only in the land, but on land. A Special Commissioner, too, is expected from Peking to give the coup de grace to the trade. It appears as if little more be left for him to do. The sales of Opium at Canton are extinct. At the deliveries in Lintin from the 1st to the 22d of January, amounted to 218 chests; and these were all on speculation for the western countries—a speculation of somewhat desperate character. "The quantity of Opium in China, India, and in transit between the two places," says the London Times, "may be roughly estimated at 50,000 chests, worth six months ago, five times of rupees, or five millions sterling. The Emperor of China, by a stroke of his veto-station pencil, renders them nearly as valueless as so many boxes of sand!" He is valiant enough to turn all this gold to slabs.

Captain Elliot, as Superintendent of the British trade in China, it is believed, is ready to follow out the course he has taken, in co-operating with the Chinese Gov. against the suppression of the trade. When they stopped the general trade until the embargo was lifted should be driven without the Bora Tien, he commanded the craft to be gone. And now it is expected that the Chinese will demand in the same manner that the receiving ships shall leave the coast; and the parties concerned appear to believe that Captain Elliot will again give them his assistance. We said before, it would come to this; but the progress is more rapid than we had anticipated. The Opium merchants of Canton seem to be beside themselves with despair and rage. Indeed, they are in a pitiful state. Their immediate losses must be ruinous; and the future presents no prospect of retrieval. In such circumstances a good deal of rash and wild talk may be forgiven. But it is to be hoped, for their own sakes, it will go no further than talk. They do swaggle about arming their receiving ships to the teeth, and giving battle to both the Chinese and Her Majesty's Representative, rather than withdraw from the embargo. Those who wish for the speedy abolition of the traffic could desire nothing more effective for its attainment.

But one shudders to think of any of our fellow subjects being so misguided, as to put themselves in such a position. We trust nothing of the kind will occur. It is another proof of the demoralizing character of contraband traffic, that men otherwise not without respectability, should so easily talk of taking to guns and swords in the resistance of lawfully constituted authority, to maintain their right to do wrong. Too many of our Calcutta merchants are partners with these men in their mischievous traffic. But here we are so far removed from the scene where the smuggling is practised, as to have caught but little of its spirit; and it is to be hoped, the Calcutta merchants have sufficient possession of their judgment, to influence their Canton correspondents, and bring them to more airy, if not more honest purposes.

THE BOMBAY BANK.—We should have attended to the remarks made on our article, relative to the Bombay Bank, by our courteous contemporary of the Bombay Times, in our last number, if we had not been in expectation of seeing Lord Auckland's letter, with the contents of which the Editor of that paper appears to be fully acquainted, given entire to the public. But as this has not been done, we are obliged to offer the following brief observations, without a knowledge of the grounds on which His Lordship discounts from the decision of the Legislative Council.

We disclaim the remotest idea of treating the sister Presidency with ridicule. We certainly thought the somewhat pompous description of its importance, given by our esteemed contemporary, not altogether in good taste; but we did nothing more than recapitulate it. The question at issue was represented as one in which the principles of justice and equity had been violated; and the size of the community whose interests were involved in the violation should, we think, have been as prominently advanced. A small body has as much right to strict justice as a larger one. It was not a question of insulted majesty, but of violated faith, which was the subject of complaint; and the case would not have suffered, if no allusion had been made to the present position and the future prospects of the port of Bombay. We cheerfully follow the example of our contemporary, and let him to himself from his mind every feeling which may have arisen from a supposition of our having treated Bombay with disrespect. We rejoice at its growing importance, and admire the skill and enterprise which has raised the trade of a metropolis connected with seven millions of population, to so close a comparison with that of the Capital of seventy millions. We wish the Peninsular Coast was studded with such active marts of commerce.

Upon the general question of the Bank, our contemporary will, we are sure, admit a diversity of opinion. After a close examination of the subject, we cannot perceive in the course proposed by the Legislative Council any thing which may be characterized as unjust and inequitable, or which merits those vituperations with which the Bombay Press has loaded it. One of the arguments used in Mr. Prinsep's letter, has, we confess, been fully neutralized by the assertion of the four-fifths of the shareholders of the Joint Stock Bank consist of members of the public service. But the rest of his arguments appear to be based on grounds which admit of the fullest justification. We cannot see with what colour of reason it can be advanced, that it was the intention of the Court of Directors to limit the profits on shares in the Chartered Bank to the projectors of the Private Joint Stock Bank. If they had intended that these profitable shares should be granted to any specific body of men, we think they would naturally have particularized those who originally applied to them for a Charter. It appears to us anomalous, that they could have intended to exclude from all participation in the Chartered Bank seventy-two individuals who had subscribed for six hundred and fifty-two shares in it, simply because they had expressed their unwillingness to join a Bank which had not the Court's sanction. We cannot but think the charge of injustice against the Legislative Council comes with an awkward grace from the projectors of the Joint Stock Bank, who had proposed, with so little show of reason or justice, to exclude from the benefits of the Chartered Bank, so large a portion of those who had been among the foremost to petition for it.

We must equally claim our contemporary's indulgence for continuing to think that, amidst these conflicting claims and interests, the sale of the shares by auction was the only plan by which Government could escape the charge of partiality, in the distribution of them. The idea of devoting the profits of these shares to objects of national utility, really serves the more warmly to recommend the plan; and we hope it will be followed whenever a similar case may occur in India. Private individuals can advance no claim to the advantages of such a premium. We think that it would have rebounded more to the honour of Bombay, if its commercial community had rested content with the acquisition of a Banking Establishment, to which the aidance of Government would have given universal confidence, and which would have proved a source of perpetual benefit to the city, and cheerfully allowed the primary profits of the undertaking to be devoted to objects of public utility. Such a course would have been in accordance with that spirit of generosity, by which the Bombay community has acquired so just a reputation on all occasions when a claim has been made on its funds for public objects.

We rejoice, however, that the matter has been referred to the Court of Directors. In their decision we shall cheerfully coincide, to whichever side it may incline.

REV. DR. JENSON.—A fortnight ago we were completely taken by surprise, by the announcement of Dr. Jenson's name amongst a group of visitors from the Metropolis. There is not now a name more dear to the Christian Church in the east; and we met him, therefore, with no common feelings. But the pleasure of seeing one so distinguished by his sufferings, his labours, and, thanks be to God, his success, in the service of the gospel, was speedily shrouded by the information that we owe his visit to Bengal to illness. An affection of the lungs has compelled him to resort to this suspension of his labours. Before our paper leaves the press he will have sailed again for Moulmein, and, we believe, with some improvement in his health. Our Christian friends will not fail to remember him in their prayers. His life is of the greatest value. His exertions and three infant children need his care; and for his work there is no one of his brethren, perhaps, yet competent to divide between the revision of the Burmese translation of the Scriptures, and the ministry of the gospel amongst the Burmese converts at Moulmein. His brethren generally have been drawn off, in a great measure, from the Burmese to the Karens, amongst whom the spread of the Gospel has been so peculiarly prosperous. The present state of the anti-Mission appears to be good. The chief subject of regret is the exclusion of the Missionaries from Burmah proper. On the other hand, just before Dr. Jenson left Moulmein, he had the satisfaction of baptizing five converts, the first fruits of another mountain tribe, perfectly distinct from the Karens and of smaller numbers, but yet in many respects resembling them. Unfortunately the tribe is within the limits of the Burmese empire; and as the chief town, Tharawadee, has no resident officers, and his power completely established. 116

THE STATE OF GREAT BRITAIN.—It is natural for our readers, amidst the many thoughts which they send homeward, frequently to ask, what is really the condition of our native land. Nor, in the confused influx of news and contradictory comments, which we receive from month to month, is it easy to satisfy our concern on the subject. A few lines from a friend in whose judgement we can trust, and whom we know to be well informed, affords more satisfaction than all the mass of published intelligence. But, in default of such a source of information, we are all accustomed, according to our various partialities, to turn our eyes to one or another of the chief organs of public opinion at home, and enquire what is the view they take of our national affairs. Sometimes we can find the public journalist and private friend, in whom we are disposed to confide, in the Observer. A few, at least, of our readers will be in this position in reading the following paragraphs. We find them in the retrospect of 1851, taken by the Editor of the Patriot, in his last number of the bygone year. They will, at least, serve as a guide to those points, in our national interests, which deserve attention. They express the sentiments of a man of liberal views, and truly Christian feelings; and no one can doubt of his opportunities for receiving information. We are gratified by the prominence he gives to both the secular and the religious concerns of our land; indeed, we may justly take pleasure in the knowledge, that, through the Patriot, our own representations of affairs in India, are pretty sure to be conveyed to the people of England, even though our Journal did not find its way, as it does, into the private society of our fatherland. And the Observer, of other Journalists in England and Scotland. We may take this opportunity of assuring our friends, who have expressed the wish that we would give our own impressions of England, and especially of its religious economy and operations, that we shall endeavour to satisfy their desire without farther delay. Here is the sketch of the Patriot:

"In closing another year of our E. India labours, we cannot refrain from calling upon our readers to unite with us in devout and grateful acknowledgments to the God of Britain for the mercies which have been rendered to us, and of which, and the agonies of painful conduct, and the anxious watchfulness by the signs of the times, one is so apt to be criminally forgetful. Altho' at all events, the elements of our prosperity have not suffered any perceptible declension. Our commerce has recovered from the shock occasioned by the sudden interruption of the American trade. Our monetary system exhibits an appearance of steadiness and firmness. The alarm of actual scarcity has subsided. The privation and suffering which the agricultural labourers are undergoing in some parts of the country, are not chargeable upon Divine Providence, but spring from the defective arrangements of short-sighted legislation. Under these circumstances, the preservation of internal tranquillity, notwithstanding the provocation to sedition and turbulence ministered by ill-timed denunciations, and the signal failure of the ultra-Radical demagogues, afford great cause for thankfulness. The state of our Colonial relations cannot be adverted to as matter for unmixed congratulations; yet, the suppression of rebellion in Canada has dispated the gloomy apprehensions entertained as to the loss of the North American Colonies. In the West Indies, the abandonment of the Apprenticeship has vindicated the zeal, and crowned the efforts, of the noble band of philanthropists who have stood forward in the cause of the negro. In South Africa, a wise and pacific policy is remedying the disorders introduced by unjust encroachments upon the native tribes. Our Australian Colonies are steadily advancing in importance. And in India, beneficial reforms, only too tardily adopted, together with increased facilities of speedy intercommunication, and new openings for agricultural enterprise, afford a flattering promise that the immense latent resources of our Eastern empire will at length be developed. We do not forget the dangers with which our power in the East is supposed to be threatened, from the disaffection of the dependent or tributary states, the hostility of neighbouring powers, the intrigues of Russia, or the jealousy of the Colonial Empire; but we confess that we are much less apprehensive as to the possible result of any or all of these causes of alarm, singly or in co-operation.

"We have had rumours or forebodings of wars—with Russia, with Persia, with the United States; but the prognostications of evil have been fulfilled. Our merchants are the police of the world; and commerce is the great pacifier that is preparing in all regions the way of the Lord. In the continued activity and progress of our Missionary establishments in all quarters of the globe, we see, moreover, the evidence and pledge of the Divine favour to our country. No nation, it has been truly said, has ever been destroyed, so long as it was using its power beneficially. The power of Great Britain has at least this moral security for its permanence. It is the beneficent power the intentions which guide her conduct, just as her policy may be characterised as absolute in its aim, with the extension of British dominion and supremacy is everywhere subservient to the advancement of the kingdom of Christ. Let the candidate be detested as ungodly; we will avow that upon this fact we rest a strong and animating assurance, that our country is well destined to flourish and advance in prosperity. Nor are we disposed to take any other than a cheerful view of the ferment and strife of opinions and principles that is at work among us; whatever disturbing influence may be in operation, there is moral energy enough in the better principles that have leavened society to cope with them. Any thing is preferable to the stagnation of ignorance and lupine faith. The extent and identity of the religious ignorance that prevailed among us, have been ascertained only by the spread of Popish and other misled errors among the people. Perhaps it may be said of generations of men, as well as of individuals, that they do not truly hold, or at least with intelligent faith, any doctrines that they have not as it were thought out for themselves, and learned to distinguish as truths from the erroneous errors. The Protestantism of the English people had become too much a traditional creed; it wanted to be proved, to be animated. It is now likely to undergo this process."

THE VERNACULAR LANGUAGES.—We republish with no ordinary satisfaction, a Notification of Government, relative to the substitution of the vernacular languages for the Persian, under the Bengal Presidency. It will be remembered that our late Deputy Governor, having previously laid the country under the deepest obligations by initiating the abolition of the Transit Duties, enlarged our debt of gratitude, by promulgating orders at the beginning of last year for the discontinuance of Persian, and the adoption of the vernacular languages in public business. The measure was at first considered in the light of an experiment; and it was ordered that reports of the progress made in carrying it into effect, should be delivered on the 1st of July, 1838, and the 1st January, 1839. It is not, perhaps, generally known, that the past year has, consequently, been a year of trembling anxiety to the Natives of the country, whose dearest interests are involved in the change which restores to them the use of their own tongue. They knew well that the Native Officers of Government were universally opposed to the change, partly from their greater aptitude, through long habit, in the use of Persian, but chiefly, because the nefarious profits which they derived from the mystification of all proceedings under the veil of a foreign tongue, were likely to be seriously affected by its abolition. They knew that the European Officers had been trained up in a knowledge of Persian, and were not likely to relish a change, which must necessarily be attended with inconvenience, at a time when they were weighed down with official duties. Their fears were proportionably excited, lest the opposition which the measure was likely to encounter, should lead Government, when the year of probation was completed, to waver, and eventually to abandon the measure; and they felt that the utmost resolution of purpose would be necessary, in order to carry it triumphantly through. The friends of improvement will be happy to hear, that the success which has attended the experiment, except in those cases in which it has been opposed by the lukewarmness, or the opposition, of the subordinate European Officers, has been so complete, as to fix the determination of Government. The following is a summary of the results of the year:

"It appears, then, that of all the Districts under the Bengal Presidency, the change was on or soon after the 30th June complete in the Revenue Department in all. In the Judicial Department it was complete in the Courts of Civil and Session Judges in twelve Districts, and in those of Magistrates in twelve—it was advancing rapidly towards completion by the Civil and Session Judges in nine Districts, and by Magistrates in fifteen. There were but seven Districts in which little had been done by Session Judges, and five in which the Magistrates had done little: by one Officer only, but nothing been done."

"With this experience before him, the present Deputy Governor has resolved to consummate the change which had been commenced throughout the Presidency. In the districts in which the Bengalee language predominates, that language and character are to be used henceforth, and for ever, in all the public business of the people. In the North Western Provinces of this Presidency, the language to be used is the Oordoo, and the character the Persian; with the understanding that the Nagree character is to be gradually substituted for it, as long as it is known to the great bulk of the people. In the Southern Decanum Adawlat, the language to be adopted in lieu of Persian, is the Hindoostanee; and this upon the whole to be the wisest course; since the Supreme Court receives cases of appeal, both from the North West Provinces and Bengal. In the former, Hindoostanee is vernacular, and Bengalee totally unknown; in the latter, though Bengalee is the language of the people, Hindoostanee is, to a considerable degree, known and used.

Twelve officers are named in the list, in whose districts, little or no progress had been made up to the 1st of July last. Two of the Special Commissioners have never attempted to carry the orders into execution, but have retired into a correspondence with Government, to prove the impracticability of the change; and the Civil and Session Judge of Tirhoot has done nothing in obedience to the orders of Government. On the other hand, twenty-four officers completed the change within six months, and have received the cordial thanks of Government; twenty-four others, though they did not complete the substitution within six months, have yet made such considerable progress, that little remains to perfect the work.

This result is satisfactory. Instead of feeling surprise that the Special Commissioners should have entered into a remonstrance with Government on the subject of the change, and that one Judge should have absolutely refused compliance with the orders, we are rather surprised at the ready and cheerful acquiescence of the service in this reform, and at the ease with which it has been carried into effect. Twenty-five years ago the attachment to whatever was Mahomedan in our administration; to whatever might identify our Government with that of the dethroned dynasty, and its barbarous old maxims, rather than with the free and liberal views of European policy, was in the youth of its strength. If a proposal had been made at that time to popularize our administration, by adapting the language of business to the convenience of the people, instead of the service of the Native Officers, it would have been scouted. Mr. Bayley, in Burdwan, was among the first to break the ice. He made himself familiar with the language of the people, as far as the vigilance of Government would permit him; and adopted their language in the proceedings of his Court. But though Government had seen proof in his case, that this was the way to simplify business, and that it was the most direct road to the affections of the people, it could not be induced to throw away the Persian stilts upon which it had so long stratted above the level and comprehension of the people. A great change has now been wrought in the opinions of the service, with some trifling exceptions. And as the main obstacle to this important reformation lay in the prejudices of the European Officers, the removal of these prejudices shows the time has come for carrying it into execution. The feeble obstacles which are yet raised by some junior officers in the judicial service, will be silenced by the present substitution. They will have no alternative left them, but to fall in with the views of the public authorities.

The substitution of the vernacular languages for the Persian may now be considered as a cure beyond reach. If we look at the immediate benefit it will confer, we may safely pronounce it one of the most beneficial measures of our Government. If we look forward to the vast prospective advantages it will bring in the lapse of time, it must be considered as, without question, the most important measure which we have ever adopted. Considering the people as having an inalienable right to the transaction of the public business, in which they are interested, in their own language, and that they have been deprived of this right since the Mahomedans took the country, we may be said to have released them by this one measure, the injustice of six centuries. We have at length taken off from their necks the galling yoke by which, during this long period, they have been rendered, from day to day, of their subjection to strangers. We have by this wise measure laid the foundation for the improvement of the Native languages, and for their being enriched with the science of the west. By constraining our Native Officers in Bengal, to learn and to use the language of the people, which they have never done before, and strange to deed, will it be, if the administration in these provinces should be so better conducted, when the European functionaries can converse familiarly with the people, than when they were totally ignorant of their language.

We shall return at an early period to this subject.

MAJOR SLEEMAN'S REPORT ON MEOPURSHAH.—We now reclaim our pledge of giving an abstract of the ble report which has just been sent into Government, on the subject of Megpunniam. This barbarous term refers to a division of the crime of Thuggee, out of which it grew, after the siege of Bhartpur, in 1826. While the Thugs murder their victims to obtain their wealth, the Megpunniam immolate travellers to obtain their children, whom they after wards sell into slavery. The great founder of this system, Kheenu Jemadar, was considered so holy a man, that after his arrest, he was intrusted by the villagers to extinguish a fire which had broken out in a village; and by a singular coincidence, the fire ceased as his hands were extended to heaven in supplication. The greater part of the gangs, who have engaged in this revolting system of murder, retain the character of religious mendicants; and the system itself is firmly believed to be under the patronage of the goddess Kalka. In common with the Thugs they have a slang language, common to all the initiated. Unlike the Thugs, however, they always take their families with them on these murderous expeditions; the females assist in inveigling travellers, and in taking charge of the children, till they can be disposed of. Their victims are generally chosen from the more indigent classes, the disappearance of whom is less likely to excite suspicion, than that of more wealthy individuals; and they find that it is more lucrative, as well as more safe, to murder the poor for the sake of their children, than the opulent for their wealth. The Brigandae, who are widely scattered throughout the Upper Provinces, are ever ready to receive the children of the murdered parents; and they enjoy many facilities for subsequently distributing them among the brothels of the principal cities, or disposing of them to men of wealth and consideration. Suspicion may be at once lulled by the declaration, that the children were purchased from indigent parents, who had no longer the means of supporting them. The system is of so recent an origin, that it has not yet spread further than the Upper Provinces, the Delhi territories, and the Rajpootana and Ameer States; and the number of the initiated does not exceed three or four hundred. The conviction of offenders is rendered difficult by the custom they adopt of throwing the bodies of their victims into the nearest river, and by the facilities which the children are carried, and the obstacles which are found in tracing and identifying them.

The present Report consists of the confessions of some of the principal offenders, and the depositions which were taken in cases brought to light by the exertions of the officers in the Thuggee department.

From the confessions, we select some of the replies which will serve to shew the total extinction of all human feeling which this system induces.

“GURUJI. Appover.”

Q. You were, I understand, confined by the Paloondee chief five years ago, for kidnapping children; where did you get them?

A. Yes, I murdered in company with a large gang of Thugs, eight travellers at Behaspoore, and took six of their children with four other Thugs, to Paloondee, and the Rajah, hearing of our arrival, ordered us to be arrested, and we were kept in jail four months.

Q. What became of the children?

A. The Paloondee chief took them away from us, and sent them to the Commissioner of Delhi.

Q. After your release from Paloondee, did you ever go out Thuggee?

A. Yes, I have never had any other occupation.

Q. What price were you in the habit of getting for the children you obtained?

A. We formerly used to get 80 or 100 Rupees for fair good-looking children.

DEWEE, Appover.

Q. You were confined in the Muttra jail for Thuggee three years ago?

A. Yes, I murdered four people at Haseerungee, and one of the Banjarrah Thugs being dissatisfied with the division of the plunder, went and related the particulars of the murder to the Thaumadar, who arrested twenty-two of us.

Q. Were any children of the murdered people recovered?

A. Yes, six of them; one of whom a boy, named Girdharee, recognized me, and told the Magistrate I had murdered his parents with a sword.

Q. How came you to escape punishment on that occasion?

A. Owing to some discrepancies in the statement of the boy, who did not witness the murder of his parents; but we attributed our success in getting released on this occasion, to the Goddess Kalka, and we disbursed 24 Rupees in her name, among the Brahmins and poor people.

MOONUT, CAMEER alias KHUMBA.

Q. How long have you been confined in the Delhi jail, and for what crime?

A. About six years; and for the murder of three travellers near Delhi.

Q. How came this murder to be brought to light?

A. The children of the murdered people were recognized by some of their relatives, who detailed the particulars of the murder of their parents.

Q. How many of your sons were concerned in this murder?

A. Three, who were all hanged, as well as two others of my relations.

Q. I understand you were formerly a Thug Jemadar.

A. Yes; my husband had a gang of forty or fifty men and women, whom I always accompanied on Thuggee.

Q. Did you ever perform the office of Legation or strangler?

A. No, the female Thugs are only employed in taking charge of the children of the murdered people.

KHUMBA, CAMEER alias KHUMBA.

Q. Where were your parents residing?

A. Near the village of Barhakee, in the Bahadur district.

Q. How many Thugs were present on that occasion?

A. Between forty and fifty.

Q. Did you witness the murder of your parents?

A. No, they were murdered during the night, and I and my two young brothers were entrusted to the charge of the female Thugs, and we were ordered for six or seven days afterwards in some gyzies, who would not give a sufficient sum for me, and I was subsequently adopted by Sakee Jemadar, a relation of Khumba.

Q. Have you ever heard any thing of your two brothers, since the murder of your parents?

A. No.

Q. Have you been in the habit of accompanying your adopted husband on Thuggee since you have been living with him?

A. Yes, I have been on three or four expeditions with him.

Q. A poor Fakewee woman was murdered in your house at Junier, eight or nine months ago; did you feel no compunction in taking charge of her children during the time your husband was employed in strangling her?

A. I was compelled to obey the orders of my husband, who directed me to prevent the children making a noise.

Q. What time of the day was this woman murdered?

A. About 12 o'clock, and her body was covered over with clothes, and removed during the night by my adopted husband, Hurree Singh and others.

Q. What became of her three children?

A. They were sold to Khashee Banjarrah for 20 Rupees.

The Report closes with a list of two hundred and twenty-three Thugs employed in the system of murdering indigent parents for the sake of their children, who are still at large; together with their age, cast, connections, and their respective districts; and a note appended to it, says:—“A gang of forty-four of the above prisoners has been arrested by Lieut. Mills, since this list was preferred: and with them seven more children of murdered parents have been recovered."

It is to be hoped that the energetic measures adopted by Major Sleeman and his Assistants, have been successful in arresting the progress of this crime, if not of extinguishing it altogether. Without such vigorous exertions there can be little doubt that it would, like its parent crime, have spread to the utmost limits of this empire, marking its progress with desolation and death. It is difficult to award any medal of praise, which shall be in any measure adequate to the praiseworthy exertions to which India is indebted for relief from the scourge of Thuggee in all its ramifications. It is by these efforts, that the British Government acquires its surest title to the management of this empire; it is when that Government is thus employed, at a large pecuniary sacrifice, in eradicating those crimes which prey upon the vitals of society, and in diffusing the blessings of peace and security, that we have the highest prognostic of its stability.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY'S INSTRUCTION.—From our Contemporary Selections it will be seen, that one of the pupils of the General Assembly's Seminary, Mahendra Lall, has embraced the gospel and been baptized by the Rev. Mr. Ewart; and that considerable excitement has, in consequence, arisen in Native society. Tracts are published by the press, and measures by others, on the Missionaries and their converts. It has been stated by one of the Native preachers, that the Seminary has been injured by the occurrence, and has been forsaken by as many as a hundred of its students. Certain that our readers would be anxious to know the truth of the matter, we have made enquiries where we were sure of having it, and are happy to find that there is but little to regret, and much to rejoice in.

On the baptism of Mahendra Lall, about a month ago, a few of the pupils, not exceeding ten in number, were withdrawn. But soon after, number young men, belonging to the second class, left his father's house, and bringing the legal evidence of his conversion along with him, put himself under the protection of the Missionaries. His friends at first made a good deal of noise about him, and then took to foul promises for the purpose of getting him away. In this manner two young men succeeded in getting him to go away with them, and to promise that they would bring him back again. He has not, however, been seen since, and he is, no doubt, kept secure in his new abode.

It was after the excitement arising from this event, that the greatest effect seemed to be produced upon the Seminary. For a day or two there might be a deficiency amounting to a hundred; but during the latter part of the past week, the absence, on all accounts, did not exceed sixty; and on Saturday next, it was ascertained that not many more than twenty-one had left on account of the conversions—certainly not thirty. The pupils who remain were chiefly in the junior classes, and, therefore, scarcely yet introduced to the knowledge of the gospel; and the present week opened with many new applications for admission, so that a gap will no longer be seen through their accession.

The questions will arise—Have the conversions of the Seminary been to blame? And are their labours likely to be impeded? To both we would answer, No! A more open and honourable course could not have been taken, than our friends of the Scottish Mission have pursued. They have exhibited the nature of the instruction they communicate, in the most public and undignified manner; and they have told both Heathens and Christians, that the direct and single aim of all their labours, is the promotion of Christianity, by the conversion of their pupils. Their conversion is the sole but invaluable reward they seek, for their unwearying toil. There is not a shadow of deception about them. And their motive is the highest that can animate a human being. Neither will their work be impeded. A vast proportion of the Natives in Calcutta are now indifferent to the decline of Hindooism, or the prevalence of Christianity, in the abstract. They regard them both as inevitable. Were they to be completed to-morrow, and all particular families or individuals put out of countenance through singularity in the change, it would cause them no more regret, than does now the abolition of Suttee ten years ago. The present singularity is likewise, when one of them comes to be affected by it; but yet is scarcely an evil so dreadful as in its own possibility, or even probability, to spare them. It will in a few years, we trust, cease to exist. And every occurrence, to the present, helps forward its removal. It will soon be doubtful to most Hindus in these quarters, on what side the balance of credit lies—with the profession of Hinduism, or that of Christianity. It will be a frequent question—what is to be chosen, the approbation of an enlightened and enlightened, or the favour of an enslaved and ignorant multitude.

THE CALCUTTA SAILORS' HOME.—We have had the pleasure of receiving the First Annual Report of this excellent Institution, from which few are more desirous of publishing our support. It provides for women of every caste suitable accommodation and living, on extremely moderate terms, with facilities for obtaining employment. To the destitute it presents a refuge, not only from want, but from the associations of vice and misery. It fully deserves the name it bears; and a home to our poor exiles of this sort is a blessing indeed, of the inestimable value. Not fewer than 1225 individuals have enjoyed its advantages during the past year. Of these there were 161 widows, and 100 orphans, who were taken in directly from their ships. The remainder consisted of 33 officers, and 486 men, were with ships. Of the officers 43, and of the men, 419 were from our ships; and the rest have either got employment on shore, or have been dismissed for bad conduct, or sick, voluntarily, or against the laws.

The conductors of the Institution have framed its regulations so as to withdraw the women, by suitable protection from folly and immorality, and then than to instruct them in the truths and precepts of religion. But it is in this, that their rule, not to make the system press with severity upon the poor Tara, but to exercise compulsion upon her in respect of religion. They wash their hands, and every similar Institution, to have a Home to the sailor, "which shall be a resting place for his body, a guard for his purse, a protector for his morals, and a church in which he shall be addressed to him the sacred truths of our Holy Religion, plain, simple and appropriate language; and by which, under the blessing of Heaven, he shall become the instrument of God—an honest, virtuous, and holy man."

The Sailors' Home combines with the District Charitable Society in making mendicancy in Calcutta inextinguishable. The Committee assure us, that "a real sailor would wonder at the streets of Calcutta in a state of destitution, for the doors of the Home are open to him almost night and day." The Home is open to every able-bodied seaman, whatever be his condition, who has not an flagrantly vicious character, or his own society, as would secure his expulsion from the circle of jovial, but not entirely abandoned characters. The Committee regret to state that inmates, if not the worst of those strutting about, collecting alms, are nothing more than runaway or discharged soldiers, dissipated exiles, servants, or old and incurably wicked sailors, who have been turned adrift for their insubordination, or who have Major Curzon, accompanied Sir Alexander Burnes on the 15th, to explore the Pass. The Cavalry was to halt at Daur till the 18th, to enable the Infantry to come up. The Cavalry is to dismount and walk through the Pass, eighty miles, their horses having to carry four days' forage; the first march in the Hills was to be one in twenty-two miles. The Hills are barren and totally devoid of verdure.—The Governor General has lately reached Simla, and appears all the better for his journey through the plains. The station was full; not a street house was to be had. The Andaman left Bombay on the 23rd March, full of passengers, with 42,375 letters and papers in her Mail Luggage. The Swatania has been got off without having sustained any injury which forbids the hope of her being employed again.—The bodies of the small iron steamer which had gone to the bottom, by accident, have been recovered.—The Engelhardt claims that it is the intention of Government to cause the Red Sea Steamers to take their departure from Calcutta, during three months of the approaching monsoon.

TUESDAY, APRIL 9.

The Granger has arrived from Rangoon, with Capt. Dunsen and Dr. Hayfield on board. Dr. Hayfield has given the former from his post; and the latter wishes to communicate with Government. The Malacca Chevalier reports that Tharawaddie is bent on mischief. He is 2,000 foot and 1000 horse, it is said, assembled at Rangoon. The individual who had caused the late insurrection, by personating the young prince, had been apprehended, tried with the most horrible and brutal barbarity by the Woodstock of Rangoon, and died on his way to Ava. The insurrection is completely at an end. Capt. McLeod is left at Ava as beatus torrens for Calcutta. We have heard it whispered, that he is not compromised to public views.—The Calcutta Steam Committee have put off the public meeting till Monday next, the 15th instant, on account of the present holidays.—The Haraka says the Madras Police Report is not shared, but actually under the consideration of the Supreme Government. Something, too, is on the tapis, says our contemporary, in the matter of Public Education. We shall be glad to hear of it.—Richness is said to be prevailing at Chittagunge, and also at Mergahere. A couple, the other day, when carrying 4,000 Rupees, under the care of a Sircar, in the employ of Messrs. Gidner and Co., decamped with his load, and has not been heard of.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

GOVERNMENT OF BENGAL. JUDICIAL DEPARTMENT—RESOLUTION.

The 26th March, 1889.

In obsequy, on the 26th January, 1887, the great and distinguished of the Persian language and the adoption of the Vernacular in the Judicial and Revenue Departments of the Bengal, the late Deputy Governor was pleased to direct that, on the 1st July, 1888, and 1st January, 1889, Reports of the progress made in effectuating this important reform should be furnished by the Sudder Court, the Sudder Board, and the Special Commissioners.

2. The Reports now under consideration are those of the Sudder Court and Board and the Special Commissioner of Patna. The Special Commissioners of Calcutta and Moorshedabad have made no report. They have never attempted to carry the orders into execution. We entered into a correspondence with the Government to prove the impropriety of the change of language in their Courts and those of their subordinates. Before this correspondence could terminate, the papers were called for by the Honourable the President in Council.

* 11th May, 1888, No. 61, and duly transmitted to that authority; and therefore the Deputy Governor of Bengal, anticipating the receipt of Orders on the case from the Supreme Government, has hitherto refrained from issuing a Resolution on the Reports now before him. But as no Order has yet been received, and the period originally fixed for the complete change of language has come and gone, His Honour deems it proper to lay before today the issue of Instructions to the Sudder Court and Sudder Board, upon this important subject. Upon the reports of the Special Commissioners of Patna &c., in His Honour's judgment, advisable to make no remarks, and the receipt of the final Orders of the Government. In view of the objection of the Special Commissioners of Calcutta and Moorshedabad.

3. It appears that in the following Districts, the Vernacular language had, up to the 30th June, been completely substituted for the Persian, in the Courts of the Civil and Sessions Judges, and the Collectors and their subordinates (except in summary cases).

Hongky, Bangalore, Patna, Jessore, Backergunge, Rangpur, East Burdwan, Dinapore, Beerooboon, Muzaffarpore, and Shidabad—except in the Court of the Additional Judge, in which it is reported that "considerable progress" has been made towards the change. In Assam the Bengalee has always been, and still is, in use.

4. No inconvenience has attended the change in any of the above Districts, and in some cases the results are very favourably reported on by the local Authorities.

5. In the following Districts the change had been completed, save in the Revenue Department (except in regard to summary cases) but not in the Courts of the Civil and Sessions Judges:

6. In the Courts of the Civil and Sessions Judges of the following Districts—Cuttock, Bhawalpur, Balesore, Sarni, Bichar, 24 Pergunnas, and Chittagunge, it is reported by the Sudder Court that little progress had been made, and no progress whatever.

7. The change was completed in the Courts of the following Magistrates, and Deputy Magistrates, and, of course, of their subordinates—Shidabad, Patna, Tirhoot, Sarni, East Burdwan, Jessore, Hongky, Nuddeah, Monghyr, Bagrah, Mahla, and it was not complete in the Courts of the following Districts—Cuttock, Pore, Balesore, Bangalore, Patna, 24 Pergunnas, Rangpur, Backergunge, Muzaffarpore, Tipperah, Behar, Dinapore, Sylhet, Ban-srah, Baraset, Patna, and Ferozepore.

8. The reports show that in none of these twenty-three Districts any inconvenience is felt from the change, or none but what is trivial and temporary.

9. Nearly any progress had been made by the Magistrates of Dinca, Beerooboon, Moorshedabad, Noazally and Rajshy.

10. To those Officers whose names are noted in the margin, and who completed within the first six months this reform in their respective Districts and Deputy Districts, His Honour desires that the Sudder Court and Sudder

Let us try if we can't do a little watchmaking: our watch, e. Police, is out of order; we'll let us look at it; the wheels (Chowkeedars, &c.) are clogged and dirty; the pistons (Daroghas) are rusted and bad, and all in consequence of the weakness of the mainspring, (the Magistrate) and the poor watch can't chuff; the wonder would be (with only one mainspring in many wheels) if it could. In other words, the lower Police officers are more or less inefficient and corrupt, and the superior unable to check them.

Let us examine a little into this inefficiency and corruption. It is a common complaint, and I believe a true one, that many times known to have taken place, are not reported; or if they are, are so garbled, as to appear as crimes at all; many again are subordinated to silence and suffering; the reason is, the trouble and labour imposed on the reporter—the vexation and loss of time in attending the different offices; all the difficulties heightened, not alleviated, as much as possible by the Police, for the purpose of extortion; not to mention the bribe frequently administered by the ought-to-be-reported party. I know of no other real motive but the above, that would induce a man to neglect his duty; and they are simply interested in this, that he is, according to the present state of things, interested in the emolument. How is this to be avoided? Merely by making his interest lie the other way. Pay the Chowkeedar adequately for his labour, and make him do it; and neutralise the effects of bribes which must, at best, be uncertain, by the certainty of reward on conviction, which might be managed by a small per centage on the value of the property recovered in cases of robbing; and in others, by a proportionate reward to be taken from a fund formed from the fines in theft and similar cases, at the discretion of the Magistrate. Hitherto our management has been almost all pay punishment; rewards have been given so seldom, as never to be expected. I refer more particularly to the Chowkeedars, but the same principle of making a man's duty tally with his interest, will hold good through all ranks, as long as human nature is what it is.

After the Chowkeedars, come the Daroghas. I must here digress a little to show you these are. Remember I only refer to my own experience, which is but small. They are chosen chiefly from their appearance of bodily strength, often open-country-men, ignorant of the language in which their duty lies, and are, generally speaking, a fine able-bodied set of fellows; and their pay, 4 Rs. per month, less, or as little, as the low rate of wages we give to our own servants; yet how many experienced, well-dressed respectable young men are to be seen waiting for months together, in the hope of getting an appointment. What can be the reason? Is it to get 4 Rs. per month? Is it for the honour of serving the Shikar? No, Sir, for a much more substantial and tangible benefit. On getting an appointment, (for which I have been informed, and believe to be the case in many districts, they often give in fees to different parties as much as, or more than, four months pay,) they have the privilege of wearing that necessary instrument of extortion, a chupras. Many little know the virtue of this magic talisman. If skillfully used, it opens courts, it opens purses, it procures food, or almost anything the wearer may wish for, (as good as the "wishing cap,") rendering him more like the wolf than wories, than the guardian of the flock. Is it to his wonderment, that any one having power, should use it? On the contrary, the wonder would be if he did not. Are the advantages of this description of force greater than—are they, indeed, equivalent to its disadvantages? I unhesitatingly answer in the negative. Is even its power of protection equal to its power of oppression? Again I say, no.

In many of our Bengal districts, I know not if it be the case in all,—there are a set of people called Paliquers, who enjoy certain privileges and exemptions, for (as the Government is at present constituted) doing nothing, or next to nothing; those men, of whom there are numbers could be made available for every duty, that is now performed by Daroghas, except, perhaps, a few in the large towns, jail and treasury guards; and they might get employment by rotation, subject, of course, to the approval of the Magistrate, and get 4 Rs. per month while so employed, but no chupras: (if I had my will, I'd burn every one of 'em.) Where there are no Paliquers, Burkundances, or Sams, other equivalent must, I suppose, be entertained; but let them be paid liberally and fairly; and let them out, as they generally now are, be separated as much as possible from the people. Let them, on the contrary, be amalgamated with them as much as possible; let us remember that among the Natives of India, as well as elsewhere, the rogue and the thief are the exceptions. It is to keep these down, and not the honest, though poor man, that is the duty of the Police. Being among, and of the people, how many sources of information would be open, that are now closed. Instead of doing what they can to conceal, or at best, being silent till asked, the country people would be glad to assist their brethren, cousins, &c., in apprehending offenders, in the hope of their benefiting in return? Is there nothing to be allowed for the force of public opinion? And if the public heard that generally by the Police doing their duty, it stands to reason that they would express such an opinion, if they were not prevented by fear, or some other powerful motive. Being a portion of, and not, as now, elevated above, and separated from, their natural equals, or their own public, the *Police*men would soon find their situation dependent on the proper performance of their duty, provided always that the superior officers did theirs.

I now come to the Daroghas. Perhaps few bodies of men have been more abused: there is scarce a crime which a man in the situation has power to commit, that is not laid to their charge, in most cases, I am convinced from people taking up what they have heard from their own servants and dependents, with any equality into the truth. The story is repeated—"vires acquirit eundo," and Darogahs are often set down, without any equity into his previous character, without a little of proof, as a corrupt, conniving, bribe-seeking rascal. What is the natural consequence? Will he not sooner or later set up to his character, however undesired at first acquired, particularly if to his advantage? I do not mean to say that all do so. I mean that if they did, I for one should not wonder. There is a pitfall: keeping up one's character, whether good or bad, is the way, and means by which a Darogah has the power of increasing his salary, are to well known to require expiating on.

Let us try how we can get rid of this personification or misrepresentation of reality. There is one, in the first place, which we can change ourselves. "Blood & Iron" without iron, in the same manner, as "black & silver," when in the same circumstances. There are two ways of altering them, either by raising the rank and consequence of the Darogah, and, of course, his salary to such a pitch, that a few rascals would be subject to him, or by lowering him to what is, I think, a legitimate station; at all events, so that it would not be worth any one's while to offer him anything. I am inclined to the lowering plan, not in point of salary, but in that of power and influence, viz., bringing them into the state of merely reporting officers. Their jurisdiction also, as at present existing, is too large. Is it possible in a thickly inhabited, imperfectly roaded country like this, that one man should be cognizant of every little occurrence within twenty square miles? These should be reduced at least one-half. So much for the minor works of the watch. Let us now understand that "Honesty is the best policy," or else remove the temptation. If we do not this, we shall labour in vain; and corruption and inefficiency will continue to be the curse of our, or any other administration, wherever may be the employers. On the contrary, let self-interest and duty tally with each other, and we shall hear no more about it.

Now for the mainspring; the weakness or non-adaptation of which has been one great cause of all the works in the watch going wrong; our object must clearly be to strengthen it, and adapt it to the end required. What is the end required? A complete supervision and control of all the inferior and distant parts of the machine. How is this object to be attained? It is no possible that a European functionary, whatever energy or talent he may have for the work, can be sufficiently conversant with the Native character, to enable him to know much less to manage and we could be able to rejoice in their conversion. I expressed to them how thankful I felt that there was the first village, we had visited—that I hoped its name was a token for good, and that if they became sincere Christians—real believers in Jesus Christ, it would truly be Anna Isobah, that is, the village of joy, for Christianity was the religion of happiness and joy. But as no good could be expected without the Divine blessing, before proceeding further, I requested them to join in earnest prayer for the same, and that they might have the Spirit of God to teach them. Mr. Saunders then offered up the sacrifice of prayer and thanksgiving, and never did I see greater apparent seriousness. The poor people, prostrate on their faces, made their responses in the most solemn and audible manner.

Mr. Deerr next gave them an affectionate and earnest address upon the necessity of feeling their state as sinners, of believing in Christ, of renouncing their old habits, and of obedience to the Son of God. His subject was, “As many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ.”

“We then proceeded to the most important part, the examination of the candidates for baptism. They were questioned as to their knowledge of their own state and condition, of their responsibility to God, of the character of God, of Jesus Christ, of the way of salvation, of the obligations into which they were about to enter, and especially in reference to their motives, their expectations and their future habits. On these and other topics, they gave us satisfactory answers as could have been expected. It rather exceeded than came short of what we had looked for. Two were found deficient; one an old man of a fine open countenance could not repeat the fourth Commandment. He said he had it in his heart, but being an old man, he could not learn so rapidly as younger men could. We spoke to him with affection, but thought it better to adhere to the principle he had laid down, that the catechumens should be able to repeat the Lord’s Prayer, the Creed and the ten Commandments. I then asked the Missionary brethren if they thought “that any could forbid water that these persons should not be baptized?” It was the unanimous opinion that they ought to be received into the fold of Christ.

The solemn ordinance was then administered by the brethren present. About 151 persons I think were baptized. Krishna Mishun Hannejee by my request then addressed the newly baptized on the solemn engagements into which they had entered, printing out a hymn.

“What they had heard—2. What they now were, and—3. What their conduct in future ought to be.”

Mr. Deerr then addressed the assembly, and the blessing being pronounced, the congregation was dismissed.

Another declaration of the same service is given by Mr. Withbrecht: and both are characterized by simplicity and truth. There is no attempt to guide over any thing, or to excite any feeling but what is general and Christian. Nothing can be more just than Mr. Withbrecht’s enclosed observations. We are satisfied the work is of God—but it is of great promise—that at the same time it is attended with a small class, but in the hands of those who will deal with it truly and faithfully. May God Almighty prosper them. Mr. Withbrecht remarks:

“In conclusion, I think it proper to state, that as I do believe that there are few native converts to be found in Bengal, who embrace Christianity from the pure motive of their soul’s welfare, without any regard to temporal advantage whatever, so neither do I think that these hundreds of villagers became all Christians with the only object of their spiritual welfare in view. At the village of Irkum, the Rev. Krishna Mohan asked a poor ryot, why have you become a Christian? and he answered, because I hope God will be more favourable to me, when I worship Jesus, than when I worshipped Mahomed, for then we had nothing but trouble. In what respect do you expect greater favour from God? Answer, I shall get finer crops in my fields. Similar views and similar hopes were expressed to us on several occasions. It appears to me that great distress caused by the inundation, and the consequent entire failure of the rice crops last year, may have been the means of teaching the poor villagers to think of God and their souls. A gentleman of Calcutta who witnessed the scene of misery in the country, sent shortly afterwards a sum of money to Mr. Deerr, which he distributed for the relief of a number of Native Christian families.

“This assistance no doubt has its effect upon the people in the neighbourhood, and I can imagine hearing them say, Look these Christians are helped and preserved, these gentlemen exercise mercy and have compassion, while our animators and missionaries let us starve without mercy. This, with the previous conviction of the divine truth of Christianity, has, as I should think, been one of the reasons, that during that period such numbers came forward with a desire for baptism. As to the propriety of affording relief to people thus situated, there can be no doubt, but I must confess that this great movement having taken place at that period of distress; and the fact that a considerable sum of money and rice have been distributed for the relief of the converts, renders the ground more difficult than it would otherwise have been, and requires great prudence and circumspection in the management of the congregations. The protection of Native Christians against wrongs and oppressions on the hands of the landlords, which is a subject nearly allied to that of actual assistance afforded to them, is one of the most difficult points for a Missionary, in his care for converts, and the question whether, and how far he is justified in interfering in such temporal concerns, requires the most serious consideration. A temporal blessing is doubtless good, but I feel that over to indulge in, feeling that it is a wrong to be avoided, and that we may possibly be doing much. Prompt and energetic action of the natives is to be encouraged. To obtain this effect, it appears to me that three distinct Missions at least, should be appointed for the superintendence of the Kishnagar Mission, the two first to provide for the spiritual wants of the congregations, and the third for the education of the children of the Native Christians. The villages may conveniently be divided into two parts, viz. the eastern and western district. The Missionary placed over the eastern district, should have a convenient bungalow erected for himself in some well situated village. Chakpara, which is a very populous place with well supplied bazaar, would, in my opinion, be a very suitable place. The Missionary who takes the western district under his care might reside at Kishnagar, but a situation nearer the villages would enable him to be more among his flock. The Missionary at the station should establish a seminary of fifty hopeful boys, chosen from the congregations, who must be brought up for Catechists, Readers, &c. This is an engagement of vital importance, and never was there a finer opening for such an undertaking than here, where hundreds of children lately brought into the fold of Christ are waiting to receive Christian education. Besides the station seminary, school houses for the sons and daughters of the Native Christians ought to be erected at every village, where forty or fifty children may conveniently be brought together. Mr. Deerr has already collected a number of children for education in his promises, but they want no commitments, superintendence, and a fatherly and mother’s care in every respect. The men, however, will, as I said before, be not capable of such an extensive undertaking. The Missionary also expects that the seminary should, on Sundays, perform Divine Service before the residents of the station, and raise an interest in the work among the European and East Indian community in the neighbourhood. If effectual in doing this he will find in time, the mission at Kishnagar may, in the judgment of the directors of humane efforts, and zealous laborers, present a harvest more promising than we have yet heard of in this part of the British Empire in the East.”

MISSIONARY AND EDUCATIONAL MOVEMENTS.—Since our last, the Rev. A. F. LACROIX and family have returned to their trip up the country, with improved health.—The Rev. J. Kennedy and Dr. Summers, of the London Society, have proceeded to Bonates, Dr. S. Latham (D. V.) to study Hindustani for the purpose of preaching to the Mussulmans in Calcutta, and will return after he has acquired the language.—We are happy to hear that our Baptist brethren expect a reinforcement of the brethren next cold season.—The Rev. Mr. Lawrence, of Huzar, has returned to Manglayr to assist the Rev. Mr. Leslie.—Mr. E. E. E. formerly of Akyon, has returned to Chittagong.—The strength of the Bombay Mission has been increased by the arrival, during the past month, of three additional agents, Mr. J. Mrs. Robertson, of the Church Missionary Society, and Mr. Reul, of the Church of Scotland’s Mission. Mr. Robertson is to be engaged, we believe, in the Money School; and Mr. Reul is to act as a superintendent of Gajrahat Female School. Few circumstances can be more satisfactory to every philanthropist than the brightening prospects connected with a Christian education in this Presidency. May these various movements be according to the joint of the Spirit.—Calcutta Christian Observer, April.

BAPTISM OF A NATIVE YOUTH.—It affords us much pleasure to announce the Baptism of another Hindu youth connected with the General Assembly’s Institution. He was a pupil in the First Class in that excellent Institution, and had been for some time under very serious impressions. For many months he had been subject to the persecution of his friends for religiousness’ sake; notwithstanding this he steadily persisted in the good way, and on the eighth of last month presented himself as a candidate for Baptism, which ceremony was performed by the Rev. D. Ewari, at the Mission House, Simla, in the presence of the members of the Scottish Mission. We rejoice at this additional token of the Divine favour resting on the Institution. May this youth be the first-fruits of many from the same class, and may he stand fast in Christ to the end.—Ibid.

EMERIT OF HINDOO YESSIESSES TO CHRISTIANITY.—To the Editors of the Calcutta Christian Observer.—DEAR SIRS,—You are aware that a pupil in the Assembly’s Institution, in Cornwallis Square, by name Mahendra Lal, was baptised some fifteen days back, on his profession of faith in the Lord Jesus Christ; a profession of the perfect sincerity of which the pious and excellent Missionaries who conducted that admirable establishment were abundantly satisfied to fore they acceded to his request for admission into the Christian Church. It may be amusing and not uninteresting to some of your readers to perceive a translation of some Suggeri Verses which appeared in the Native newspaper, called the Samudra-Pubbakar or Samudra-nagara of the 11th instant, a few days following the baptism. It is as follows:—

“Hail! Hail! that artilles those Missionaries employ! A child has turned aside to join in the praises of Jesus! The (missionary, much-spoken, noted-by-many, kind, &c.) teachers go down from place to place with the tones of (perfect) kindness (to ensure their victims). Alas! what can I say of that our Mahendra Lal, of this noble birth, was misled through a fatal delusion of his mother’s teaching. (Yet) it is not to be greatly regretted, for first, he was but a child; secondly, of the good water (baptism); and so (the priest) (baptized him) Dr. P. (but he lost his case for ever! Yet how much had his misguided parent laboured to convince his mind (of the falsity of the course he saw him inclined to pursue)! But notwithstanding all, the lawless devil (left his hand) and has not returned! Then his mother—oh, too, beholding her beloved child no more, as though she were entreating and alluring him (to come back to her) exclaims with her wailings, Oh come, my sweet Gopal, my darling, my jewel of a child, my moon-faced! Come! come and eat curries and cream and butter, and play about in the courtyard just as you will. Oh go not to pasture the cows and the herd of the heterodox and apostate! Ah me! I die! my child in his tender youth has forsaken Krishna (or the dark) and now in the black waters of Drum. Ah my sweet one, you cannot then have any relief for the hands of the heterodox, nor joy to slip through that month with which thou hast want to eat savory condiments and cakes and sweetmeats!”

“But—when sorrow is written by the tears upon the forehead, who can escape it? So when the sun’s wings appear, they are but the precursor of its destruction! I once told his now mourning parent,—let your darling go with the child (to guard and feed him). What arguments can that wretched wretch of a Missionary have employed to entice him? Where is Gopal now, now that he has left Mathura?”

The slave is as dearly loved as possible. It may be well, for the benefit of such as may not have much acquaintance with Sanskrit, to explain, Kṛishna, to denote that Gopal is the cow-herd (also the guardian of the world) from Gṛ = cow, or the earth, and pa = a herd or preserver, is one of the names of Krishna, the popular deity of Bengal, who is estimated an incarnation of Vishnu, whose gambles with the gṛ (cow) or milk-maid, are celebrated in the current songs of the country and are commemorated in the ritual sports of the annual Hindu festival. Thence the word gṛ is used by Bengalee mothers as a term of endearment in addressing their male children, as exemplified above. There is a play upon the word gṛ in line 19 of the translation, where it is first applied as a proper name to the deluded son—herd of Mathura, and then as an adjective to the waters of Christian baptism. Its etymological meaning is dark, deep blue, the colour with which the images of Krishna are often painted, and also the colour of the deep sea or all pain, to which the baptismal element is compared, as destructive of the case, &c., of the baptized. The word gṛ, however, may also be taken to mean the sentiment of devotion, which when referring to the Divine Saviour of the Gospel, is designated as dark, gloomy, and destructive, in this poetic composition. Observe also, that gṛ or gṛ Mathura was the birth-place and early residence of Krishna; it is a town in the province of Agra and a place of pilgrimage to the Hindus. In assuming Krishna’s fatal destruction as consequent upon his abandoning Mathura, the author applies his name of Gopal to the neophyte Christian (as his mother had done in her endearment) and hints his similar ruin is inevitable. The phraseology, &c., is characteristic, and so far interesting. The reference to Dr. Duff and his baptismal tub will not escape observation.

Such wretched trifles are a fair specimen of the abusive doggerel directed against the Missionaries, with which the Native Bengalee newspapers are often filled.

CISTREXESSIS.

To the Editor of the Cynosurus.

Sir,—From a report in the Record Harbar of the 14th instant, it appears that a Hindu lad of about sixteen years of age, of the Byasak family, formerly a pupil in the General Assembly’s School, has recently re-inquired the faith of his progenitors, and renounced that of his rulers; and that notwithstanding his father’s desisting every means to take him from the net of conversion, the boy refused to accept his father’s offer. I, Mr. Editor, very strongly disapprove of Mr. Duff’s plan of instruction. It is a glaring injustice to adopt such a measure under the cloak of admitting a child freely, and that of involving English education at the choice of the teacher, the dangerous tendency, infusing gospel in the mind of students in the course of their ordinary tuition, is evident. The boy not only neglects associating with the class to which he originally belonged, and thereby withholds from hearing any principles of his own caste; but, on the contrary, avails himself of taking free intercourse with the missionaries and others, who hardly forget their accustomed duty to bring up their associates into Christian religion, by enlightening his mind with the repeated lectures of the scripture. So that neither the boys who embrace Christianity are directly at variance with the opinion of their parents or guardians, nor the missionaries and others who lead them to that branch of religion can be so blameable as the parents themselves, who, knowing that many youths have already on their being taught closely in the English fashion, forsaken their ancestral faith at their own accord, do not fear at all to deliver their children again into the same hands, knowing very well that at the time they deliver them for English education they surely consign their sons, decidedly inferring that who are destined to become outward pursuants to their heavenly fathers, and consequently all attempts at preservation, i. e. keeping them and from the seminary where a religious study is commonly imparted to his pupils, or re-entraining with them when they are too apt to feast their mind with no other religion but the one which they are taught in by their tutor, is fruitless. If so doing they are to put their parents and relations to the deepest grief of mortification.

Yours obediently,

Culcutta, March 13, 1839.

POPERY IN THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.—The following is extracted from the Bishop of Chester’s recent charge:—“Many subjects present themselves, to whom I might be tempted to direct your thoughts. One more especially concerns the Church at present; it comes it is daily assuming a more serious and alarming aspect, and threatens a rival to the worst evils of the Romish system. Under the specious pretence of deference to antiquity, and respect for primitive models, the foundations of our Protestant Church are undermined by men who dwell within her walls, and those who sit in the Reformer’s seat are traducing the Reformation. It is as if the coming matter of question were that the Bible is sufficient to make man wise, to sanctify him, and to give him eternal life, and that no other revelation by faith, is both equally and utterly useless; and the spiritualists of the mystic of God are instructed to raise the truths which they have been ordained to dispute, and to hide under a hidden their doctrine which the apostles were commanded to preach to every creature. It is not from any feelings of favour towards these new doctrines that I do not add my voice to the warnings which have been a ready refuge, and able refuge, against them. It is rather because I sincerely believe that the voice of warning, however loudly it is raised, is not heeded by you. We may read in a temple of the Lord, and in the most solemn duties, that the doctrine of a Christ and that in which we are nurtured, leaves us thus far from the end of endless generations, and questions which are not of godly edifying. We have too much to do with realities to be drawn aside by shadows.”

The Dissenters of London have formed the Mitropolis Chapel Fund Association, to supply the increasing population of London with additional means of religious instruction. The amount of Donations in the beginning of January was upwards of £5,400. A Chapel capable of accommodating 1,261 persons has been erected in Lambeth, and another has been purchased near the Regent’s Park; both of which were to be opened for public worship in January.

SCIENTIFIC.

The letter of Professor Forbes in a noticed a remarkable spring, about a mile from Kilsingen, Basaria, which had occupied much of his attention, and of which he will probably at a future time draw up a detailed account. It is a krise spring, having 3 per cent. of salt, rising in a bore 225 Bavarian feet deep, in red sandstone; but he understands that the water flows at about 280 feet in depth. Its temperature is never less than 64°; the mean temperature of springs near being only 50 to 52°. It discharges carbonic acid gas in volumes almost unexampled, keeping the water, in a shaft eight feet deep, in a state resembling turbulent ebullition. The enormous supply of gas led to its use in gas baths, for which purpose it is carried off by a tube connected with a large inverted funnel, which rests upon the water. It contains scarcely a trace of nitrogen. It is conducted into chambers properly prepared, and thence into baths, in which it lies by its weight, and is used as water would be. But the most remarkable feature will remain. About five or six times a day the discharge of gas suddenly stops; in a few seconds the surface of the well is calm. The flow of water, amounting to forty cubic feet per minute, also stops, or rather

EDITORIAL ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.—Within the last fortnight our circulation has attained an extent, which, in the commencement of our labours, it seemed presumption to anticipate. Our paying subscribers now exceed five hundred; and we, therefore, feel constrained to return our grateful thanks for the generous patronage which has placed us in so agreeable a position. It has cost us no small exertion, then in circumstances the most trying, to furnish the quantity of weekly entertainment for our friends; and whilst we could not be wanting in gratitude to them for the approbation with which they have cheered our toil, we would much less be forgetful of that gracious Providence by which we have been permitted so long to continue our humble efforts for the public good. We can declare with a good conscience, that in looking forward to the farther prosecution of this undertaking, we hold every consideration to be a trifle, compared with the opportunity we possess of reprobat- ing what is evil, and advocating what is good. As our pa- triotic friends in public regard, we trust it will continue to rise in genuine worth. We shall spare no pains to enlarge and enrich it from time to time, so as to make it increasing- ly valuable; and shall be happy to receive the suggestions of our friends, respecting any thing by which they think its usefulness would be increased. It is, of course, to our own wisdom we look as the proper sphere of our influence, and in which we expect support: yet all the divisions of India are linked together by many common interests, and the ties which bind our Native Land by the closest relations. We have, therefore, much satisfaction in finding our paper acceptable in all directions, that as many as 46 copies are required for Madras, 14 for Bombay, and 13 for England; and a proportionate supply for China, the Straits, the Cape, and North America. May we be found worthy the continuance of so much favour.

Perhaps we are hasty in courtesy to say, we are grateful to our friend of the Harbourn, for the kind expressions with which he noticed, what the Commercial Advertiser would, possibly, call our widowed state. Certain it is, we cannot be insensible to any tribute of honour or sympathy, offered to the friend and colleague with whom it has been our hap- piness to be so long associated, and to whom this paper owes its reputation. But for ourselves, we should have felt most flattered, could his absence have passed away un- known and unsuspected. Mr. Marshman left us ten days ago, by the Katerpiller, for a short respite from the duties he has pressed too heavily upon him. The voyage is only to Madras, and will occupy but a few days. We wish, for his sake, it had been farther.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON PRISON DISCIPLINE.—The appointment of the Prison Discipline Committee was one of the beneficial measures, for which India was indebted to Lord William Bentinck. The public order under which it was formed, bears date the 2d January, 1836. It was a new year's gift of surpassing value. The gentlemen selected by His Lordship for the task, were every way worthy of it: and it is melancholy to think how many of them are already lost to the country, either by death or retirement. They were the Hon. Henry Shakespeare, (dead), the Hon. Sir Edward Ryan, the Hon. T. B. Macaulay, (returned to England), the Hon. Sir J. P. Grant, the Hon.

Sir B. H. Malkin, (dead), C. H. Cameron, Esq., John Macpherson McLeod, Esq., G. W. Anderson, Esq., Frederick Millett, Esq., C. Barwell, Esq., (dead), W. H. Macnaughten, Esq., D. Macfarlan, Esq., C. E. Trevelyan, Esq., (absent,) and John Peter Grant, Esq., who was Secretary to the Com- mittee.

The Report of the Committee was given in, after the re- searches and deliberations of two years, on the 8th of Janu- ary, 1838, and was published by order of the Council of India more than six months ago. How we come to let it lie by us so long, we cannot explain. We had the clear impression that it had been fully noticed in our columns, and were only convinced of the contrary, by a careful ex- amination of our file. It is certainly a document that re- quires no meagre notice. The statistical information it contains, is of very great importance, and will be of much use, even though no systematic practical reforms should be immediately based upon it.

The object of the Committee was two-fold: first, by ex- tensive and minute inquiry to exhibit the present system of our Indian Prison Discipline, and then to suggest the re- medy for its evils. But as there is a foreign and very dis- tinct branch of our system, occasioned by the penalty of transportation, the Report is arranged under three heads. First, is the description of the present system, which in- cludes, besides an examination of the method of treating prisoners, and its effects, an account of the number, size, and cost of the Goals in India; the number of prisoners at present confined in them, compared with an estimate of the population of each Presidency; and the average yearly cost of a prisoner under each of the different subordinate Governments; and, under the several heads of this description, there are needed suggestions of such improvements, as might be introduced without any general change of the present system itself. Secondly, the Committee present a description of the system under which the punishment of transportation is now inflicted, with few recommendations of improvements in small points of detail; their general opinions upon the question of transportation, and the plan of a new system under which they recommend the future infliction of that punishment. Lastly, the Report closes with propounding an entirely new plan of Prison Discipline for the Goals on the Continent of India, with an explana- tion of the opinions, according to which it has been framed. We shall confine our attention this week, to the first division of the Report, or the existing system of Prison Discipline, on the Continent of India.

The Committee set out with the unparing declaration, that the present system is "essentially such as the Govern- ment is imperatively required, by every consideration of justice and policy, thoroughly to reform." And they continue so consistently in this commendatory mood, as never to appear remedied to any remedy, short of the entirely new system they have to propose. Yet, as became men with so grave a matter to treat of, they have not yielded to any prejudiced or passionate quarrelsomeness, to any exag- geration of actual evil, or disregard of the good intentions and considerate provisions to be found in the existing system: and for this they are the more likely to be listened to. Their view of the present state of our Prison Discipline is thus expressed, by way of conclusion from the details:

MEDICAL MISSIONARY SOCIETY'S HOSPITAL.

First report of the Medical Missionary Society's Hospital at Macao, for the quarterly term beginning 5th July, and ending 1st October, 1838. By the Rev. P. Parker, M. D.

In accordance with a desire expressed at a general meeting of the Society in May last, the Hospital at Macao was opened on the 5th July. Previous engagements to return to Canton, and the absence of any other medical gentlemen to take charge of the establishment, rendered it necessary temporarily to close it on the 1st of October. It is with great pleasure that the report for this term is now submitted to the Society and its friends.

Often has the sincerest gratitude been felt towards the benevolent members of this Society, who have procured such an asylum for the afflicted Chinese and to the respected President, by whose judgement the spot was selected, when, walking through its capacious and numerous apartments,—I have witnessed the comfortable accommodation afforded the inmates, to many of whom it seemed almost a palace, in comparison with the narrow cells which they call their homes. The building is capable of accommodating two hundred patients. It has nineteen spacious rooms on the second story, well ventilated; and as many corresponding ones on the ground floor; a garden, and extensive compound with three wells of water—the rear; and a yard in front. The building is of brick, strongly built; and the whole of the ground (say a third of an acre) is owing to it, is surrounded by a substantial wall. It is in a healthy locality, overlooking the inner harbour, and has good access both by land and water.

It is delightful to contemplate the yearly augmenting relief that may here be afforded to the suffering Chinese. It is encouraging and encouraging to regard the facilities that here exist, for the instruction of the young men of China in the principles of rational medicine and surgery. May the institution prosper every way—may there be no lack of men to conduct its operations or of means to support and increase its usefulness—may it be the fruitful parent of many like institutions, under the conduct of Chinese, who shall have acquired the skill and science of the west, and shall have imbibed the benevolence and purity of the gospel.

Seven hundred patients were received into the Hospital during the term, towards the close of which many had to be sent away, from the inexpediency of receiving them for a few days only. Fewer important surgical cases present themselves, in proportion to the whole number, than had previously been the case at Canton. With a few exceptions, the task of giving the confidence of the people had to be commenced de novo. The suspicion and reserve at first manifested were greater than even at Canton. The arrival, however, as patients, of gentlemen from Canton, and occasional visits of some who had been cured there, and others personally acquainted with previous operations, tended very much to alter the feelings of the people. An unexpected auxiliary in effecting this change was found, too, in society of their idols, who, according to the interpretations of the Chinese priests, encouraged a large number of their votaries to apply to the foreign physician with assurance of success.—Chinese Repository for December.

RELIGIOUS.

1. BOMBAY ACHARYAT BIBLE SOCIETY.—The following are extracts from the last report, a document which shows that the great work of translating and circulating the Scriptures is vigorously advancing in this Presidency.

1. Of the Morathi translation of the First Book of Samuel by the Rev. D. O. Dixon, which was alluded to in the last report, as under the review of the Committee for translations, an edition of 1500 copies has been printed and published.

Several of the Historical Books of the Old Testament, as translated by Mr. Graves, are in the hands of the Committee. The opinions of eleven Marathi scholars having been solicited on the comparative merits of the versions of the Book of Psalms, by Messrs. Graves and Dixon, it was unanimously resolved by the Committee, "that Messrs. Graves and Dixon be respectfully requested to make a revision of their respective versions, availing themselves of the hints furnished by the letters not read, and such correspondence with the Committee for translations as they may choose to intimate; and the Society publish 25000 copies of their versions when so revised, leaving the question of future reprint to future consideration." It was agreed, that communicating the preceding resolution to Messrs. Graves and Dixon, the Secretary should warmly thank them in the name of the Society, for their past labours in the translation of the Divine Word.

The printing of the translation of the Prophetic Book of Mr. Dixon, has been completed during the past year; and 1500 copies of Ezekiel, Daniel, and the minor Prophets have been published.

It has been resolved to publish 25000 copies of the Book of Genesis according to the last edition, with verbal alterations, which may appear manifest improvements to the members of the translation Committee in Bombay; and to permit the American Mission to add to the edition, for the American Bible Society, such a number of copies as may be required, paying according to the proportion of the whole.

The improved translation of the first Epistle to the Corinthians by the Rev. James Mearns, after undergoing the usual criticism of the Committee for translations, was published shortly after the annual meeting. The translation of the second Epistle by the same missionary, is at present in the hands of the Committee. A revision of Mr. Graves's version is now going on, in the hope that a comparison may be found useful.

The review of the translation of the Gospel according to St. John, by Dr. Wilson, is proceeding; and a small reprint of the old translation, has been ordered upon, to meet present necessities.

A revised translation of the Epistle to the Galatians, by Mr. Graves, is proceeding through the press.

A new translation or revision of the Hebrews, by the Rev. T. Nesbitt, has been put into the hands of the Committee for translations.

2. The only portion of the Scriptures in Gujarathi which has been printed during the past year, is the revised edition of the Gospel according to St. Mark, of which 8000 copies have been published.

3. In order of the last reports of the Society, the authorities of the supply of Protestant Scriptures for the British Islands have been taken into consideration, and it has been decided to form two classes of work. A list of books to procure, expected a new edition, or revision of the New Testament, was thus made up, and embraced by this Assembly.

The Rev. Mr. Bygones in a letter to Dr. Wilson, thus writes: "I herewith enclose a copy of the programme of our translation, or rather revision of the New Testament in Urdu, and shall feel much obliged by your laying it before the Committee of the Bible Society, as we are anxious to bring our version to as high a state of improvement as we can, before we finally give it out of our hands into those of the Bible Society."

We resolved on publishing one or two editions on our own responsibility; and to give a list of the remarks of our friends, to enable us to make our amendments as they seem desirable, and more mature deliberation. On this we did not wish to offer to work to the Bible Society, but have proceeded with the first edition in the press, taking all remarks on ourselves; intending that when the version shall have received our subsequent correction, to hand it over to them entirely. This plan was mentioned by the Directors of the London Missionary Society, and to the officers of the British and Foreign Bible Society, by whom it was approved. They also promised to reimburse any expenses that might be incurred when once the work shall have been presented to them with the advantages of the proposed revision. The subject has also been mentioned to the Committee of the Calcutta Bible Society; and they have agreed to take a part of our first edition of the version, at the cost price, without pledging themselves to the final adoption or claiming any right to make any alterations in it.

My object then in writing, is to enquire if the Committee of the Bombay Bible Society will take a number of copies on the same terms as the Calcutta Society, viz. at prime cost. Our object in this undertaking is stated in the prospectus along with a specimen of the type, &c. How far the language may correspond with the Hindustani of Bombay, I am not aware. We have endeavoured, as far as we could, to use only such words and idioms as seemed to us to be in general use over most of India; but of course we do not pretend to be able to divide author-

SUBSTITUTE FOR THE SUN.—The newly-invented light of M. Gandin, on which experiments were recently made at Paris, is a modification of the invention of Lieut. Drummond. While Drummond pours a stream of oxygen gas through spirals of wire, upon unskilled light, Gandin makes use of a more efficient kind of oxygen, and the conductors through burning of course of the Sun. The Drummond light is fifteen hundred times stronger than that of burning gas; the Gandin light is, we are assured by the inventor, as strong as that of the sun, or thirty thousand times stronger than gas, and, of course, ten times more so than the Drummond. The method by which M. Gandin proposes to turn the new invention to use is singularly striking. He proposes to erect in the island of the Port Neuf, in the middle of the Seine, and centre of Paris, a light house, five hundred feet high, in which is to be placed a light from a hundred thousand to a million gas-jets, struck, the power to be varied as the nights are light or dark. Paris will then enjoy a sort of perpetual day; and as soon as the sun of the heavens has set, the sun of the Port Neuf will rise.—Moniteur Magazine.

A TRANSPARENT WATCH.—A Watch has been presented to the Academy of Science at Paris, constructed of very peculiar materials, the parts being principally formed of rock crystal. It was made by M. Liebigier, and is small in size. The internal works are visible; the two wheels which carry the hands are rock crystal, the other wheels of metal, to prevent accidents from the breaking of the springs. All the screws are fixed in crystal, and all the axles turn on rubies. The escapement is of sapphire, the balance-wheel of rock crystal, and its springs of gold. The regularity of this watch as a time-keeper is attributed by the maker to the feeble expansion of the rock crystal in the balance-wheel, &c. The construction of the whole seems to have carried to perfection the art of cutting precious stones has been carried to modern times.—Ibid.

COST OF RAIL-ROADS.—The cost of the Manchester and Liverpool railway was $3,000,000 per mile; of the Dublin and Kingstown, $1,000,000; of the French, about 15,000,000; and in America, from 2,000,000 to 3,000,000.—Ibid.

MEHMET ALI'S MONOPOLY SYSTEM.—From 1812 to 1813 the population of Egypt was reckoned at between 2,500,000 and 3,000,000 souls; it now amounts scarcely to 1,800,000. According to the learned members of the French expedition, 4,000,000 fedules of land were cultivated; since the monopoly only 3,000,000 are under cultivation. From 1812 to 1820 the French consumed 20,000,000 lbs. of cotton were produced; the quantity is now reduced to 10,000,000.—Ibid.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A PROPHET SHAWL.—In busy Oriental MSS. may be met with elaborately-painted representations of celebrated processions; but one of the most curious lately fell under the observation of the author. In the possession of a Hungarian lady of high rank is a magnificent shawl, woven in the looms of Persia, and perfectly unique, the border of which exhibits in all its details one of these triumphal processions. Nothing is omitted; the trains of the camels and Arab horses fully equipped, the elephants and palanquins, the troops and musketeers, and the countless attendants swelling the ranks of some mighty chief—all are there. One compartment offers to the view a series of lamentable scenes, in which figure the rhinoceros, the tiger, and leopard; the gazelle of various sizes, the rabbit, and "such small deer," with pursuing dogs, hunters, and keepers winding their horns on horse and foot. All this is woven in the most delicate hues and most exquisite colours, with a general accuracy of outline and correctness of design quite admirable, forming a combination of forms and hues which blend into a whole of surpassing beauty and harmony.—Fraser.

SUICIDE FROM INACTIVITY WITH WEALTH.—On Saturday, an inquest was held at Mr.ley's hotel, Trafalgar-square, on the body of Horatio Largett, Esq., law solicitor to the Commissioners of King's Taxes, who committed suicide on Wednesday. Mr. Kyrle, surgeon of St. Martin's lane, stated that about two o'clock on Wednesday last, he was called to attend the deceased at the above hotel, and found him in bed with his throat cut. Witness dressed the wound, and he appeared very anxious to live. In a short time afterwards he asked for pen, ink, and paper, and wrote a letter to his wife, stating that he was unwell, but should return home in a day or two. He then folded, sealed, and directed it himself. Mr. Horatio, senior surgeon of Charing-cross Hospital, continued to attend him until two o'clock on Thursday, when he died from loss of blood. John Wilkin, Esq., of No. 10, Spring-gardens, and Receiver-General of Wales, deposed that he had known the deceased for nearly forty years. He was married, and had a wife and family. He was in the habit of frequently coming up to town from North, and invariably on those occasions dined with witness. After dinner, if they were alone, he would complain to witness that he was the most wretched man in existence for the want of active employment. He was pensioned in 1833, on an allowance of £6,500 per annum. Deceased was 64 years of age, and a man of temperate habits. Verdict—"Temporary Insanity."—Post.

DEATH OF JOSEPH LANEVATER.—Extract of a Letter from New York, dated Oct. 26, 1838, addressed to W. C. Cress, Esq.—"It is my painful task to communicate to you the sudden death of your much valued friend, Joseph Lanevater, on the 23rd inst. He was run over in a street of this city, his leg broken, and his head very much lacerated. I was with him after the accident, and his friend, William Wagstaff, a Quaker formerly of England, administered every comfort to him. He died on the 23rd inst., without a struggle, full of faith. His friend Wagstaff says:—(On the last Sabbath, before meeting he held, he was more like an angel than a mortal. He might the prayer he offered by us who witnessed it, to be the death of the righteous."—Post.

HEREDITARY WICKEDNESS.—The following remarkable case was tried at the quarter session for the county of Warwick, last Tuesday:—John Seacroft, aged 77, John Seacroft, his son, aged 50, and Levi Seacroft, son of the last-mentioned John, aged 14, were tried and convicted of stealing at Stratford, on the 2nd of November last, an ass, the property of Arthur Gregory, Esq. They were sentenced to three months imprisonment. It appeared that they were phlegmatic, or tramping tinkers. The grandfather looked the worse for his years. He was a powerful-looking man, apparently not 40 years of age. The grandson was also a powerful youth.—Ibid.

LEISURE.—The best man in the world for doing to others are those who have nothing to do. Busy men make no time for their leisure; and the less leisure they have, the more they make of that little. They almost unconsciously turn to work; they never have, in fact, any leisure at all; since leisure is an occasional freedom from certain habitual duties; and the so-called man of leisure, having no such duty, is only industriously idle, and full of vacancy all the days of his life.—Fraser.

THE PARIS NATIONAL GUARD has had three Centinels sent-General since 1830.—The first, General Lafayette, secretly held on horseback; two or three servants were kept to get him upon his charger, and when he was in the saddle his friends were in perpetual fear of his falling from it. Three last months of his command he found his morning hours open carriage. The second, Marshal Lobau, was as modest in the stirrups, but so dead that he had infinitely more to interfere blunders. The third and present monarch, Marshal Gerard, rides tolerably, and knows well; but as short-statured that he cannot dismount a centinel from a horse at a distance of ten paces.—Post.

JANUARY TUN.—PLOUGH MONDAY.—The first Monday after Twelfth-day is called Plough Monday, because it was a first day after Christmas that Irishmen resumed the plough in some parts of the country, and especially in the north, to draw the plough in procession to the doors of the villages and towns-people, by 30 or 40 men, stripped to their cloths and shirts, but protected from the weather by wattlework beneath. Their arms and shoulders are decorated with gay-coloured ribbons, tied in large knots and bows, and their hats are surmounted in the same way. They are usually accompanied by an old man, or a boy dressed up to represent one; she is called Hog-dog, and called the Booby. Sometimes the sport is added of a humorous countryman to represent a fool. He is covered with ribbons, and striped in skins, with a double-headed tail, and carries a box to collect money from the spectators. They are attacked by male, and Morris-dancers when they can be got; but there is always a sportive dance, with a few lasses wearing all their finery, with a superabundance of ribbons. When this merriment is well managed, it is very pleasing. The money collected is spent at night. Formerly little was done in the field at this season, and according to "Tusser Reliquies," during the Christmas holidays, gentlemen feasted the farmer, and every farmer feasted his servants and taskmen. Thus Plough Monday reminded them of their business, and in the morning of that day the men and maids strove who should finish their reapers, commenced the labours of the year by riding the earliest. If the ploughmen could get their whip, his plough-staff, harrow, or any field implement, by the fire-side before the maid could set her kettle on, she lost her Shrove-tide cock to the men. Thus our forefathers strive to allure youth to their duty, and provided them innocent mirth as well as labour. On Plough Monday night the farmer gave them a good supper and strong ale. In some places, where the parish was too small to make a Plough Monday, if, on his return at night, he came with his whip to the kitchen-latch, and cried "Cock in a pot," before the maid could cry "Cock on the dunghill," he gained a cock for Shrove Tuesday.—Ibid.

EXAMINERS OF CANDIDATES FOR HAILEYBURY COLLEGE.—The Board of Commissioners for the affairs of India have appointed the Rev. Thomas Dale, M.A., Professor of English literature at King's College, London; the Rev. Robt. Eden, M.A., late Fellow of Corpus Christi, Oxford; and T. H. Key, Esq., M.A., Professor of Latin Literature at University College, London, to be examiners of Candidates for admission at Halliwell College for the ensuing term.—Put.

A NEW NORMAN.—A German writer observes, that in England there is such a scarcity of thieves, that they are obliged to seek a reward for their services.—Idiot Magician.

EX-TORUS CORKAGE.—We snail a week or two ago, in speaking of the ex-torus-clerk of Norwich, (who has saddled each of the members of the new corporation with a debt of 5,000*l.*), we forgot, through his litigation, that ex-torus-clerks are ex-acted-clerks all the world over: since then our remark has met with abundant confirmation. Witness the doings of the worthy ex of Poole, respecting whose conduct the Galeshead Observer says:—“While in three years the liberal Town-council of Loderley have nearly wiped off the debt bequeathed to them by their predecessors, and at the same time increased the moral income accruing from the town-estate, the notorious Town-council of Poole have reduced themselves to a miserable plight. Having given this old town-clerk a head for 4,500*l.* by way of compensation for the loss of an office which, according to his own showing, he had voluntarily resigned, and the worthy functionary, having, in consequence, lost his money, he commenced an action, and obtained judgment against his ancient friends; and the ruthless rogue, entering the town-hall, has swept off all the mayors, including even the easy chairs of the aldermen, the punch-bowl, the mayor's throne, the maces, the keys, cocked hats, and sergeants' breeches!”—Leicester Mercury.

MR. MERRAN, DE DOCAI, a distinguished member of the National Convention, formerly Attorney-General of the Court of Cassation, a member of the Institute, and one of the framers of the civil code, died in Paris, on the 36th Dec. In the 84th year of his age.—Put.

DORCHESTER.—Last week some workmen engaged in lowering the top of the bell in Fordington, brought to light some curious remains of antiquity. Many skeletons were discovered, lying in various positions; but the most interesting was a skeleton found beneath a house. Round the neck, which was that of a female, was a necklace of beads of glass and amber, composed of very fine fine disks and in which was appended an oval, about an inch and a-half in diameter, and nearly spherical, beautifully turned out of the Kilmarderie oval; on the right arm was a bracelet of the same material, elegantly turned, ornamented, and highly polished. Near the head was an urn of red ink ware, slightly conical at the exterior, about seven inches high, and about the same in diameter at the mouth, with another smaller one at the neck, and of somewhat red ink ware and manufacture, and the remains of a lacustrine of the red Samian ware, of elegant form and proportion.—Ibid.

MR. GIBBS.—UNIVERSITY COLLEGE HOSPITAL.—Dr. Gibson has resigned the Chair of Practical Medicine in the University College. The circumstances which led to this refer to the exhibitions of Animal Magnetism in the Hospital of the College, where the Professor was accustomed to display the influences of the girls, named O'Key. The medical journals have taken up the tricks, while Dr. Gibson's warmest friends have very severely deplored his adherence to such doctrines. The Professors of the University had a strong feeling as to the teachers of the evil powers, and the Council of the Institution have, in consequence, ordered Dr. Gibson to resign his Hospital. Dr. E., regarding this proceeding as an insult, resigned.—Ibid.

INSURANCE OF THE LIVES OF COWS.—The insurance of the lives of men and women has been for some time becoming more and more prevalent; but a society for insuring the lives of cows is a decided novelty in this country. Such institutions have been found productive of great good in Scotland, and we are glad to observe that it was resolved a few days ago, at Arncliffe, to establish a mutual Insurance Society, to ensure the cows of Widdows, in Northumberland. A small sum like two shillings and sixpence, as a subscription, from each member half-yearly, is deemed sufficient to cover the risks, with the contributions made gratuitously to the society by the neighbouring landowners and gentry.—Tyne Mercury.

A NATIVE.—The Hertfordshire peasants are notorious for their want of civility. A lady, while on a visit to a friend residing in the county, laid, during her rides on horseback in the neighbourhood, become perfectly aware of the boresomeness of the peasantry. One day, when riding unattended, she came to a by-gate of her host's park, which had not a lodge. A clubby boy was sleeping to and fro upon it. She ventured to beg that he would hold it open while she passed. To her utter amazement he did so! Delighted with his complacency, she gave him a shilling, observing, “It is quite clear, my lad, from your civility, that you are not a native of Hertfordshire.” The reply was this—“Thee art a liar—I be!”—Put.

THE WHIGS, OF LANCASHIRE.—The eldest son (John Wood) has been returned member of Parliament for Preston several times, and proved himself a steady supporter of civil and religious liberty. A laughable circumstance once took place upon a trial in Lancashire, where the head of the family, Mr. Wood, senior, was examined as a witness. Upon giving his name, Uniford Wood, the judge, addressing the reverend person, said, “Pray, Mr. Wood, how do you spell your name?” The old gentleman replied—

O double T
I double T
Double I
Double O D.

Upon which the astonished lawyer laid down his pen, saying it was the most extraordinary name he had ever met with in his life, and, after two or three attempts, declared he was unable to record it. The Court was convulsed with laughter.—Gardiner's Misc.

CHINESE BOOKS.—In cheap printing, the Chinese are our superiors; as in consequence of their simple method of impression, the whole apparatus of printer in that country consists of his galleys, blocks, and presses. There he may shudder, and travel from place to place, purchasing paper and lamp-black as he needs them; and purchasing a table anywhere, he may throw off his estimate by the hundred or the score, as he is able to dispose of them. Their paper is thin but cheap; two sheets of demy size costing only one halfpenny. This, connected with the low price of labour, enables the Chinese to furnish books in each other far next to nothing. The books of King-fu-wei, comprising six volumes, and amounting to four hundred leaves octavo, may be purchased for ninepence, and the historical novel of “The Three Kingdoms,” amounting to one thousand five hundred leaves, in twenty volumes, may be had for half-a-crown. Books are, consequently, multiplied to an almost incredible extent; and every peasant and pedlar has the common depots of knowledge within his reach. In China, we are accordingly told, there are, perhaps, more books, and more people to read them, than in any country in the world.—Fraser's Magazine.

THE PRESS.—The total number of newspapers which passed through all the Post-offices in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland in 1837, was forty-two millions.—Put.

NO LONDON BANKRUPTcies.—There are only four bankruptcies announced in Tuesday night's Gazette, and none of them in the metropolis. This is the second Gazette which has appeared without a London bankruptcy.—Post. [Now, that the “Official Assignees” take so much of the bankrupt business from the solicitors, we have heard that the latter make private arrangements with creditors, which prevent the necessity of bankrupt commissions.—Spectator.]

AN INVENTOR.—A correspondent of the Evening Herald says, that a fellow in the garb of a scholar, but pretending to be a natural knowledge of things in the world to come, and offering medicines for sale, is gulling the good people in Rochford Hundred. The Essex paper advises the peasantry to “bust their pockets a little tighter;” and the advice is the best that can be offered.—Put.

ASTORIA.

LEMBERS (ASTORIA GALICIA.) DEB. 3.—Since the last 10 days our country has been inundated with Jews, who have left the southern provinces of Russia, in order to avoid being incorporated by force with the Russian army. The ascription is a real scourge for the Russian Israelites; first, because in the deplorable condition to which the despotism of the Muscovite Government has reduced them, they are destitute of all courage and elevated sentiments; and, secondly, because the Czar, on hearing, in 1831, that whole battalions of Jews had laid down their arms before a handful of Polish rebels, has ordered the Israelite recruits to be employed as scummen on board the fleet, a service which they detest even more than that of the land army. The Jews have a means of obtaining their exemption from military service by bribing the recruiting commissioners, but those functionaries, who are extremely rapacious, do not consent to strike the name of an able-bodied man off their list, unless at a price of 1,000 to 2,000 rubles—a sum which is not within reach of the poor, and is reluctantly parted with by the rich. This penalty is to be met in every instance by the functionaries. In the last, and the Government overlooks it in order not to be obliged to increase their salaries, which are generally very trifling. Our Government General, the Archduke Ferdinand of Este, ordered the authorities to receive kindly the Jewish emigrants, to give to those who have no means of existence an allowance of three halfpence a-day, and a six-penny loaf every five days; to employ them, if they choose, in agricultural work on the Crown lands, and to procure their employment from private individuals. This extraordinary kindness evinced by our Government towards foreign Jews, while it does nothing to improve the condition of their Galician co-religionists, proves that there is at the bottom a political object in view, which is sufficiently evident from the conduct lately pursued by the Vienna Cabinet.—Commerce.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON PRISON DISCIPLINE.—The Report of the Committee, we have already stated, consists of three parts. The first, referring to the present state of Prison Discipline, and the minor improvements of which it is susceptible, we noticed last week. The second, which treats of transportation, is a sort of parenthesis in the Report; and we shall, therefore, reserve it for future consideration, and proceed to the last and most important portion of the Committee's discussion; the general scheme of Reform they propose.

The first care of the Committee is to lay down the general principles on which they conceive the reformed scheme should be founded: and this they have done at great length. In enunciating the three great objects of criminal punishment by imprisonment, namely, determent, incapacitation, and reformation, they maintain that the first of these "is of such paramount importance, that no secondary object ought to be aimed at in any such way as that thereby this main object will be attained in any material degree less perfectly than would otherwise be the case." This opinion they have pushed to an extreme; but there can be no question of its general truth.

The efficacy of imprisonment, in deterring from crime, is to be considered in reference both to society and the criminal himself. Imprisonment should be such as will scare a thousand ill disposed persons from the offences for which it is inflicted, for one who actually experiences its miseries; and such, as to prevent the individual who has once suffered it, ever exposing himself to the repetition of such a penalty. This character by no means belongs to the present system of Indian Prison Discipline. In lodging, food, clothing, and labour, the convict is generally better off than a large proportion of the ordinary labourers of the country. The disgrace of his situation soon ceases to be felt, by habit and the contamination of the gaol. Even the risk of sickness and death, which we shewed last week to be so fearfully great, "though it increases the severity of his real punishment a hundred-fold," say the Committee, "is not looked upon by him as a consequence of his own conduct, but rather as a casual misfortune, because it depends upon accidents of time and place very remotely connected with his offence, or the legal and usual punishment of that offence." The first recommendation of the Committee, therefore, is, that out-door labour be entirely discontinued, and in-door labour substituted for it.

The question is then largely discussed, what sort of in-door labour is best adapted to the great object in view? The choice lies between the employment of the prisoners at such trades as will most readily pay for their maintenance, allowing those who know a trade suitable to a prison to practice it, and teaching some-trade to those who know none; and their employment in some dull, monotonous, wearisome, and uninteresting task, such as stepping upon a tread-wheel, turning a capstan or hand crank, pumping water, pounding bricks, grinding flour, or the like. The Committee do not consider that there will be any difference of economy in these two opposite plans worthy of consideration; and for higher reasons, they give a decided opinion against trades altogether, and in favour of the tread-mill and similar modes of labour. The system of caste stands in the way of a general introduction of trade into our Indian gaols, as it would be an unjustifiable aggravation of the punishment of a Hindoo of superior caste, to make him work in the trade of an inferior. But the chief argument against them is, that they would operate against determent. They would afford the convict too much entertainment, and, on the plan recommended by some, of introducing amongst the convict artisans the improvements of European tools and processes, too much solid profit, for him to feel his imprisonment that miserable thing it ought to be. In like manner would a pernicious influence be produced upon society, if the criminal were seen coming out of gaol so instructed and benefited by his incarceration, as to be able to outstrip the honest people of the same craft in business. So argue the Committee; but we cannot say we are prepared to admit the soundness of the argument.

The Committee entertain no scruple about the right of the State to the profitable labour of the convicts; and, therefore, they recommend that the tread-mill system which they would have exclusively adapted, be applied to useful objects, both connected with the internal economy of the gaols, and in the hiring out of mechanical power to the public. Considerable demand for such power is anticipated, from the manner in which the people at Delhi avail themselves of the water mills there belonging to Government; and there can be no doubt it would be easy to have the tread-mills wrought in the Gaol, and connecting shafts sent without it, and connected with various sorts of machinery, in such a manner, that the convicts should know nothing of the work they were doing, but its severity as a punishment. The recommendations of the tread-mill are certainly great. It is absolutely and necessarily impartial, and cannot be made otherwise by the overseer. It has been tried to some extent in India, particularly at Bombay, and has been found productive of the best effects: "it is extremely dreaded, and it produces no permanent ill consequences, moral or physical." It can be wrought, upon the solitude or separation system, by partitions between the convicts; and its advantages have been found to be so great, that it has been adopted in sixty-seven of the gaols in England. The Committee, however, would have no women put upon the tread-mill; and they suggest that the working of it should be under the responsible inspection of the Civil Surgeon and so managed by definite rules, that the punishment of each convict should be distinctly measured by the Officer who pronounces sentence upon him, and not be left in the slightest degree to the discretion or caprice of the overseer. As the hand-crank is preferred by some, it is recommended that a trial also be made of it.

The Committee next discuss the question, whether it would not be better to adopt solitude as the only punishment during incarceration, and reject labour altogether, except as permitted in the solitary cells to those who voluntarily apply for it. The history of the solitary system in Europe and America is referred to; the evils it has produced traced to their true causes, and the facts adduced which prove its general excellence as a system both of punishment and reformation. We may here observe that "solitary" is not the term now applied in Europe and America. It is the "separate" system which is advocated by the best writers on these subjects. Our Committee have mentioned that in England, Inspectors of Gaols are appointed to see that their economy is such as is ought to be. There are five of these officers: two for the Home District of London, Middlesex and the adjoining counties; one for the Northern and Eastern counties; one for the Southern and Western counties; and one for Scotland. The Reports of these gentlemen have just been published with other parliamentary papers; and it will gratify our readers to see how they represent the operation of the separate system both on untried prisoners and convicts. Of the untried prisoner it is said:

"The prisoner is placed in an apartment, at least ten feet square, and ten feet high, sufficiently large to enable him to take exercise. This apartment is well lighted, ventilated, and warmed,—water is laid on,—and in the fitting up, every arrangement is adapted essential to the prisoner's health. To this apartment the prisoner is strictly confined by day and night,—nor is he allowed to leave it at any time, except for the purpose of attending divine worship. This seclusion, however, is broken by daily and stated visits of the governor, chaplain, surgeon, and other prison officers. The prisoner enjoys the privilege of seeing his friends,—he has every facility afforded him for consulting with his legal advisers,—he may send and receive letters,—he is permitted to have unobjectionable books,—he has the option of any employment that can be conveniently furnished to him,—he is exempted from all discipline that is calculated to create irritation,—he is tempted to commit no violation of prison rules,—he is exposed to no quarrels, and his mind cannot be tainted and demoralized by the relations of the burglar, nor his ears assailed by the language of the blasphemous and obscene."—Second Home Report, p. 11.

Of the convict the same Report observes:—

"We are well aware that there are those who consider as wild and visionary any hopes which may be entertained of the reformation of a criminal. We trust that it is unnecessary for us to state that we do not concur in this opinion. We feel assured that in this country, little need be urged against a doctrine which regards the convict as an outcast, possessing no interests beyond the grave, and worthy of no more consideration than the beasts which perish. If, as we firmly believe, no human being, however guilty, is excluded from the means of repentance and the hope of mercy, we cannot too strongly condemn opinions which appear to us to be opposed to the spirit and precepts of that Divine Being who 'desireth not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should turn from his wickedness and live.' We have had some experience of the character of criminals, and are persuaded that there are periods in the lives of even the most hardened, when the mind is awakened to reflection, and the heart overwhelmed with sorrow. In these seasons of sensibility, much may be done to eradicate the dominion of vice by the inculcation of Christian principles and the force of good impressions,—and it is the duty of a Christian Government to present to every prisoner the means by which instruction may be imparted, and repentance cherished. In the quiet of the prison cell,—and when humbled by correction,—the warnings, promises, and consolations of the Gospel, come home to the conscience with redoubled force. There is no feature in the Separate system which more favourably distinguishes it, than the facility which it affords to the minister of religion in the discharge of the various duties of his sacred office."—p. 14.

There is a humane and Christian tone in these paragraphs which it saddens one to feel is foreign to India, and, in a measure, necessarily so, also, to the Report of our Prison Discipline Committee. They insist that no rewards should be bestowed on prisoners for good conduct: and, indeed, that, under a proper system, no particular good conduct be rewarded, can exist. They object to education being given to the prisoners, because of the expense; and the unworthiness of the convicts, above all others, to have any of the limited sum at our disposal for education spent upon them. How long, we would ask, must every good proposal in respect of education be subject to rejection on the ground, that there is only a certain small sum available for all such purposes? On the subject of religion the Committee observe: "We are strongly of opinion that no encouragement ought to be given by any officer in charge of a prison to any attempt to make proselytes among the prisoners. We think also, that, without distinction as to creed, every prisoner who wishes to receive religious instruction, may be allowed occasionally to see a Minister of religion for the purpose, subject always to the rules necessary for maintaining the discipline of the prison." There is sound principle embodied in these sentences. It is unfair and unwise to take advantage of a man's circumstances as a convict, prevailing on him to adopt your opinions, and attach himself to your party, instead of his own. And it is just, that every man have liberty to do what he thinks to be right in religion, as far as he does no evil wrong to others. But we imagine the Committee mean more than merely to express such simple principles as these. They appear to belong to that class of persons who have no conception of a man's recommending religious truth to another, which is has not before considered or believed, but from the meagre and sordid motives of bigotry or sectarianism. To this apprehension every such person meditates an act of violence upon his neighbour; and in the heat of his enthusiasm, an inhumanly reckless of the consequences. Every faithful Christian minister, therefore, is in their opinion an impudent intruder of narrow-minded prejudices and dogmas, where in no sense they are wanted. We interpret the recommendation of the Committee to mean, that no Christian minister should be allowed to visit and converse with the Native convicts,—unless, perhaps, one or other of them specifically desire his instructions. He may be the only man a convict ever saw, who either could or would enter into friendly conversation with him, on the evils which had brought him into prison—the only one disposed to spend time in rectifying his principles and practice in future life. He might find him so subdued by his circumstances as to have his mind softened and accessible to the purest, sweetest, highest, and most blessed truths that the human mind is capable of receiving. But, the Committee, we fear, would say, this is making proselytes: we must have none of that. For Christian convicts, however, they recommend a Protestant and a Roman Catholic Clergyman to be salaried by the Government.

When the Committee have discarded from the treatment of prisoners all stimulus from entertainment or profit in labour, all rewards for exemplary conduct, and all instruction, either secular or religious, it is not to be wondered at, that they entertain no hope of their system effecting any reformation in the convicts. It is enough, they consider, if he is made to smart soundly for his crime, and be corrupted into no worse a man than he was before by the process. Even this will be a great improvement upon our present system.

Having explained the principles on which they think Prison Discipline ought to rest, the Committee proceed to describe the general scheme of prison reform they have to propose. It may be stated in a few words. They recommend a system of CENTRAL PENITENTIARIES, and DISTRICT GAOLS constructed and managed according to the principles they have previously laid down. It is proposed that a Penitentiary be formed for every six or eight districts, and be placed, if possible, in the immediate vicinity of the largest town in the set. To it are to be sent all prisoners sentenced for more than a year to solitary imprisonment, or impris-ment with hard labour: which would relieve the district gaols of half their working criminals. The Penitentiaries are recommended to be placed under the care of keepers with a salary of 300 Rs. per mensem. The convicts are to be fed by cooked rations eaten in solitude: a breach of prison rules is to be punished by solitude in darkness, privation of food, and, if experience show it to be indispensable, by whipping. A sufficiency of tread-wheels must, of course, be erected to keep in work all who are condemned to such labour.

The District Gaols are intended to consist, each of three distinct compartments: a house of correction for prisoners sentenced to solitude or hard labour for terms not exceeding one year, and furnished after the same manner as the Penitentiaries; a house of confinement, or the most lenient sort of imprisonment, in which all labour shall be voluntary, and separation only by a slight classification, to prevent the corruption of the better by the worse; and, lastly, a house of custody for untried prisoners, in which each prisoner may have a small apartment for himself, with a court to which he may have access, so as to have the means of living with those prisoners only to whose society he may feel no repugnance, and from whose society there may be no reason to fear ill consequences to himself. Salaries from 50 to 100 Rs. are recommended for keepers of the District Gaols. It is further proposed, that, following the example of England, we should have Prison Inspectors appointed, at least one for the provinces under the jurisdiction of each Local Government.

The Committee desire that their plan he first tried experimentally in a Penitentiary to be established in Calcutta, in the 24-Pergunnahs, Baraset, Jessore, Hooghly, Nuddes, Bardwan and Midnapore; and they offer their own services in watching over the progress of the experiment. We should be rejoiced to hear of this moderate suggestion being attended to. It is full time something should be done. From the returns before them the Committee shew, that crime is rapidly increasing; and they are constrained to believe, that the increase must be mainly attributed to a defective system of punishment. We, too, believe, that much of the increase may be attributed to that cause: but there is another cause of increased crime, which Government have still more at their command. To increase the revenue, the sale of intoxicating liquors and drugs is pushed on in every collectorate, in a manner the most pernicious that can be conceived. We have seen dram-shops multiplied under our own eye, in humble imitation of the beer shops, if not the gin palaces, of England, and with the same results. Government must abstain from making criminals, as well as exert themselves to amend and repress them.

THE ADMINISTRATION OF HEATHEN OATHS.—A very serious question has been mooted in the Christian Intelligencer of the present month; and it is likely to excite no small disquietude. Indeed, the greatest singularity about it, is, that it should never have been brought into discussion before. The question is, Whether a Christian Magistrate can conscientiously, and with a good conscience, be the administrator of Heathen and Mahomedan oaths.

If we understand the case rightly, it does not devolve upon our Judges and Magistrates simply to record, that, in the cases before them, the witnesses gave their testimony with the voluntary corroboration of such oaths as they considered the most sacred. But they are bound to compel every witness to swear, according to the form which is understood to be sacred in the opinion of the class to which he belongs; and in case he should refuse, to punish him by imprisonment, or other penalties. It is at the Magistrate's command; therefore, that every oath, be it good or bad, is taken.

Moreover, if a Mahomedan make oath upon the Koran, the act is an acknowledgment of the divine origin and authority of that book. And if a Hindoo swears by river, plant, or god of any sort, his act is a recognition of their divinity. In either case, in the judgement of every Christian, there is an assertion of what is grossly, profanely, and mischievously untrue. With the guilt, or innocence of the misguided Mahomedan or Hindoo, we have no concern. The question is, whether a Christian can be guiltless, in compelling any man to do what is in itself bad. We confess it difficult to see how he can.

Some may be disposed to argue, that a Magistrate is not on the bench acting in his individual capacity, and has nothing to do with the right or wrong, the praise or blame of what is there done at the dictation of superior authority. We have known scruples silenced in this way. But it must be remembered, that the Magistrate is under no compulsion to sit upon the bench. He may resign whenever he chooses. He would naturally resign if he was required to do any thing which made his office a temporal loss, rather than a gain to him. And why should he not resign, if he be required to be a partaker in criminality? Every thing he must do through not resigning, when resigning is at his option, is his own voluntary act.

But, perhaps, the majority will rather wonder that people should trouble themselves with such niceties, and put it down to some peculiar squeamishness. Yet we imagine the Government are sufficiently aware, that public servants, with somewhat particular consciences, are not the worst set of men for the performance of delicate and responsible duties. It is to be hoped, therefore, that opportunity will be taken to revise the whole system of judicial oaths. Till within a few years back, our British legislators seemed bent on the multiplication of oaths, ad infinitum. Nothing was too trivial for an oath. At length the natural result was manifest to every one. Oaths had been made so common, that every vestige of sacredness was taken from them. Religious feeling was destroyed, by the attempt to give it universal application. Now the aim is to dispense with swearing as much as possible; and considerable progress has been made to right reason, and genuine respect for sacred things, in this matter.

There is no much reason for adopting this new course in India as in Europe. We fear it would not consist with fact to say, that amongst the lower orders in India, oaths do nothing towards eliciting the truth. The terrors of superstition are realities, and not unfrequently bring out the reluctant acknowledgment of what would else have been concealed. But, putting out of regard the impropriety of drawing upon superstition even for truth, it is a safe assertion, that the superstitious idolatrous oaths, keeps out more truth from our Courts than it brings into them. It is well known, that no Hindoo of respectability will submit to be put on oath, if there be any way whatever of escape from it. Our most trustworthy witnesses, therefore, are lost to the dispensation of justice, by our folly in requiring them to degrade themselves by swearing. Let false testimony be visited with all the civil penalties of perjury, and we shall have no need to seek the aid of superstition. At the same time our own Christian Officers will be rescued from the necessity of compelling idolatry. We shall be glad to see this subject fully discussed. It is not of trifling importance.

THE CALCUTTA MECHANICS' INSTITUTION.—We very much fear this promising Institution is in danger of shipwreck, before it can get fair out at sea. Its conductors do not seem to know well what they would be at. There are two distinct objects they should certainly pursue, to the inferior of which alone they seem as yet to have given any thought. Popular lectures are required to give relief to the more laborious studies of the private class, to afford wider scope to the thoughts, and enable the mind to comprehend the general connections of truth, and also to secure popular favour and support, and so provide the means of study for the really students by lightly taking the idle and the curious. But if the Mechanics' Institution ever effects any real good, it will be in its school-rooms, and not by the popular lectures. Have the Committee yet inquired whether any young men are anxious to devote their evenings to study, if they could obtain cheap and good instruction? Are there any mechanics in Calcutta, who wish to remedy the evils of a defective education in the reading and writing of their own language, in arithmetic and grammar? Are there any who wish to facilitate the discharge of their duties by acquiring the language of the Native workmen, whom they have to direct? Are there any who are desirous of studying geometry, algebra, drawing, and other branches of education bearing directly or indirectly on mechanical design? Is any body really desirous of learning any thing? Surely there are inquiries that ought to be made; and for such purposes there should be an immediate provision. In regard to lectures, something better must be attempted than has yet been done. It is a difficult matter to speak of; and we will content ourselves with one piece of advice. Let the Institution pay for its lectures, and call for the assistance of gentlemen who will neither provoke ridicule nor offend delicacy.

CANAL NAVIGATION.—In our correspondence we will be found a valuable communication, urging the construction of Canals in the districts of Burdwan and Beerbhoom, to which we beg to call attention. Bengal generally is greatly favoured by nature with the means of inland navigation, through the numerous insensuating branches of the Ganges, which intersect it. It is a point worth consideration, however, whether some of the chief natural lines of communication might not be very advantageously superseded by artificial canals. In the upward passage, particularly, they would allow a great saving in time, from the directness of their course, and the absence of a strong current to contend with. And their advantage in diminishing risk, would, perhaps, be still more remarkable. It is incalculable how much property is lost in the great river courses in our severe and sudden storms; but in a Canal the very heaviest storms would be nearly harmless.

The Districts of Burdwan and Beerbhoom, however, do not properly belong to the Delta of the Ganges. They are intersected by none of its branches; and their own independent streams are navigable only for a short period during the rains, when there is but little agricultural produce to transport by them. Yet there is no part of Bengal more fertile, and to which an outlet for its superabundant produce is more necessary. Besides, they are bordered by the hills which furnish our nearest mineral resources; and near as they are, they are almost unavailably, from the irregularity or expensiveness of carriage. Nothing, however, need be added to what our able correspondent has adduced, to shew the importance of such a line of Canals as he recommends.

But the question occurs, how can the thing be done? In such cases, it is the habit of the country to look at once to Government. And, certainly, Government could not lay out a few lakhs of Rupees to greater advantage, either for their own revenues or the interests of their subjects. Without the interference of Government, too, we see no prospect of such a work being undertaken at all. Yet we think that it might be a better way of going to work, than for Government to take the whole enterprise into their own hands. The country requires its people should be imbued with public spirit, and stake a portion of their wealth in undertakings for the public good; and might not Government do something to bring about so beneficial an innovation. Suppose a prospectus were issued by Government, after proper surveys and investigations had been made, for the establishment of a Joint Stock Company, to form the Canals we speak of, with a certain capital, of which a good proportion should be furnished by Government, and the remainder in shares by the public, especially the zemindars and bungalows of the districts most concerned. The Government alliance would give credit and energy to the scheme; and the interest of the other shareholders would secure its future good management and success. A few undertakings of the sort in different parts of the country would draw out the resources of our people, and soon teach them to join in, and execute public works of the greatest importance, with any Government aid at all.

THE ARMY OF THE INDIA.—The intelligence received from the Army during the past week is favourable. In our temporary Selections we have placed an article from the Courier, which presents in one view both the localities, the circumstances of the troops, and is the last paper that has appeared on the subject for some weeks. It will be seen that our statement of last week is sustained; that, in no doubt, before now in Candahar. The English are in duty bound, twice as fast for our best week's positions. He may rest assured we think just as likely of our gallant countrymen in the field, as he does. Nevertheless, we cannot commend in them a spirit of anything, however natural it may be either to their circumstances, or their national temperament. They have physical difficulties to struggle with of great magnitude, against which ill temper could be of no use. As to the aid or aid usage from the Government they serve, we know of no symptom of it. On the contrary, we believe there is a Government on the earth, who have more consistent generous care on their army, than that of British India.

LITERARY NOTICE.—A gentleman wishes us to present for him, either by purchase or on loan, the following works:—A Jaghntai Toorken Grammar or Dictionary in European language; Baber's Memoirs, translated by H. Y. den; Historia Ghoscevidarum; Any History of the Sassanian Dynasty of Transoxiana; of Jenghis Khan and his successors—and of the Kings of Chormania. We know of no better method of accomplishing his object than the giving general notice, that we shall be happy to give a liberal price for any or all of these works on his behalf. Any scholars willing to part with such a portion of their treasures, would at the same time be contributing effectively to the promotion of historical research. They are not wanted as curiosities.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, APRIL 18.

We are sorry to observe that the state of the Opium market in China is likely to have a pernicious influence elsewhere. The merchants of Singapore are putting with their stock at a great sacrifice, and, consequently, it will be sold in the smaller markets of the Islands at a much reduced price; and it is to be probable, the large and cheap supply will permanently increase the demand. Opium, it appears, too, becoming a favorite means of intoxication in England. In this there may be a righteous retribution for our conduct in the East. The Singapore Free Press states, that the total deliveries of Opium in China, for the year ending the 1st February, 1839, amounted to 16,533 chests; which would give a monthly average of nearly 1,360 chests. But it is well known that the deliveries in the last month, January, were only 227; and the sales were not 19. To the 8th February, the deliveries of that month were 12 chests. Such a change the trade can never survive. The stock in China would, it was calculated, by the end of February, amount to 20,000 chests. What will be done with them?

THURSDAY, APRIL 19.

A Lecture was delivered this evening to the members of the Mechanics' Institution; of which, perhaps, the less said is the better.—A ferryman in Haut Kholah has attempted the murder of his wife, through suspicion of her criminality with his younger brother. He will be brought to trial during the present session.—Dandy seems rife in the country. There is one case reported in the bulletin at Dum-Dum; another in the Zillah Rungpoor, by a band of men in the employ of an Isardar Bhowanee Pursal Roy; and another in the Zillah of Bugoorah.—The Manilla Government have made arrangements for establishing a system of correspondence with Spain, through the Bombay Overland Mail, and the French Post Office at Marseilles.—It is stated that there have been strange doings on board the Jagatir, during her passage to Ceylon, with the 11th Regiment on board. The Captain, auster in the Navy, is said to have ordered up 40 soldiers to put the Colonel in irons, and the Colonel 100 of his men to drive them over the side.—The Bombay folks, without a Mechanics' Institution, seem to be obtaining its entertainments better than the people of Calcutta with one. Lieut. C. D. Campbell, of the Indian Navy, has been exhibiting to them the model of a Locomotive Engine at work on an iron rail-road.

SATURDAY, APRIL 20.

A project for building a new Cathedral in Calcutta is now talked of. Same say it is to provide larger accommodation than the present Cathedral, and would, therefore, rest the pret upon its utility. But we have heard none declare that for present accommodation was insufficient. If it were, the suitable remedy would be a new church of ordinary dimensions. We rather think it is simply a piece of ecclesiastical state and ornament that is wanted. Those who take pleasure in such a thing, have a perfect right to spend their money in building it; but whose money is to be spent in maintaining its ceremonial?—On the 7th instant, a Jewish convert was baptized in the Scotch Church, Bombay, by the Rev. Mr. Stevenson. He is a private in H. M. 6th Regt. and has lately embraced the Christian faith.

SUNDAY, APRIL 22.

The Bombay papers report that on the removal of the camp at Karanichee, the cholera had ceased.—A failure in the revenue is anticipated at Poona, through deficiency of rain last monsoon.—The Agra subscribers to the Metcalfe Testimonial have determined to keep their money amongst themselves; that is, instead of making it over in whole or in part to the Calcutta subscription, they will have something or other of their own at Agra.—The Madras Agricultural and Horticultural Society are proceeding with zeal and success in their mission, and determining to have a European Superintendent for their Gardens, have offered the situation to Mr. M. Terry, late Head Gardener of the Calcutta Botanical Garden. We are glad so deserving a man is likely to meet with a situation where his abilities may be appropriately applied.

THURSDAY, APRIL 25.

Greenville's Journal of the 15th affords an amusing instance of the value of private letters on public subjects. It is said, "Private letters from Rangoon mention, that Colonel Benson was in strict discreet, and informed that his head was to pay for the first shot fired by us." And at the same time, the Colonel's head was safe upon his shoulders in the City of Palaces. We begin to suspect a good deal both of our private and public intelligence from the Eastward, has been of similar worth. Our war-thy contemporary adds, however, that the furlough usually granted to the troops is this year withheld, and thence infers that their services will be required on our Eastern frontier.—The Madras papers report that Dr. O'Connor has gone on a tour of visitation, accompanied by one Native and two European Priests, with a bullock cart to carry their baggage, and a single palanquin to ride in alternately. A palanquin a piece would have been, we think, no superfluity in such a climate and season; but we admire the moderation that is content with so much less, and dare say the good gentlemen will have their fatigue lightened with many a pleasant talk. Their hearts may be light in the assurance, that they are giving no occasion for the reproach of religion by burly assumption and display.—A great sensation has been excited in Surat by the sudden death—the suicide it is called, the murder it is believed—of Mirza Akbarullah, late cashier or financial manager of the Nuwab. He had been accused of peculation, and delivered over to his master by the British Judge, according to his privilege of independent jurisdiction over his own household. He was then cast into prison, and is said to have cut his throat with a sword; but violent cries having been heard at the time, various conjectures have been formed of the matter.—The Royal of Bhopore having lately died of small-pox, his territory reverts to the Company.—The Opium sale of yesterday held at Calcutta, with less loss to Government than might have been expected. 9,341 chests were sold, the highest at 475 Rs. and the lowest at 300. The entire proceeds of the sale were 12,58,812½ Rs. The Bombay Native merchants were the chief purchasers.—It is said the sentries of Fort William have allowed none of the gate keepers to be walked away with.—The Assam Scholastic Corps is increased to ten Companies, of 100 private men each; and the Assam Light Infantry have 100 additional men to each Company.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 24.

Yesterday's Englishman having mentioned that the Overland Mail for February was in, we confidently expected to have had a summary of Europe Intelligence to lay before our readers to-day. But we share in a general disappointment.—The Derbyshire, it seems, reached Bombay at 2 p.m. on the 11th instant, bringing the London Mail via Palanquin and tiller, and of the 16th February; but the later despatch through Marseilles is waiting, the French Steamer not having arrived at Alexandria in time. The risk from Bombay brings only the Government dispatches, and a few private letters, and, therefore, no intelligence of any consequence has yet transpired. If any should reach to before our paper goes to press, we shall make room for as much of it as possible.

We observe the Jellingbee, in tow of the Lord Willough Bentinck Steamer, is to start for Dacca on the 25th; passengers and goods to be taken at one-third the charge to Attanabad.—The Englishman reports that a Military Depot for arms is about to be established in Cachar or Sylhet, for the purpose of arming the well-disposed tribes on the N. E. Frontier on any emergency. Such a depot already exists at Dibrinhat, in Assam, and has been found highly useful.—Balas Rungpoor has been appointed third Commissioner of the Court of Disputes, in the place of Mr. J. W. Alexander, who has resigned. We much regret the occasion of the appointment, but at the same time the preference of the Rangoon will give general satisfaction.—Crime continues to abound at Hooghly. Nuboo Tackie has murdered Deekhand Daffadar in spite; a deadly law has been committed at Gaurapore, in Zillah Barrack, and another between Chumta and Serampore, last Sunday night, when property to the value of 4,000 Rupees was carried off.—A woman having at one of the Calcutta Ghats, on Sunday, was caught by a rope about her foot, it is supposed, by some diver, who would soon have had her under water, and drowned and stripped her of her jewels. Happily, however, she was rescued.—The Commercial Advertiser states that the practice of kidnapping boys and girls is carried on at an enormous rate in Calcutta and Calcuttallah, in the suburbs of Calcutta—Zuhor Ally, Ghossein of Dumypoor, has been dismissed from office for extorting money from officers, and is to be made over to the criminal authorities to be tried for the offence.

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

The Grand Jury were discharged on Saturday after giving into the Court the following presentment:—

The Grand Jury beg leave to present to this Honourable Court the extreme loss of time to many persons occasioned by the present practice of the Magistrate of sending all petty offenders to be tried by the Supreme Court. The Grand Jury, though very willing to give up their time to important public duties, submit respectfully to this Honourable Court that the ends of Justice would be more effectually attained by the summary punishment of such petty offenders, either by the Police Magistrates or by an improved system of Quarter Sessions, besides being a very great saving to the public.

The Grand Jury also beg leave to present to this Honourable Court the state of the working cattle employed in drawing and carrying burthen in Calcutta, and they respectfully suggest that some enactment for preventing cruelty to animals, similar to those in force in Great Britain, might be advantageously adopted here.

(Signed) J. W. GRANT, Foreman.

Grand Jury Room,
20th April, 1839.

On receiving this, Sir John Grant addressed the Grand Jury, and said that their presentment should have all due attention, but in the first part they seemed to have misunderstood the law of England which, since Magna Charta, had required that no man should be tried for a felony but by his peers; and that for his part he was not prepared to suggest any alteration in the law of England. And further, that if the quarter session were to be employed for trying offenders, either before a bench of magistrates or otherwise, the grand jury would find that their time and that of the petty jury would be as much taken up as at present.—Engl.

A CONSPIRACY.

The following extraordinary news is confidently reported in the Upper Provinces:—

A conspiracy has been announced by the Government in the Secret Department to the head of every Political Office in India. Dost Mahomed Khan, the King of Persia, and Muta Mir, of Jodpore, are at the head of it, but its ramifications include almost every Chief of note. The Nawab of Bhopal was the last to join it. His agreement was to murder Mr. Wilkinson, the Political Agent at Bhopal, and to march instantly to join Holkar in an attack on the Cantonment of Mhow. His share of the spoils, which however savours somewhat of selling the Bear's skin, was to be the country from Raeesen to Ratghar. The Bundelkhand Chiefs were to make a simultaneous attack on Naurgur—the signal for the insurrection was to be the approach of the Persian and Afghan Armies, who, it was presumed, would advance unbeckoned, as our Troops would have had enough to do to meet the outbreaks on all sides of India. This conspiracy was discovered by an active Magistrate in the Malwa Presidency, who apprehended two men calling themselves Pilgrims to Mecca. They subjected themselves to suspicion on matters they seemed to have no business with. This led to their apprehension—at the first examination nothing was proved against them, but they were put into confinement, and the matter reported to Government. Before any reply was received, the whole of their most extensive and minute instructions was found sewed up in their clothes, much of which instructions was in cypher. The report is, that the number of emissaries thus employed amounts to 200. For the truth of this rumour, we cannot vouch, it is confidently believed by many persons, and, if the facts are as stated, this discovery was probably the motive of the vigorous measure taken against Dost Mahomed and the Persians by the Government.—Courier, April 23.

Our last accounts from the Army of the Indus left the advance party under Major Cresson at Sir-i-Aub.

ly a journey from Kandahar to Hingoonthan by this route, we have the pleasure to present our readers with a [reversed] route by which our Army will advance from Sir-i-Aub to Kandahar, which we hope will be gratifying, as enabling them to trace the march of the Force, and to calculate the probable period of their arrival at Kandahar. From Sir-i-Aub the road leads through the valley, formed by the Umber and Zanjibar mountains to Quetta, the distance being about eleven miles—the soil of the valley is good—the town of Quetta or Quete, is situated at the head of a fine valley, eight miles in breadth—it contains about 400 houses, and is the Capital of the Belocher province of Shawal, and belongs to the Khan of Kelant-e-Naseer.

From Quetta to the foot of the Musailugh Hills is fifteen miles—the road crossing the Shahderye Lora eight miles from Quetta, and a good halting place would most probably be found between the river and the commencement of the ascent. From the river to Tirkah Ohah the distance is about twelve miles, [water not good], two of which are across the Musailugh range. From Tirkah Ohah to Shahderye is sixteen miles, the road over a plain which, though bare in November, afforded food for large flocks of sheep. From Shahderye to the northern extremity of a Tamarisk Wood, the distance is ten miles—the road crossing the Shahderye Lora about four miles on—the water in winter about three feet deep, two miles beyond the extremity of the Wood is Chokee Shumoo Khan, the road broad and good. From the last mentioned place to the southern base of the Khoghe Amraun Range the distance is six miles, and to the other side of them six more, the ascent and descent is gradual and the road good, excepting for a short distance where it is steep and narrow. From the foot of these Hills, to Chokee spring, is four miles of very gradual descent, and burdens by many little dells in which grow Khudjuk trees and many shrubs, and is described by a companion of Chaslin in the following terms:—"It is spring it is Delhid here (Parabur): the snow melts into clear rills, and a light cool air is always blowing to bear to you the fragrance of a thousand flowers from the shrubs and flowers which cover the Hills." It would just be this delightful season when our Troops would reach this Paradise, and we shall be very loath indeed to anticipate any thing disastrous occurring to them in such a neighbourhood. From Chokee to the Koldiny River, the distance is fourteen miles, which in the spring is water—being except in winter and spring dry, four miles beyond this, at a little distance from the road, is found the Bhadoo of Khan-e-Almu, which is thus described:—"A passage of some eight or ten feet broad, and ten hundred paces in extent, is cut down through hard gravelly earth to a circular chamber of about twenty-one feet diameter, which had been sunk perpendicularly like a well, to a depth of perhaps one hundred feet below the surface. From this level a small well was dug, in which the water was thirty feet deep, and which was used by the shepherds to water their sheep." From this Bhadoo to Kullah Fattullah, the distance is six miles, it is a Maml Fort, situated in a broad valley between the Khoghe Amraun and Gaure Hills, which are four miles further on. Nineteen miles from the foot of this range, which is narrow, is a high rock called Leike Mijoon, the name of which, some account for by asserting that, to evince the depth of his love, the well known Mijoon threw himself from its summit, when, wonderful to be told, he fell on his legs, and when he alighted the spring gushed forth and as a proof of the truth of the legend, the spring is there still! From this spring to Arghestaun Brook, the distance is three miles, its waters are reckoned as superior that Ahmed Shah Dooranee would drink none other, having ascertained by weighing it in scales, it is said, that it was much lighter than any other water. From this brook to the Dooree river, the distance is five miles, from it to Ghoondu Munsoor Khan, sixteen, and from the latter to Kandahar, sixteen more:

As being more convenient for reference we have put the route down again with merely the names of places and distances; on adding up which, it will appear that from Sir-i-Aub to the City of Kandahar, the distance is only 170 miles, and very little of it steep or difficult for the number of Troops; we may, therefore, calculate that from the time the force started, till they reached the City, they would not exceed 25 days, halts included. Our letters of the 29th ultimo, stated the Troops had not over the Pass—but if we give them to the end of the month to rendezvous at Sir-i-Aub, they will arrive at Kandahar in all this week, but as it was rumoured that the Chieftains were to assemble their Troops in the fertile Valley of Peshing to oppose our advance, and as that is only about fifty miles from Sir-i-Aub, we ought to hear in a very few days of their final determination. We repeat that we cannot believe these men to be so deprived of common sense as to attempt a defence of their country, after having allowed us to pass through the only part of it which could have given them any chance of success—and as to burning the standing crops we do not think that the inhabitants would suffer it, were it possible, which we doubt—as they must be green even at this period, and the people are understood to detest their rulers, who have governed them with a rod of iron, so that they would lend no hearty aid in destroying that to which they must look for their future support, but for the sake of argument, let it be granted that the crops have been destroyed. We cannot admit from that circumstance, that our Army would be compelled to return. No—we have too much confidence in the arrangements of our Government and the zeal of the Commissariat, to allow us to entertain one desponding thought though it were proved that the Kandahar Chiefs had adopted and carried fully into effect their Fabian plan of operations. We know that 2,500 Camels were with the Force, loaded entirely with atah, which is equal to two months rations for upwards of eleven thousand men. It is not to be supposed that the Commissariat has been idle since the Force moved from Ferozepour, from that place if not nearer the scene of action, there has no doubt been a constant supply forwarded to Hukkur, which there could be difficulty in pushing on via Shikarpoor, to whatever place the advanced Force may have reached. We are of opinion, that there is not the least chance of our Army being obliged to make a retrograde movement till every object of the Government in its formation, shall be wholly and satisfactorily accomplished.—Courier, April 22.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

DEAR SIRS,—I have perused with much pleasure and profit to myself, a small Pamphlet, entitled by the Author, "Notes on the duties of a Special Deputy Collector," on the subject of Be-sumptions. The style in the first place is excellent, and the arrangement and elucidation of the matter treated of, so perspicuous, that a Resumption Deputy Collector, with a copy of the Pamphlet at his elbow at Court, and with a little attention to its contents, can scarce ever be at a loss as to what he is to do in the conduct, or adjudication of the suits that come before him. It is, indeed, a valuable little work; and small as it is, it shews the attainments of its author as a perfect English scholar, and a very experienced Revenue Officer, whatever he is. It is an able prompter to a young Resumption Officer at almost every step of his proceedings; and it is much to be regretted that such a work from such a pen should be limited to only a few pages. The absence of a similar work for the guidance of Officers engaged in another branch of the Revenue line, viz., the Settlement operations, is much felt and equally regretted; and I need scarcely add, that such another little work, although it may comprise no more than the same number of pages as the one above noticed, from the pen of the same author, would remove many very trying difficulties which are experienced by the Revenue Officers of the Uncovenanted class, to whom the Settlement duties are principally assigned. These Officers will owe that gentleman an obligation which will not be forgotten; if he will undertake this task; while the benefit of his own experience and knowledge in Revenue matters, thus extended to his humbler brethren labouring in the same field, will raise them in the scale of good Revenue Officers, and promote their own elevation in the service. I sincerely hope that these few crude remarks may elicit the kind attention of the author of the "Notes" in the manner which I have, with all deference, hinted at.

I am, dear Sirs,

Your faithful humble servant,

C. M. S.

Umpath, April, 1839.

The Editors of the Friend of India.

MR DEAR SIRS.—I believe it is no new idea that this district, which I believe is considered by all favourable for the experiment, would be incalculably benefited by the construction of one or two Canals. The Government woe, I think, so far as to have a survey made of the country to ascertain the lands and lands, the reservoirs and sources of waters, but stopped in their prosecution of the work. They designed a Canal to pass through the district of Beerbloom and this district, to the Ganges. The great expense, probably, combined with other considerations, suspended their operations.

I wish to place before you a few remarks on the subject, which you may deem worthy your consideration, should you have an opportunity of urging the plan for execution.

I have only got imperfect maps of the district, and may fall in to error in some points of topography, which I trust you will excuse.

With the great agricultural capabilities, and the large Revenue yielded by this district, you are well acquainted. It is considered, in regard to culture, the richest in Beawal. From a Map prepared by Capt. Jackson from surveys made in the years 1816, 1817, and 1818, I apprehend the district may occupy a square of about thirty-eight miles. The whole of this area is well, and most of it richly, cultivated, well populated, produces some of the most valuable products of Bengal, more especially Indigo, Sugar and Silk. It abounds with tanks and reservoirs to excess. But these sources of national wealth, the great gifts of nature, are, to a great degree, neutralized, from the want of the means of intercommunication, and easy transit for the superabundant products of the fertile soil.

There are a few roads in this district fit for hackeries. 1st. The great Western. 2d. The road from Hardwan to Chinnah. 3d. The road from Hardwan to Kutwah. 4th. The road to Banerwah. Most of which are not in a very good condition. These have all been made by government, and great service to the district has undoubtedly accrued.

There are several rivers, but these do not afford the means of conveying goods after the close of the rainy season. Their waters run off, and leave sandy wide-spaced beds. On the North the district is bounded by the Adja. On the South West and South it is cut by the Dakshore, and through its centre runs the Damoodhur in various windings to the north. No boats can navigate these rivers, except during the rains; and land carriage is the only means the inhabitants have to transport their produce; as you well know these have to be transported in the cold weather, and cannot wait for the coming of the rains, as they only come to maturity after November.

It is an admitted fact, that the inefficiency of land and water carriage forms a prodigious drawback to the industry of any country, and keeps at the lowest maximum the productive powers and the commercial energies of nations, who are in possession of fertile soils and active and ingenious inhabitants. The district of Bardwan may be considered as suffering all the plagues of fertility, and shackled industry, which arises from the want of outlets of distribution.

The prosperity of ancient Egypt, the wealth and resources of ancient Babylonia, were connected with, if not created by, the country being intersected by numerous canals. In some instances they served the purpose of more widely diffusing to remote districts the benefits accruing from the foundation of the neighbouring rivers; thus converting to good purposes, what otherwise would have been a natural evil. In other instances these Canals served to supply the means of extensive inland traffic; and in others again they served to drain the country of superfluous waters; and in the course of centuries, to elevate the land, to harden the soil, and give to its parts greater consistency, while the depth of it was increased: consequently they were favourable to the rooting of trees and the growth of vegetable productions.

In Bengal it is much to be regretted that the important advantages to be derived from Canals have not been sufficiently attended to, either by preceding Governments or by our own. The fact would seem to be, that till our time Bengal appears to have been considered merely in the light of a conquered province, to be riddled of its Revenues, which were transmitted to Delhi, or whatever city may have been the temporary capital. It was, therefore, subjected to every ill treatment. No money was expended on public works of national improvement, or to augment the wealth and resources of the country.

Rich and fertile as Egypt may have been, and continues to be, she must be acknowledged in point of fertility and natural capabilities, vastly inferior to Bengal; but then she had all the advantages of the most extensive system of Inland Navigation and irrigation, to augment her wealth and repay the industry of her inhabitants.

I am well aware of the differences of the two countries in their peculiar circumstances, physical as well as moral. But who can observe, without admiration, in the one the wealth and treasures of Kings spent in works of public utility, as well as ornament; while we cannot fail to remark in the other, of the same age and equality, the absence of a vestige of an older date than five hundred years. It must also be remarked, that both were subject from the earliest times to the sacerdotal class; but how incomparably superior were the minds and the purposes of those who were entrusted with the faith and morals of the inhabitants of Egypt, to those who performed the same duty in Bengal.

But I am digressing from my subject. I wished to point out one vast difference in the two countries, viz., that one owes its great fertility to the rains; while the other is indebted to foundations and floods, derived from distant lofty mountains covered by snow, and in some degree, perhaps, to periodical rains in a lower latitude. This marked distinction must, of course, cause much variation in the means used to gain similar results; while the natural effects of the slimy deposition in the one case, and the stagnation of the waters, and the decay of vegetables, creating a fertile deposition in the other, both tend, although unequally, to augment fertility. The double deposition in the latter case, which more especially is increased by a lair or stratum of clay, sand and fine particles of soil, which takes place in the hot winds, may fairly be considered as giving to Bengal a greater natural fertility. From this showing, I may, perhaps, be allowed to assume the superior advantages possessed by Bengal.

The extraordinary addition made to the richness of the soil by the vast quantity of vegetable matter, derived not only from former crops, but from trees and shrubs that cover the face of the country, as with a garment,—not to mention the diffusion of animal matter from the unmountable hosts of animals, birds, reptiles and insects that pervade every inch of the land,—should, it must be confessed, when aided by atmospheric phenomena and the industry of man, render Bengal the prolific garden of production, perhaps unequalled on the face of the earth, and its rubrics the proudest of monarchs.

But Burdwan is the very garden district of Bengal; and with the exception of a few indifferent roads, nothing has been done to augment its resources.

Of communication and transit there are only two means, 1st. That by land; 2nd. That by water. Many countries have not the means of the latter, and are compelled to make use of the former; but are comparatively poor and restricted in their means. From the destruction and dilapidation of vegetable, animal and mineral products, occasioned by the rains in Bengal, and more particularly in Burdwan, the only proper practical, economical, lasting and secure mode of communication is by water. Canals should occupy the place of roads, and should be cut and excavated in such directions and lines, that they might be not only available for travellers, but for the transport of the rich products of the country to the trunk of navigable rivers.

Long as we have been in possession of Bengal, a constant water carriage to the Hills, which bound Bengal on the west, has not been effected; it is still a desideratum. From the absence of such a means of communication, we deprive ourselves in Calcutta of all the benefits these depositories of mineral treasures would yield; and instead of using and availing ourselves of proximate sources, we are obliged to depend on supplies from a distance, thereby vastly increased in price to Government, and generally to the public; not to mention the absence of the commerce, of which they might form legitimate objects. Coal mines, which form one of the greatest sources of modern wealth, have little attracted notice; and the transport of their products is confined to a short period of the year, during the height of the rains: these are situated on the west of Burdwan. A constant water communication with the Ganges, would give a spur to industry and to manufactures, and add most materially and incalculably to the resources and wealth of the State. Can these well known results be overlooked? Useful as coal may be, we cannot but regard iron as of the greatest importance. This metal is likewise found in the same range of Hills, and in connection with the coal beds. Fortunately there is always in Calcutta the greatest demand, and it must go on increasing with the prosperity of the country; and it seems absolutely necessary that we should avail ourselves to the utmost of our means.

Lime and other useful minerals will, no doubt, be found, besides an ample store of stone for building, and stone for metalising roads, in the same range.

In possession of such abundant stores of mineral wealth, it is almost inconceivable why we should lose an instant in their exploration, and in furnishing a well constructed Canal for their conveyance to the marts of commerce. We possess the pearl, but deny ourselves the purchase of an instrument to open the shell.

There are two important effects that might be justly anticipated from the opening of Canals. 1st. The country by being well drained, would be infinitely more productive. The country now requires several months before the water is evaporated, or carried off by the common outlets and rivers. The period this requires occupies the best part of the cold weather, the season best adapted for agriculture,—the very period in which many foreign products might be reared, which cannot now be produced from the saturation of the soil. This, scilicet of draining might, indeed, be extended beneficially almost to every field where the soil required to be discharged of its superabundant moisture, and where it was desirable to prevent the stagnation of rain water. And, secondly, it is an hoo important to remark, that the construction of Canals would, most probably, so well drain the country, that a great part of the present system of embankments might scilicet be obliterated; and that from the possession of these means of out-let, inundations would be checked and modified. To prevent the destruction of life, products, habitations, and wealth of the inhabitants, by a means that would be conducive to their prosperity, seems to me to merit the highest consideration of humanity as well as State policy. The simple means that are now lavished on unproductive embankments, would be a source of wealth, if directed to the construction of Canals; while the latter, in all human probability, would prevent the devastating effects of inundations, by keeping the country dry drained and freed from superabundant stagnate waters.

To open a water communication to the most mineral prolific part of the western range of Hills that skirt Bengal, and more particularly with the Coal mines there situated, to carry the above Canal through the most populous and fertile tract of this district, in order that the agricultural products might readily and safely be transported to the Ganges: to prevent, in a considerable degree, by the drain that would be effected by this Canal, the annual inundations which are sometimes terrific, and always extensively destructive, and thereby obviate the necessity of many of the embankments, and the large disbursement they require: to secure a safe, easy and pleasant, as well as economical and constantly available mode of travelling to the Western Province, over the low swampy lands of Bengal: these are the objects of desirable attainment in forming a Canal, that shall reach from the Ganges to the Western range of Hills, at the point near the Coal mines and the Western road. But other results might be attained, perhaps, without inconsequence to those specified above: viz., a vast portion of the country might be irrigated, gardens might be watered, mulberry and coffee plantations receive a due portion of moisture; and last, but not least, tea plantations by this means might, perhaps, be successfully undertaken. The advantageous results derived from the Canals opened in the upper part of the Doab, are too well known to require further allusion than merely calling attention to the fact as supporting the views I have taken in one point, (viz. irrigation); and I trust it is sufficient from analogy to show what may reasonably be expected in this quarter of the country. But irrigation is only one of the expected advantages, and is not the principal object, for constructing a Canal in this otherwise rich district. When added, however, to other considerations, it gives them a force and a weight which are much in favour of the proposed undertaking.

The Canal might run from the neighbourhood of Undal, between the rivers, the Damoodhar and the Adjee, to the vicinity of Ambouh or Culna. Having probably a course of seventy or eighty miles, its dimensions would, perhaps, require to be from 24 to 30 feet at top, 16 feet at bottom, with an average depth of 5 feet. The digging by contract might be, perhaps, performed at the rate of 600 or 700 Rs. per mile; consequently the mere excavation would not, probably, exceed 36,000 Rs.; and as the land is level, not many locks or basins would be required. But all these details must, of course, be ascertained. I merely submit them by way of conjectural approximation. The Rajah of Burdwan possesses, probably, two-thirds of the whole land, through which the Canal would run; and an easy compromise might be effected with him. The remaining one-third might be bought. Under these heads, together with the Engineer's expenses, the chief expense would fall. On a rough estimate, of probable expenses, the outlay would not exceed two lakhs of Rupees, and the Canal might cost considerably less, if managed with economy and skill. I conceive from three to four years would be only required to repay the outlay and duties on transit of goods, passengers, boats, irrigation, &c., and the saving of the disbursements for embankments would form a fund for the repayment of the capital expended. In respect to the latter expectation, I need scarcely advert to the fact, that the Shepherd Kings found the Delta of the Nile, comprising the whole of lower Egypt, a swampy marsh, on their taking possession of the country; but in the course of three hundred years, by means of numerous Canals, they not only drained that marsh, but rendered the country thus reclaimed the garden of the ancient world. They likewise subjected the annual inundations to the sway of man, and converted by art, an instrument of destruction in the hands of nature into a means of the most inalienable benefit to the human race. This lesson should not be forgotten by the rulers of this country, who are in possession of the Delta of the Ganges. It should excite their energies, in order to the production of similar good results. Should the Government not be inclined to attend to these suggestions so made for the benefit, support and increase of their revenue, as well as for the convenience that would result, might it not be still for the advantage of the European and Native community to consider how far their pecuniary interests might be promoted; and if no association can be effected, to carry into effect the propositions I have made, yet some individuals might make experiments on their own lands as far as draining went.

Yours, &amp;c.

Burdwan, April 18, 1859.

ANNUAL RECEIPTS OF MISSIONARY, BIBLE, EDUCATION, AND TRUST SOCIETIES.

The amount of these Receipts is smaller than those of 1856-57 by 25,631l. 1s. 8d.; but, in that year, the income of the Gospel Propagation Society included nearly 35,000l. collected under the late King's Letter: the same year's income is here quoted, that for 1856-57 not having appeared; but the King's Letter collection is, of course, subtracted. The proceeds of the Sales of Bibles amount to somewhat more than one-fifth of the whole, and the income of the American Societies is, also, about one-fifth of the whole.

REV. JAMES HILL.—To the Editor of the Patriot.—Sir,—Please to correct the following error in the next Patriot:—Mr. Hill, of Oxford, does not succeed the late Dr. McAll. He has accepted the call of the congregation assembling in Chapel-street, Salford, Manchester. Yours, THOMAS WILSON.

REMOVAL OF BLACKBURN INDEPENDENT ACADEMY TO MANCHESTER.—The only theological College in Lancashire in connexion with Congregational Dissenters, has been, for the last twenty-two years, located at Blackburn. Its committee and subscribers have just concluded upon removing it to Manchester, where it is intended to be established upon a more liberal basis than hitherto, and to be conducted upon a more extensive plan. The improved position which most other Dissenting Colleges have attained during recent years—the uniformity of the domestic accommodations heretofore possessed for the purposes of a College—together with the increasing number of students—have compelled the consideration of new and better arrangements. The subject has been taken up by a considerable portion of the constituents, particularly by those in Manchester, with their mounted liberality and public spirit, and it is not doubted that their example will be followed throughout the county and those in its vicinity. At a meeting of the constituents, held in Manchester, on the 20th December last and the 10th instant, the propriety of a removal to that town, and of the erection of a suitable building, was fully discussed, and both measures were resolved upon with a most satisfactory degree of unanimity. The Treasurer of the Institution, George Halford, Esq., whose name is associated with all public-spirited and benevolent enterprises, opened a subscription towards the object to the sum of one thousand pounds.—500*l.* were subscribed by Samuel Brooks, Esq.—500*l.* by John Wood, Esq.—and by William Kay, Esq. of Liverpool, and a similar sum by James Kershaw, Esq. With other donations from various gentlemen, the amount reached between 3,000*l.* and 6,000*l.* The probable outlay for ground and building (which are to be in the immediate environs of Manchester) is estimated at 10,000*l.* or 12,000*l.* It is proposed that the house shall be capable of accommodating twenty-five or thirty students; and, whilst the practical character of a large portion of the constituency is a security against lavish expenditure, it is intended that the edifice shall not be unworthy of the body of Congregational Dissenters in Lancashire, or of the College adequate to the religious necessities of the county. The friends of the measure hope that, under the Divine blessing, it will exert a most favourable influence on the religious interests of Lancashire, in which alone exists a population of a million and a half,—and also on those of the neighbouring counties of Derby and Chester,—not excluding the district to the north of Lancashire, to which travelling is about to be so greatly facilitated by railway conveyance. Whilst a wish is felt by many at Blackburn and its vicinity should not be left destitute of some compensating religious advantages; it is believed there is a nearly unanimous feeling throughout the county in favour of an improved institution in Manchester, whence the benefits of a theological seminary will be more widely diffused, and where the students will enjoy access to public lectures, valuable libraries, and other sources of improvement presented by scarcely any locality in a superior degree. It is hoped that the Congregational body at large will extend its favour and assistance to an undertaking so evidently calculated to diffuse the blessings of the Gospel, and promote the formation of new Christian congregations amongst the rapidly increasing population of our manufacturing districts.—Pat.

SCIENTIFIC.

THE INVENTIVE POWERS OF MAN are not, simply, limited; it is difficult to prove that he possesses ought but the use of varying that which has been invented by the Creator, or of combining those inventions into new groups; being thus, in reality, but a copyist. He has often attempted to design new animals; but they have ever been compounded from the parts of known ones, while, where his necessities have been greatest, the anatomist has not been able to supply the parts necessary to nature. No human invents a new plant but in the same manner; yet he prevails from nature a hundred new inventions without the least surprise. The designer of ornaments must have recourse to the same inexhaustible source; and when he attempts to improve, he soon finds that he is compelled to return to his model and teacher. Be the painter what he may to poetic talent, he is but the transcriber of what nature has produced, as his excellence consists in selection and adaptation. The poet, as his excellence consists in selection and adaptation. The poet, equally, notwithstanding the prejudices in favour of his invention, is the recorder and combiner of what exists, while even his abstractions are but analyses of nature. There is but one inventor: it is the Omnipotent, who has invented all things.—Macculloch.

STATISTICS.—Commercial Interchange between Russia and other European countries.—(From Schneider's Statistique commerciale de la Russie.)

GREAT BRITAIN.—From hence, in 1838, goods were imported by Russia to the amount of 71,303,613 rubles, and to which country Russian goods were exported to the amount of 90,293,377 r. The chief articles of importation were spun cotton, linings, dyewood, salt, coffee, cotton, and cotton goods. The exports consisted of tallow, linseed, hemp, wool, bristles, tins, raw-hides, and iron. The value of the exports were greater than that of the imports by 19,474,310 r.

To Turkey (including Greece) were chiefly exported wheat, iron, tallow, wool; and imported wine, fruit, olive-oil, cotton, and raw silk. The exports were to the amount of 22,907,163 r.; the imports of 13,844,344 r.; balance in favour of Russia, 9,062,819 r.

From the Hanse Towns (Hamburg, Lubbeck, and Bremen), the chief imports were silk goods, silk, muslins, coloured paper, and raw sugar, to the amount of 26,414,060 r. The exports (potash, copper, linseed, furs, lamp-oil, flowers, &c.) were to the amount of 6,137,587 r.; balance in favour of the Hanse-towns, 20,276,473 r.

FRANCE.—The chief imports from this country were wine; the chief exports to it, copper, hemp, linseed, wool, and bristles. The former were to the amount of 14,437,344 r. (wine forming half the value); the latter of 8,620,921 r. (including copper of the value of 3,060,000 r.) Balance in favour of France, 6,157,023 r.

AUSTRIA.—The exports consisted of cattle, wheat, wool, furs, wax, Russian leather, raw hides, &c.; the imports of scythes and sickles, silk, woads, silk, and cotton goods. The former were to the value of 10,932,587 r.; the latter of 11,589,097 r. Balance in favour of Austria, 687,410 r.

PARTIA.—The exports were timber, tallow, linseed, hemp, potash, &c.; the imports were silk, silk goods, fish and salt. The former were to the amount of 11,333,223 r., the latter of 9,416,980 r.; balance in favour of Russia, 1,877,180 r.

ITALY.—The chief imports consisted of fruit, olive-oil, &c., to the amount of 4,689,332 r. Wheat, Russian leather, &c., to the amount of 3,439,647 r. were the principal exports. Balance in favour of Italy, 1,250,905 r.

HOLLAND.—The chief exports were linseed, hemp, timber, potash, copper, &c. to the amount of 10,207,592 r.; the chief imports were madder, balsam, wine, raw sugar, woads, goods, jewels, &c., to the amount altogether of 7,156,912 r. Balance in favour of Russia, 3,111,190 r.

SPAIN AND PORTUGAL.—The chief exports were wax and hemp; the chief imports wine and salt; the former were altogether to the amount of 3,248,029 r., the latter of 4,612,020 r. Balance in favour of Spain and Portugal, 1,363,991 r.

SWEDEN AND NORWAY.—The chief exports were hemp, fish, linseed, and linen; the chief article of importation was salt. The former were to the value of 3,384,419 r.; the latter of 4,196,622 r. Balance in favour of Sweden and Norway, 692,203 r.

DENMARK.—The exports were linseed, wax, hemp, timber, &c., to the amount, altogether of 3,454,886 r. The imports were of different foreign goods to the value of 1,514,553 r. Balance in favour of Russia, 3,940,333 r.—Pat.

CONSUMPTION OF MEAT IN PARIS for 1838:—7,087 bullocks, 20,128 ewes, 79,002 calves, and 426,168 sheep. The trade received 5,818,115 kilogrammes of melted tallow. This shows an increase over the consumption of 1837 of 182 bullocks, 1,061 cows, 802 calves, 40,720 sheep, or 2,500,000 pounds of meat. In the article of melted tallow, however, there is a deficit of 168,822 kilogrammes, which is attributed to the establishment of several melting houses in the environs of Paris, which have taken the raw fat from the slaughter houses of the capital. Since the year 1825 the consumption of Paris was never so great as at present, and yet meat has never been so dear since that period.—Pat.

EXTRAORDINARY CHEMICAL AND OPTICAL DISCOVERY.—At the last sitting of the Academy of Sciences, M. Arago announced one of the most important discoveries in the fine arts that have distinguished the present century, the author of which has already acquired universal reputation by his miraculous diorama—M. Daguerre. It is well known that certain chemical substances, such as chlorate of silver, have the property of changing their colour by the mere contact of light; and it is by a combination of this nature that M. Daguerre has succeeded in fixing upon paper prepared with it the rays that are directed on the table of the camera obscura, and rendering the optical tableau permanent. The exact representation of whatever objects this instrument is directed to, is, as every body is aware, thrown down with vivid colours upon the white table prepared to receive them, and the rays of light that are thus reflected have the power of setting in the way above alluded to upon chlorate of silver, to obtain a permanent copy of it. In this manner an exact representation in light and shade of whatever object may be wished to be viewed is obtained with the perfect accuracy of nature herself, and it is said to have all the softness of a fine aquatint engraving. M. Daguerre had made this discovery some years ago, but he had not then succeeded making the alteration of colour permanent on the chemical substance. This main declaration he has now accomplished, and in this manner has been able, among other business, to make a permanent chemical representation of the Louvre, taken from the Pont des Arts. M. Arago, in commenting upon this most extraordinary discovery, observed that a patent would be by no means able to preserve the rights of the discoverer sufficiently to reward him for his efforts; and he therefore urged the propriety of an application being made to the legislature for a grant of public money as a recompense. M. Biot, on the same occasion, compared M. Daguerre's discovery to the rotunda of the eye, the objects being represented on one and the other surface with almost equal accuracy.—Pat.

THE TOMAHAWK RIVER ON FIRE.—While Mr. J. M. Cooper was prosecuting the removal of McGrew's Shoals, after boring the depth of 275 feet, his auger suddenly dropped, and entirely disappeared. For the space of several moments a deep hollow sound was heard, resembling the rolling noise of distant thunder, from the chain below, and then gushed forth from the shaft thus made, a clear, transparent, oleaginous substance or liquid, which boils up similar to the effervescence of a boiling pot; and which, owing to the current, has gradually diffused itself over the whole surface of the river. A quantity has been collected, and upon application of fire it is found to burn equal to the purest sperm oil. To gratify curiosity and make further tests, fire has been applied to the oil on the water, and the whole surface of the river is now burning, emitting a flame of the most beautiful appearance, about six inches high, and has already extended about half way down to Fort Stoddard, the reflection of which upon the horizon in the night presents a most sublime spectacle, far surpassing in grandeur and beauty of appearance the aurora borealis.—Mobile Journal.

MICHELLEANSOON.

THE LONDON CLUBS EXCELSIOR.—All Paris will talk of an event which is to take place on the 15th of this month—the opening of the drawing-rooms of the new club—"Le Cercle des Deux Mondes." It has been established in the splendid Hotel de France, Rue Richelieu, which Lottinier, the restaurateur, formerly occupied. The rooms have been furnished with architectural magnificence, and display a gorgeousness of which the wonders of the "Arabian Nights" can afford scarcely an idea. In the 15 spacious salons of the "Cercle des Deux Mondes" are collected the richest and softest carpets of the East—the most sumptuous silk and gold tissues of Persia—the most costly velvets of Lyons—the most precious marbles and bronzes of Venice and Florence—the most voluptuous divans to be found in the Constantinian harems—the most convenient arm-chairs of all descriptions supplied by English and whatever articles of furniture the taste and elegance of France yield—never were the art of furnishing and the science of comforts carried to such a degree of refinement and perfection. Every imaginable object of entertainment and amusement has been provided that can make time pass agreeably; to detail the library of 3,000 volumes, the billiard and other tables, &c.—to describe the kitchens adapted to all tastes and appetites, the exquisite cellar of wines, the warming in the style of the Russian palace, and the lightning apparatus, as in the festivities of Naples and Venice, &c., would be to prevent one's believing that all this is to be enjoyed at the moderate subscription of 200 francs a-year. We fear not to assert that the "Cercle des Deux Mondes" is destined to bring about a revolution in the amusements of Parisian society, and to present to the world an establishment far superior to the London clubs.—Paris Paper.

THE DUCES OF LUCCA is making extensive purchases of rare Bibles and Prayer-books, and costly old illuminated copies of the works of our learned theological writers. Two large cases filled with these literary remains have already been shipped for Naples.—Pat.

ARBITRATION SOCIETY.—A Society under this name is now in progress of formation in this town. It has for its object the cheap and equitable settlement of differences arising from disputed accounts or otherwise, without the expensive recourse of applying to the lawyers. Twelve arbitrators are to be elected from the general body of the members, and when any dispute is required to be settled, the parties concerned are each to select one from the twelve; and in case the two selected cannot agree in their decision, they must select an umpire, whose decision shall be binding.—Protestant Observer.

CITY ECONOMY.—A recent writer, of great reputation, in a late number of the London and Westminster Review, stated that New London Bridge, and the approaches, cost upwards of 3,800,000 sterling. It appears that from the year 1824 to 1834 inclusive, 15,577 were expended for the bridge in Parliamentary expenses alone. During the same period 58,884 were expended in law charges, costs on disputed claims, and verdicts in favour of claimants; very considerable portions of these sums went to the creatures of the corporation; 15,562, 9s. 2d. are also charged for "incidental" expenses. Mr. Lambert Jones (the deputy of Sir Matthew Wood, the venerable Reformer of the City), is the chairman of the Bridge Committee, and has lately been lauded as having so well managed the affairs connected with the new bridge, "that many are of opinion there would by this time have been no bridge at all" without him. The Government would have built the bridge and approaches much better at half the cost. As it is, before the Duke of Wellington would lend any money from the Treasury to the City Jobbers, the designs of the latter were withdrawn, and others substituted by the Government.—Pat.

CHURCHES.—In consequence of the high price of bread the inhabitants of the village of Cheries, Bucks, influenced by the recommendation and patronage of their benevolent rector, the Rev. Lord Writtlebury Russell, as well as by the cordial co-operation of the Rev. Mr. Bartlett, the Baptist minister, have volunteered a fund which will enable them to supply the poor with 150 loaves per week at the reduced price of sixpence per quarter loaf during a period of three months; the announcement of which has been received with demonstrations of gratitude by the agricultural labourers and their families, for whose benefit it is principally intended.—Ibid.

THE LAST CONSIDERATION.—A gentleman who lately built a house was shewing it to a friend, and with great glee was pointing out all his various accommodations. "My dear Sir," interrupted the other, "have you made the staircase wide enough to bring down your coffin?"—Ibid.

MATTERS OF THE GRAVEST PUBLIC IMPORTANCE often fail to make their proper impression on the popular mind for want of being followed up by repeated pressing on its attention;—by, as the phrase is in the fashionable world, "keeping up the ball," or, in the political, by "agitating," or, in the religious, by "line upon line, and precept upon precept."—Correspondent.

CHURCH NOBODAYS.—A curious custom exists in the country near the Elbe. The peasant who possesses a bit of land, however small, never enters the church without having a nosegay in his hand, thus claiming the embellishment due to a landholder in the parish. In the neighbourhood of Jamburg, there is no garden that is not in part appropriated to the growth of flowers for Church nosegays.—Pat.

GERMAN'S DESCRIPTION OF A SPEECH BY SERGEANT HENRY.—The learned Sergeant's speech put me exactly in mind of a familiar imprecation in domestic use, commonly called an extingisher;—it began at a point, and on it went, whirling and whirling, until at last it fairly put the question out altogether.—Ibid.

HOW TO COMMIT MURDER QUIETLY.—Take a young lady, and tell her that she has a very pretty foot. She will then wear small, thin shoes—go out in the wet—catch a cold—she will become a fever, and she will die in a month.—New York Mirror.

THE HANDSOMEN TO THE JUDGES.—"Did your Lordship ever attend at killing-time, at the Old Bailey? If not, pray favour me with your company; not on the gallows, but staying in the street, amidst the crowd that always assembles when I am at work for you and the sheriffs. Perhaps it will add to the zest, if you come now. I have a young woman to offend, supplied by yourself. Will the fluttering of her petticoats, as she swings in the wind, produce a pleasant wound in your ears, my learned master? Fail not to watch the people;—the men, women, and children—good, bad, and indifferent—who have gathered to behold the sacred majesty of the law. You will see such flailing of eyes, grinding of teeth;—you will hear sighs, and groans, and words of rage and hatred, with fierce curses on yourself and me;—and their laughter, such as it is, of an unnatural kind, that will make you start;—and jests on the death, that will make you sick. You will find—who should you feel any more than your faithful journeyman? We shall get to our breakfast with good appetites, and a firm conviction, that every hanging-bout changes many sneaking pilferers into venge robbers, fastid or murder.

"A few years ago, I was called out of town to hang a little boy for killing, with malice aforethought. If guilty, he must have been in the habit of going to executions. Ten thousand people came to dabble in the poor young creature's blood. That was the youngest fellow-creature I never handled in the way of our business; and a beautiful child he was, too, as you may have seen by the papers, with a straight nose, large blue eyes, and golden hair. I have no heart; no feelings; who has in our calling? But those who came to see me struggle that tender youngster, have hearts and feelings as we once had, there's no-doubt; for what they saw was fit to make them so hard as your current or his master. They saw that stripling lifted, flailing, on to the gallows; his smooth cheeks of the colour of wood-slab; his little limbs trembling; and his bosom heaving sigh after sigh, as if body and soul were parting without any help. This was not a downright murder; for there was scarce any life to take out of him. When I began to pull the cap over his baby-face, he pressed his mouth to my hand, (his mother's hand, I have heard) as if he would kiss me, and gave me a beseeching look, just as a calf will lick the butcher's hand. But cattle do not speak; this creature muttered, "Pray, Sir, don't hurt me." "My dear," answered I, "you should have spoken to my masters; I'm only the journeyman, and must do as I am bid." This made him cry, which seemed a relief to him; and I do think I should have cried myself, if I had not heard shouts from the crowd: "Poor lamb!—haste! murder!" "Quick," said the sheriff. "Ready," said I. The Rev. gentlemen gave me the wink; the drop fell—one kick, and he away to and fro, dead, as the feelings of the Christian people of England.

"The crowd dispersed; some averring, some weeping, with passionate exclamations; some averring, as if hell had broke loose; and some laughing, while they cracked blackguard jokes on you and me, and the heaven, and the dangling corpse. They had come for the sight, they would have come to see an angel murdered. They had come to get drunk with strong excitement; they went back reeling and flitting with the hot debauch. They had come to rind in the passions of fear and pity; they went back, some in a fever of rage, some hurrying with hate, some hardened in heart like me, or you; all sunk down in their own respect, ready to make light of pain and blood, corrupted by the indecent show, and more fit than ever to make work for us, the Judge and the Hangman.

"O wise Lawmakers! who think to soften the hearts of the people—to make them gentle and good—by giving them a feeling of respect for themselves and others, by showing them sights like this!"—1844.

TURNPIKE LEGISLATION.—The Debts on Turnpike Roads in England and Wales amount to upwards of eight millions and a-half; for a great portion of which a very fragile security will remain when railways (if ever) come into full operation.—Fat.

ADVANTAGES OF POVERTY IN EARLY LIFE.—An English judge being asked what contributed most to success at the bar, replied, "Some success by great talent, some by high connections, some by a miracle, but the majority by commencing without a shilling."—Metropolitan Magazine.

COLONIALS.

JAMAICA.—The news is to the 3rd of December. It is of great importance, we think, that the new House of Assembly is likely, we may say is sure—to consist of the same men as the old, with rather an alteration for the worse. This result by no means surprises us, when we consider by whom that honourable body is chosen. Jamaica contains the oppressors and the oppressed, the wolves and the flock; and the election is in the hands of the oppressors—it is the wolf choosing for the lamb. The utterly disproportionate number by which this representative body is chosen is absolutely absurd; it might be said to be ridiculous, if it were not so intolerable. Two members of the House of Assembly are returned, for example, by five-and-twenty electors for a parish containing perhaps five-and-twenty thousand inhabitants! These inhabitants being now freemen, all possessing equal rights!! And these five-and-twenty gentlemen being the perpetual oppressors, who have been long accustomed to trample on the thousands, and lash, and torment, and murder them, as slaves!! What can be expected from such an election? Or what can be more imperatively demanded than an extension of the elective franchise in Jamaica?

BARBADOS.—Accounts to the 21st of November are by no means of so pleasing a character as the last. The Barbados Liberal discloses a system of wholesale oppression which almost surpasses belief. The magistrates are suing persons for the first dare on actions brought against them when they were apparent, and not then demanded because they had nothing to pay. Thus we have Justices Morris and Lewis suing Bligny Adams for the sum of 3s. 11d., and constable Nanderick for 1s. 11d. more, "for magistrates, and constables free of the law." If life was convicted, of course; but, thanks to the Court of Appeal, room was found in this case to invalidate the conviction.

BAITIAN GUIANA.—Advices are received to the 11th of November. Nearly 300 labourers had been introduced under the emigration ordinance, and steamers were to be got ready for the quicker conveyance of others. In one point, however, the scheme is admitted to have been a failure; the Governors of the other colonies will not patronise it, by seconding the application of agents. Efforts will now be made to appoint agents privately; we shall see what result.

TRINIDAD.—A similar ordinance for encouraging emigration was before the council, and where it said they wanted 3,000 labourers, fear was entertained lest no respectable person would accept the agency. A dirty business indeed it must be, if it can be taken up only by persons who are deemed not respectable in the West Indies!

DEMERARA.—We have also an opportunity, by means of a private letter from Demerara, dated Nov. 1, of correcting a statement which has been current in the papers, that the emigrants "sing well" there. Our correspondent tells a very different story. He writes as follows:

"I see the British public has been deceived with the fact that the coolies are doing 'well.' Such is not the fact; the poor friendless creatures are miserably treated—at least I can speak confidently of plantation Belle Vue. On this estate, we have made two attempts to escape, as they say, to go to Calcutta; in the first, twenty-two succeeded by night to cross the river—landing on the opposite shore they attempted to explore the woods, but, after undergoing much fatigue and danger, they were retaken at the back of plantation Helderling, and conveyed again to the estate. In the last attempt, they were discovered by the watch of the night, and driven back. I saw a group of them last week in custody of the pulley, who were taking them to the public buildings; their offence I did not learn. The friend of Mr. Berkeley, who is a teacher on the place, respecting food; he said they had enough of rice, and, I think, of fat, but he said, 'Dread—be well more than they did on the other side of the river, Belle Vue, and the manager (Russell) refuse to give a rag of clothes to bury them in. I had one of these rascals, at my own place, who is capable of giving a few words in English. He told me, 'Russell no good—coolie sick—coolie no more.' He was all but naked; and a faded green garment, a few old raiments, which seemed highly to please him. I have said here with the Company's rump; the rump was a rag, it is not this scandalous? They have been offered by the merchants two bits a piece for them. I do not believe they eat it at its value in the colony. Ought not the planters to be compelled to give their value in Demerara silver currency? I have heard that two from Glanville's estate escaped on a bush, and were captured by Captain's Falant, at Fort Island, the Essequibo river, and brought back to the plantation. Surely these things are far from being 'well.' The one alluded to above, told me, 'Calcutta better!'—Emancipator.

SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVERY QUESTION IN CONGRESS.—The latest intelligence from Washington was, that a series of resolutions had been passed in Congress by an overwhelming majority against the discussion of the abolition question. The first resolution was—"That the Government is of limited powers, and that, by the constitution of the United States, Congress has no jurisdiction whatever over the institution of slavery in the several states of the confederacy." The last was as follows:—"Resolved, therefore, that all attempts on the part of Congress to abolish slavery in the districts of Columbia, or the territories, or to prohibit the removal of the slaves from state to state, or to discriminate between the constitution of one portion of the confederacy and another, with the views aforesaid, are in violation of the constitutional principles on which the union of these states rests, and beyond the jurisdiction of Congress. And that every petition, memorial, resolution, proposition, or paper, touching or relating to any way, or to any extent whatever, to slavery is aforesaid, or the abolition thereof, shall, without any further action thereon, be laid on the table, without printing, reading, debate, or reference." Question put—Shall the resolutions pass? Yeas, 101; nays, 6.—New York Paper.

CARE OF GOOD HOPE.—We have had the gratification of perusing a letter from a requested Missionary at 1731 most interesting settlement, Philip Town, East River, dated October 4, 1838, which, after giving a most satisfactory account of the Missionary station, refers in the following terms to the general state of the Cape Colony.

"We have peace with the Caffers. The new system introduced by Captain Stockenström, the Lieutenant-Governor, has quite 1st brigade of horse artillery, in General Orders of the 12th instant, will remain attached to the second troop 2d brigade, while it may be employed in field service; and 1st Lieutenant E. Sumnerland will continue to officiate as Adjutant to the 1st brigade, during the absence of Lieutenant Anderson, or until further orders. 3d brigade of horse artillery.—1st Lieutenant S. Barstoll, Native Horse, is removed from the 3rd to the 6th battalion of artillery, vice Housell Barks transferred to the civil station of Illoreppore.

The undermentioned officers have leave of absence:

3d company 2d battalion of artillery.—1st Lieutenant and Brevet Captain A. P. Beale, from 18th February to 1st March to remain in the vicinity of Beas, on medical certificate.

3d company 2d battalion of artillery.—2d Lieutenant J. Rogers, from 18th November 1832 to 16th November 1833, in extension, to remain at Saharoon, on medical certificate.

24th regiment native infantry.—Lieutenant A. Q. Topper, from 10th January to 25th January, in extension, to enable him to rejoin his regiment.

Head Quarters, Meerut, 23d February, 1833.

The Division order of the 19th instant, directing Ensign G. Strangways, attached to the 3d regt, to join and do duty with the 30th regiment of native infantry, is confirmed.

Lieutenant Colonel A. White's regimental order of the 14th of December last, directing the officers of the 1st and 2nd battalions to provide themselves with boats and proceed with the head quarters of the corps to Baddya by water, is, with the sanction of the Right Honourable the Governor General, confirmed.

Assistant Surgeon General removed from the 44th regiment of native infantry, and appointed to the medical charge of the recruit ship under orders to proceed to Allypore; the officer commanding the Cawnpore division will make arrangements for relieving the Assistant Surgeon from his present charge, and for affording medical aid to the left wing of the 44th regiment, until it rejoins the head quarters of the corps at Baddya.

The Commissioner at Sonner having pronounced Shaleh Khayret Alee, Native Doctor, of the 6th regiment of native infantry, innocent of the charge of theft in which he had been in confinement since the 6th of July last, the General Order of the 11th instant, which refers to him, is hereby cancelled.

The undermentioned officers have leave of absence: 65th regiment native infantry.—Major G. J. B. Johnston, from 1st March to 1st September, to remain at and proceed with the head quarters of the corps to Baddya by water, in the service. 24th regiment native infantry.—Ensign E. N. Dickenson, from 6th February to 6th March, to visit the Presidency, preparatory to submitting an application for furlough to Europe, on medical certificate.

Head Quarters, Meerut, 24th February, 1833.

The following extract of a military letter from the Honourable the Court of Directors is published for the information of the Veterinary Surgeons of this establishment:

Letter from the Honourable the Court of Directors, No. 84, dated 14th March 1833.

Letter dated 24th April, 1833.

Transmit for the consideration and orders of the Court, a memorial addressed by certain Veterinary Surgeons on the Bengal Establishment, in the Governor General, praying to be allowed to be admitted subscribers to the Bengal Medical Dispensing Fund, notwithstanding with orders of various papers, showing that an Indulgence similar to that solicited has been granted to Veterinary Surgeons at Madras.

Major J. McLaren's regimental order of the 3rd ultimo, appointing Lieutenant J. J. Mackay, to act as Adjutant to the left wing of the 19th native infantry, during its separation from regimental head quarters, is confirmed.

Surgeon G. T. Urquhart, of the 1st regiment of light cavalry, is appointed to the medical charge of the head quarters staff and establishments, from the 1st instant, in the room of Surgeon Turnbull, who has marched with his regiment.

Head Quarters, Meerut, 26th February, 1833.

At a general court martial, assembled at Dinapore on Saturday the 2d day of February 1833, Assistant Surgeon Andrew Drummond was sentenced on the following charge:—

Charge.—For conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, in the following instances:—

1st. In having, at various times, previous to June 1832, appropriated to his own use several sums drawn by him, as Post Master at Illoreppore, on accounts at Chyabab and of hawk buyers to and from Jilman and Karby.

2nd. In having by habitual intemperance, contributed to induce a degree of mental disorder, which, on the 2d of September 1832, incapacitated him for the discharge of his professional and other duties.

Findings.—The court, upon evidence before it, finds the prisoner Assistant Surgeon Andrew Drummond, on the charge preferred against him.

Of the first instance, guilty. Of the second instance, guilty. The court is further of opinion, that the conduct of which it has found Assistant Surgeon Andrew Drummond guilty, was unbecoming an officer and a gentleman.

Sentence.—The court sentences Assistant Surgeon Andrew Drummond to be discharged from the service.

Confirmed. (Signed) JOHN RAMSAY, Major General.

26th February, 1833.

The sentence to have effect from the date of this order being made known to Mr. Drummond.

J. M. LUMLEY, Major General, Adjutant General of the Army.

Head Quarters, Meerut, 26th February, 1833.

At a general court martial, assembled at Dinapore, on Saturday the 2d day of February, 1833, Lieutenant Kenneth Wallace Elmslie, of the 63d regiment native infantry, was arraigned on the following charge:—

Charge.—For conduct unbecoming the character of an officer and a gentleman, in the following instances:—

1st. For having, on the 24th December 1832, entered the bungalow of Surgeon John Menzies, and, with a loud voice and violent gestures, delivered a hostile message from Surgeon Henry Blaken, grounded on circumstances which Lieutenant Elmslie well knew had been officially reported by Surgeon Menzies to Lieutenant Colonel Thomas Dundas, commanding the regiment.

2nd. In having subsequently, on the same day, went to Surgeon Menzies, and to other officers for general circulation, copies of a paper signed by Lieutenant Elmslie, in the nature of a posting of Surgeon Menzies.

3rd. In having, on the 10th December 1832, in a note addressed to Surgeon Menzies, asserted that the paper referred to in the second instance, had been circulated, and requested that it might be returned, but without making any apology for having written it; thereby suggesting the erroneous inference that it had not been shown to officers of other regiments.

Findings.—The court is of opinion, from the evidence recorded, that Lieutenant Kenneth Wallace Elmslie, of the 63d regiment native infantry, is.

On the first and second instance of the charge, guilty.

And on the third instance, guilty with the qualification, that the court does not conceive he had any wilful design to mislead Mr. Surgeon Menzies with respect to the erroneous inference his note suggested.

The court is further of opinion, that the quality of conduct is not becoming the character of an officer and a gentleman.

Sentence.—The court sentences Lieutenant Kenneth Wallace Elmslie, of the 63d regiment native infantry, to be suspended from rank, pay, and allowance, for six (6) months.

Confirmed. (Signed) JOHN RAMSAY, Major General.

26th February, 1833.

The sentence to have effect from the date of its publication at Dinapore.

Detachment of artillery.

Lieutenant Colonel W. H. Hewitt's 6th regiment light cavalry, detachment order of the 13th of December 24th instant, appointing Lieutenant J. A. D. Poynter, of the 6th regiment of light cavalry, to act as detachment staff to the troops at Baddya, is confirmed.

Lieutenant Colonel G. W. Moseley's regimental order of the 18th instant, appointing Lieutenant J. Weirfield to act as Adjutant to four companies of the 34th native infantry, proceeding on court duty with the Right Honourable the Governor General, is confirmed.

The court division order of the 24th instant, appointing Captain J. P. Turner, of the 6th regiment of native infantry, to officiate as Deputy Judge Advocate at a native general court martial directed to assemble at Almorah, is confirmed.

The Commander of the Forces directs the following removals of medical officers:

Surgeons C. Meekinnon, from the 43d to the 34d regiment of native infantry.

Surgeon E. J. Freeman, M. D., (on furlough) from the latter to the former corps.

Surgeon G. Baillie, (on furlough) from the 10th to the 63d regiment of native infantry, and Surgeon John Menzies, from the latter to the former.

Assistant Surgeon T. W. Wilson, M. D., from the 32d to the 63d regiment of native infantry, which he will proceed to join on being relieved from his present charge.

The undermentioned uses, of the regiment of artillery, who volunteered for the artillery school for the service of Shah Shaha, on the terms specified in General Orders of the 1st of August last, are transferred to the Town Major's list, from that date:

Corporal John Hille, from the 1st troop 1st brigade.

Corporal Charles Carlisle, from the 1st troop 2d brigade.

Farrier William Spears, from the 1st troop 2d brigade.

Sergeant Thomas Murphy, from the 2d troop 2d brigade.

Bombardier Patrick McGilchrist, from the 2d troop 2d brigade.

Sergeant Elias Grove, from the 1st troop 2d brigade.

Gunner John Milligan, from the 3d troop 2d brigade.

Gunner Thomas Shaleh, of the 3d troop 2d brigade of horse artillery, is transferred to the Town Major's list, and attached to Shah Shaha's artillery, in the room of Corporal Charles Carlisle, who is permitted to rejoin the brigade to which he belonged.

The undermentioned officers have leave of absence: 3d company of artillery.—Lieutenant and Brevet Captain E. Madden, Adjutant and Quarter Master, from 1st March to 1st November, to visit the hills north of Dehra, on medical certificate.

Head Quarters, Meerut, 27th February, 1833.

The regimental order of the 11th instant, appointing Lieutenant and Brevet Captain J. Dymon to officiate as Interpreter and Quarter Master to the 21st Regt. of native infantry, during the absence, on duty, of Lieut. Interpreter and Quarter Master Beant, is confirmed.

Lieutenant Colonel C. W. B. Fowler, of the invalid establishment, is, with the sanction of Government, permitted to reside, and draw his allowances, at the Presidency.

The undermentioned officers have leave of absence: 67th regiment native infantry.—Lieutenant Colonel H. L. White, from 25th February to 28th March, to visit the Presidency, on private affairs.

3d. This cancels the leave granted in General Orders of the 21st instant.

34th regiment native infantry.—Lieutenant Interpreter and Quarter Master G. W. Hamilton, from 14th March to 15th September, to visit Simla, on private affairs.

41th regiment native infantry.—Captain M. Hargan, from 26th February to 26th February 1833, to visit the hills north of Dehra, on medical certificate.

POLICY OF THE INDIAN GOVERNMENT.—The last steam mail brings intelligence that the present military movements beyond the Indus, have excited extraordinary attention in the Parliamentary circles. In the debate on the Address in both Houses, a strong feeling of hostility to the policy which has been pursued, was manifested by some of the most influential speakers; and there is every probability that the measures of Lord Auckland will be condemned, with an uncommon severity. That this unexpected zeal, after years of lethargy, arises out of no tender anxiety for the welfare of India, but from feelings of opposition to the political party with which Lord Auckland is identified, is evident upon the face of things. It is unfortunate for this country, that its affairs should never be deemed worthy of the attention of the legislature, except when they can be made subservient to the purposes of party hostility. At the time when the Charter was under discussion, when the fate of more than a hundred millions hung in the balance, it was found impossible to secure the attendance of members; and measures, which were to decide whether India, with its vast population, should advance or retrograde in civilization and improvement during the ensuing twenty years, were contemptuously hurried through the house. Now that the very existence of the empire has been put in jeopardy by a combination of hostile powers, a hue and cry is about to be raised, because the local government has adopted the strongest and most despotic measures to anticipate danger, and to break up the confederacy; and the wisdom of Parliament is to be exemplified, by a repetition of those factious proceedings, which last year arrested the Earl of Durham in the pacification and settlement of Canada. From the tone of the remarks which were made on the very first day of the Session, and which indicate too plainly the complexion of future discussions, there is every reason to fear that, in the eagerness to condemn Lord Auckland's policy, the real state of the question will be altogether lost sight of. Instead of examining the strength of the disease, the attention of the legislature will be directed only to an analysis of the remedy which has been applied. There can be no doubt that the danger which has called the Army of the Indus into the field, is altogether without precedent, since we first planted our foot in India. On every previous occasion our difficulties have arisen from combinations within the Indus. At present, a crisis we are threatened with invasion by a conjunction of powers beyond that river, organized by a great European power, of vast resources. Embassies have been diligently employed through the length and breadth of Hindoostan, in sowing the seeds of disaffection among our own subjects, in rousing to hostility the minds of our subordinate allies, and in turning the eyes of India to the grand expedition which was represented as coming down from the West to put an end to our empire. These circumstances of unexampled difficulty, which called for instantaneous action, and for the adoption of a new and original plan of policy, calculated to meet the emergency, appear to have been altogether lost sight of by the speakers in Parliament: and Lord Auckland is to be censured for not having sat down on the banks of the Indus calmly to await the irruption of the Western hordes.

If the dangers which threatened the empire had been imaginary; if they had even been exaggerated, there might have been some ground for censuring an expedition, which involved us in the web of Afghan politics. But these dangers were palpable and imminent. The intrigues of Russia had altogether changed the aspect of affairs in Asia. It was no longer a question whether the regions of Western Asia should be subjected to the predominance of a European influence; the only question which it was left to our option to consider, was, whether that influence should be British or Russian; whether it should be friendly or hostile to the stability of our empire in the East. On the policy of embarrassing ourselves with the task of restoring Shah Soojah on the throne of Cabul, there may be some misgivings. On the policy of making a bold demonstration of our strength beyond the Indus, and of thereby preventing the establishment of Russian influence in Afghanistan, in the same manner in which it has been imposed on Persia, there can be no shadow of a doubt. Had Lord Auckland pursued that course, which might have exempted him, perhaps, from the censure of the Parliamentary orators, Russia would have been on the banks of the Indus, with all the rabble of Western Asia at her heels. To perceive the extent of the danger which the vigorous measures of Government have, we trust, averted, we have only to read the Argburgh Gazette, of the 24th January, from which we make an extract. It is impossible to doubt for a moment the mint in which that article was coined. The intimate and minute knowledge which it exhibits of the condition and relations of our Indian empire, not only prove the source from whence it was derived, but it also shows how accurately the Russian cabinet contrives to keep itself informed of all that passes in the East.

“Without doubt, circumstances are less favourable for Russia now than they were a few months since. At that time the fall of Herat might be counted on; the loss of that place would have insured the fall of English supremacy in Southern Asia; Herat would have become the central point of the Russo-Persian confederations; and from that place troops might have been sent to India with greater rapidity than England could have sent them. In order to avoid the consequences which such a catastrophe might have occasioned, Lord Auckland is endeavouring to re-establish unity in Afghanistan, and it is difficult to believe, as some journals have stated, that he has received orders from his Government to renounce the campaign against Cabul. The choice, however, made of the aged Soojah for the sovereignty of Cabul may have been only a transitory measure, destined to mark the restoration of his nephew Kurram, the energetic defender of Herat, to the exclusive sovereignty of all Afghanistan. Ranjeet Singh would necessarily oppose such a project. This ally of England would never allow himself to be shut in between two Powers, one of which he would some day become the victim. The Sikhs, already endowed with a military education rather advanced, are, like him, too powerful to agree to their becoming mere instruments to the East India Company, and the pride of the spirit that animates them is the more recently brought that the passage of the Punjab has been refused to the English. The alliance of the English with the aged Maharajah can only be looked on as a forced alliance, destined to be broken as soon as a rupture can take place without compromising the safety of the empire of Ranjeet Singh. If Lord Auckland had shown, under these circumstances, as much irresolution as he does towards the Burmans, English interests would have suffered severely, and the work of the Russians would have been simplified. The situation of the English in India is far from being satisfactory in any case; a war with the Burman seems to be inevitable, and the inhabitants of Nepal are only waiting for a favourable moment to make the attack. The English can oppose to these great movements of enemies the Indian army, already greatly demoralized; and the reinforcements to be drawn from the mother country or the colonies are too inconsiderable to decide the struggle. In the interior of India the English have before them none but a hostile population, which support with impatience a foreign yoke; the people have gained nothing by the English occupation of their country; national industry has been completely ruined; the inferior classes are impoverished by the efforts of the English, whose machinery excludes all competition. Those causes brought about the horrible famine which in 1837 and 1838 decimated the population. Russia, on the contrary, if a war should break out, would find even in India powerful auxiliaries; and she would have for her the sympathies of the population, tired of English domination. The English, who are aware of this state of things, neglect an opportunity of keeping for themselves points of support in the East Indies. Hence the repeated efforts of England to establish more rapid communications with India by the Red Sea; hence the occupation of Aden, on the coast of Arabia. This occupation seems more particularly to menace the Pasha of Egypt, who would become the vassal of England, if that power could realize its plans, for Egypt forms the central point of the line of communication between England and India."

This article is a clear and decisive reply to all the oratory which may be employed, during the present Session, in condemning Lord Auckland's vigorous measures. Had Lord Auckland shown irresolution, the work of the Russians would have been simplified. Here is the naked truth from our enemies. Here is an acknowledgement that Russia has been foiled by those measures which it is proposed to brand with Parliamentary censure. His Lordship has, to all present appearance, preserved the peace, not of Asia only, but also of Europe. If the Indian Government had allowed Herat to become the central point of the Russo-Persian expeditions, a war with Russia would have been inevitable; and a war between Russia and England could scarcely fail to involve the whole continent of Europe in hostilities. Irresolution on the part of Lord Auckland would, therefore, only have hastened a rupture with the Czar, and compromised the peace of Europe.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON PRISON DISCIPLINE: TRANSPORTATION.—We are not without some apprehension, that our readers may be rather dissatisfied with our leading theme, week after week, of imprisonment and its uncomfortable associations; but, on the present occasion, they will perceive we intend varying the treatment with an excursion abroad. Perhaps sufficient excuse for us will be found in this diversity. If not, proving utilitarians as we are, we must be content with the company and approbation of those who can take pleasure in the examination of what is useful and important. Especially would we appeal to the humanity of our readers, whilst we continue our survey of the unhappy, and often wretched, and neglected denizens of our goals and convict colonies.

We have before stated, that between the exposition of the present state and system of our Indian Prison Discipline, and the great reform in it that is now proposed, there occurs a parenthesis in the Report of the Committee, on the cognate subject of Transportation. It is this portion of the Report to which we would now call attention. And it is singular enough, that a contemporaneous Report on the same subject, by a Committee of the House of Commons, should be before us at the same time: the recommendations of which are in direct and earnest contradiction to those of our Committee in Calcutta. That Report is one of the most searching character, and discloses things so appalling, us, in the language adopted by the Committee from one of its witnesses, to make the blood curdle. It concludes with recommending, 1st. That transportation to New South Wales, and the settled districts of Van Diemen's Land, be discountinued as soon as possible: 2d. That crimes now punishable by transportation, should be punished in future by confinement with hard labour, at home or abroad, for various periods from two to fifteen years: 3d. That the Penitentiaries that may be established abroad, should be strictly limited to those places wherein there are at present no free settlers, and wherein effectual security can be taken against the future resort of such settlers: 4th. That the existing practice of abridging the periods of punishment of convicts, in consequence of good behaviour, be brought under strict regulation: 5th. That on account of the difficulty a convict finds in England, in procuring the means of honest livelihood after the expiration of his sentence, and the temptations to which he is thereby exposed, he should, if he has uniformly conducted himself well during his confinement, receive encouragement to leave the country with the prospect of supporting himself by regular industry, and ultimately regaining the place in society which he had forfeited by crime: and, 6th. That convicts who have been punished abroad should be compelled to leave the place of their punishment, and the means of doing so should be afforded them by Government.

Hence it appears, that the House of Commons' Committee consider exile not only ineffective for determent, but even sufficiently attractive to be held out as a reward for good behaviour. They likewise shew it, by fearful proof, to be demoralizing, perhaps beyond any thing ever known on earth, to the convicts themselves; and both demoralizing, and economically injurious, to the last degree, to the colonists amongst whom they are sent. These conclusions present, indeed, no great novelty. Both the facts, and the general principles from which they are deduced, have been long forcing themselves, with increasing power, upon public attention. Consequently they were not unknown, nor unthought of, by our Indian Committee: who, nevertheless, consider the cases of convicts in India, and convicts in England, to be so essentially different, that with us the whole matter is reversed. The argument by which they arrive at a conclusion so little to have been expected, is conducted with ability of the highest order. As a philosophical discussion, it will bear comparison with any thing of the kind we have seen. Yet we cannot say we are prepared to yield assent to it.

On this, as on the other branch of their inquiry, the Committee first describe the present system of the matter under examination; then lay down the general principles which apply to it; and, lastly, propose the new economy they would recommend. In describing the present system of Indian transportation, they begin by enumerating the different places of settlement for our convicts. These are Singapore, Penang, Malacca, the Tannassarian Provinces, and the Mauritius for Native convicts: and Van Diemen's Land and New South Wales for European. These last the Committee seem to have thought beyond their range: we are, therefore, told little about them. Respecting the others, however, the Report contains ample information relative to the treatment, employment, health, and morals of the convicts; and all the details connected with the pecuniary profit or loss of the system under which they are placed. The principal facts ascertained are, that no uniform scheme of treatment and employment prevails: at Singapore the management of them appears to be the best; in the Tannassarian Provinces it is the severest. But in all, the wants and even comforts of the convict are liberally provided for: and they are employed, some as servants to private individuals, but the great majority on public works. In all but the Tannassarian Coast they appear to be a class, who are left to maintain themselves and do what they like, and merely find security for their presence whenever required. At Penang, it seems, a certain wealthy Bengalee, transported a few years ago by the Calcutta Supreme Court for a heinous offence, is carrying on trade, and is allowed to conduct himself exactly as any free merchant would do. On the Tenasserim Coast, the annual mortality is about 5. 7; at the other settlements it does not exceed 5. per cent.; which, it will be remembered, is not greatly above the half of the average convict mortality of the Lower Provinces of Bengal. Of the morals of the convicts it is sufficiently testified, that generally they are not worse than those of free men of the same class:—"And, certainly, the fact seems to be, that several of them are sought after as servants, in preference to all other servants; that many others gain their own livelihood peaceably, and even creditably, and that many are converted into useful members of society." Such is the price of labour in these settlements, that generally the whole expenses of the convicts are more than met by their work. At Singapore the monthly cost of a convict is Rs. 3-12-4; and the value of his labour is Rs. 5 8 9; but this is the most favourable of the whole. The average expense of transporting a Native convict is about 27 Rupees.

The Committee having gone through these preliminary statements, proceed to unfold their views of transportation generally. Having avowed the opinion that transportation is a punishment which it is inexpedient to give up, they insist upon its being always for life, as it is now in all the Company's Courts, and not for various periods as in the Queen's Courts. The objections that may be urged to their opinion are then fully taken into consideration. It is unnecessary we should follow the Committee through their discussion of them. The minor objections to transportation they would provide against by discipline: those of greater weight they conceive to be rendered void by the peculiarities of our Indian population, and of the settlements to which they are sent.

"The fact seems to be," say the Committee, "that there are peculiar advantages in the application of this punishment to a native of this country. The general morals of the people may possibly be bad enough, but an Indian criminal is probably a better man than any other criminal of the same sort. His general character certainly differs less from that of the mass of his countrymen than would be the case in more civilized and moral countries. A large proportion of the crimes in this country are committed by persons whose tribe have done the same, time out of mind, and they are almost as naturally the result of habit, as another man's honest trade. Many more are committed, as it were, professionally by the members of immense confederations, who are not much worse than other people in matters unconnected with their profession. Owing to feelings and principles which we can never comprehend, there is little or no consciousness of moral guilt amongst these classes on account of the exercise of what they regard as their proper business.

"In all these cases it is evident that when the ties of caste or society are broken, as completely as by death, and when the man is torn away for ever from his family and friends, and thrown into what it is scarcely a metaphor to call a new world to him, the obstacles to the commencement of an honest life are much fewer than in the case of a man whose crime is but the fruit of a general depravity of character, such as is usually the crime of an English malefactor.

"We have ready made to our hands a weapon of tremendous power. The horror with which the people regard transportation is a feeling born with them, and the questions whether it be a wise or a foolish feeling, whether it be a just deduction from true premises or the result of ignorance and superstition, are nothing to the purpose. We have the extraordinary opportunity of punishing with extreme effect towards deterring others, with sufficient effect in incapacitating the criminal for future crime, with the chance (obtainable in no other way) of rendering him a useful member of society, and all this with the infliction of less real pain than that which is inflicted by other punishment not half so much dreaded.

"The above comparison has induced us to recommend the retention of the punishment of transportation. But our arguments carry us much further than this. In this country, and at the present time, transportation for life, whilst it causes less pain, excites amongst the great mass of the people greater terror than imprisonment for life. At the capitals of the Presidencies, where transportation for terms of years is a common punishment, the feeling is not the same; yet in them too the dread of this punishment is doubtless susceptible of being very much increased by a change of system. Probably also in the neighbourhood of all seaports the feeling generally is less strong than it is with the mass of the people. Sea-faring people have undoubtedly none of this penitential feeling. But those who fall within these exceptions form but a small portion of the population of British India. Nevertheless they are sufficiently numerous to prevent our arguments from applying with their full effect, universally. Yet our arguments apply to their full extent as generally, that if the Government should coincide in our views, in order to make the most use, by way of example, of the same annual infliction, the penalty of transportation for life ought to be generally preferred to that of imprisonment for life for the most heinous offences not punished with death. This is the course which, with one dissenting voice, the Committee recommend. Our colleague Mr. Macfarlan dissents from our opinion on the subject of transportation, and he, therefore, does not concur in this recommendation. He had earned a minute on this point which is appended to this report. On the other hand our colleagues Sir Edward Ryan, Sir John Grant, and Mr. J. P. Grant would go much further in their recommendation. They feel insurmountable objection to the punishment of imprisonment for life, which they think ought to be entirely discontinued, transportation for life being substituted for it where necessary. They have entered a minute on this subject under paragraph 278."

The Committee close the investigation by stating the system of transportation they would propose for adoption. It requires there should be no many convict settlements, that prisoners of the same gang or family should never be sent to one place. The convicts are to pass through certain gradations of severity, the worst coming first, in order that in their own minds the first and recollections of their crimes should be associated with the greatest suffering under their punishment; any intelligence from them to their homes should be, whilst the interest in them continues the liveliest, such as to prove the most deterring to others; and yet that the prospect of alleviation may afford encouragement to the convicts to seek reformation. It is, therefore, recommended that the first seven years of a convict's banishment be spent in the first class, at hard labour by day, and in prison by night, with hard fare, no money allowance whatever, and no indulgence not necessary to health. The second class may be allowed a share of their earnings in money, or, in working for Government, a small payment when they work well. They may be allowed to associate together, to cook their own victuals, and be made superintendents of other convicts. The least time to be passed in this class should be five years. The third class may receive a higher money allowance, be allowed to marry, be apprenticed to private persons, or employed as servants in Government Offices. Convicts, after having three years in this class, may be promoted for good behaviour, by the Superintendent, into a fourth class, who may be allowed to get their own livelihood, if they please, subject to whatever restrictions may be proper, to secure their remaining in the convict settlement for life, and being constantly under the eye of the Superintendent.

The Committee urge the immediate adoption of such of their recommendations on this subject, as may meet with the approbation of His Lordship in Council. And for obtaining effective superintendence of the convicts, they are inclined to think that those at Penang and Malacca had better be removed to Singapore and the Teasenerius Coast. At the former there is a responsible officer in charge of the convicts, and there ought to be one also at the latter.

Our readers may now wish to know, what reception the Government has given to the Report of the Committee, and what good, therefore, is likely to come out of it. On this point we shall endeavour to satisfy them next week. One thing is pretty clear: our Rulers, like others elsewhere, are not beyond deriving benefit from those humble instruments, called shoppers. We trust, therefore, a sufficient supply of them may be found for their use.

INLAND STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.—A few days ago, we were favoured with a copy of the Report of "A Committee formed to show the prospects of a Company, established in London, for the conducting of the Inland Navigation of India by Steam," and by the last Mail we have received a copy of the Morning Herald of the 11th of February, which gives a report of the meeting held in London to consider the Report. A very strong opposition was made to its reception by several gentlemen, well acquainted with the subject; but as they brought forward no distinct objection to its statements and calculations, their objections were over-ruled after a very stormy debate.

Gratly as we may covet the aid of British capital towards the improvement of our internal communication in India, we are constrained to remark, that the calculations of the Report are built on erroneous data; and that the prospects held out by it, of a return of forty per cent. on the capital, are altogether fallacious. We fully coincide with the very accurate observations which the Englishman has published in his examination of the subject; and would entreat those who have taken an interest in the undertaking, to pause before they embark their capital in it. With an entering into minute details, a few hard facts will be sufficient to shew the unsound basis on which the scheme rests. The estimated annual expenditure for ten Iron Steam Boats, and ten Accommodation Vessels, is put down at £73,973*l.*; the annual receipts are calculated at 120,337*l.*, and a balance is thus exhibited of a clear profit of 47,364*l.* The Committee invite public confidence in their statements, by saying that it is confidently believed, that though the expense may be overrated, the receipts are within the narrowest reasonable bounds. But this is altogether an erroneous assertion. Coals, for instance, are charged for the year, 14,560*l.*, at 28*s.* the ton; but the average cost will be found not to fall far short of 49 shillings the ton. It is a fact, as the Committee state, that Coal has been discovered in twenty-seven localities; but we are still constrained to content ourselves with the consumption of Burnham Coal, which is purchased in Calcutta, it is true, at five annas the maund, but which costs a Rupee five annas before it reaches Allahabad. The charge for Coal should, therefore, be stated at 25,420*l.*, and this would raise the expenditure to 83,993*l.* On the other hand, each boat is estimated, on the authority, we believe, of a Mr. Lindquist, who knows nothing of the matter, to perform twelve trips a year. It will not perform more than nine. This is not a matter of conjecture, but of experience; and the Committee, who must have had before them the result of four years steaming on the Ganges, ought not to have substituted the ernde assertions of a forward individual, for facts which have been established by a succession of experiments. Twelve trips will, according to the calculation of the Committee, yield in freight and passengers, 120,337*l.* Nine trips, therefore, will yield 50,251*l.*; and when from this return is deducted the actual outlay of 83,993*l.*, we shall have a balance profit of only 6,258*l.*, instead of 47,364*l.*

But the scheme is also fallacious in its estimate of the number of passengers. Our European society in India is limited. The functionaries of Government are stationary in point of numbers; and the independent settlers increase in a very small, and all but imperceptible ratio. The throwing open the country to Europeans, and the permission granted to them by the last Charter to hold lands, has attracted but few to the shores of India. Lord William Bentinck's fears, that but few could be induced, under any considerations, to resort to India, have been fully realized. The tide of emigration sets in to the more favourable regions of New Holland. Under existing circumstances, therefore, it would be sheer delusion to calculate upon the steady and regular acquisition of more than one-half the passengers given in the Report. And as to the Native passengers, nothing can be more fallacious than to suppose that they will travel by steam for the next twenty years. Any scheme which rests for support on their patronage, must fail. A great revolution must take place in the native habits before they,—we mean the men, not the women, whom the Report ships by the dozen on a steamer,—will travel in the same boat with Europeans. If we could even change their habits, by the omnipotence of steam, still we could not fill their places by the same 'modern miracle.' At the very lowest rate of steam travelling, it would be too expensive for all but Natives of the first rank. The distance between Calcutta and Chagda, to take but one instance, is somewhere about fifty miles; and the passage hunts charge only two annas, or three pence, for the conveyance of passengers between those two places. It may be said that the passengers by steam, though they pay a higher rate, will be actual gainers by the saving of time; but, unfortunately, the Natives of this country have not attained that grade in civilization, in which its value of time is adequately appreciated. One of the most serious points of difference between the European and the inhabitant of India, is, that the one will always sacrifice money to save his time; the other invariably sacrifices time to save his money; and many years of improvement must elapse before there is any beneficial change in this respect in the national character of India. The prospect of any assistance from Native passengers, must, therefore, be at least for a time abandoned. The freight of goods, and the conveyance of European passengers must, during many years, form the only return for capital embarked in Inland Steam Navigation; and if the Court of Directors can be prevailed on to sell their boats, there is every reason to suppose that a well digested plan would yield, not the extravagant profit of forty per cent., but a reasonable commercial profit. The first step which the Committee should take, therefore, is, to ascertain whether the Indian Government is disposed to part with the steamers which are now plying on the Ganges, and with those which are daily expected to arrive in India. A competition between the State and a Joint Stock Company would produce the same result as the knocking of the earthen with the copper pots, as they passed down the stream. The second step is to submit the calculations to a searching examination, by competent authorities in India.

THE STEAM MAIL.—The packets for the public by the last Steam Mail were received in Calcutta on Friday last, after five days of anxious expectation, during which time they had been delayed in their progress by their extraordinary weight. The same kind of disappointment has been experienced at Madras, and has called forth the same expression of complaint which we hear from every lip at this Presidency. If this had been a solitary occurrence, the exercise of a little philosophy would have enabled us to hear it with resignation; but, unfortunately, every Mail which reaches Bombay from Suez, is delayed in the same manner, and from the same cause, in its progress across the continent. We find, moreover, that this grievance which so materially lessens to us the value of steam communication, is likely to be aggravated as every successive Mail is charged with a heavier load of letters. Neither must it be forgotten, that the disastrous detention of our packets, has occurred at the most favourable season of the year, and that their arrival in Calcutta will become still more uncertain when the roads have been cut up by the rains. If Government suffered to the same extent as private individuals, we are confident that some efficient remedy would be speedily adopted; but the public packets were carefully separated at Bombay from the private, and despatched on the first day. They reached their destination with the most approved speed. The same plan, we learn, was pursued in the Mediterranean, on the arrival at Malta of the last steamer, of which we have intelligence. The public Mails were taken out, and despatched by the most expeditious route to London, while the Mails of the community were left to find their own way home a fortnight later. The present defective mode, therefore, answers all the purposes which a Government, separating its own interest from that of the community, could desire; and hence the chance of any improvement by the public authorities becomes very remote. If the Directors could be persuaded to take an enlarged view of their responsibilities, and to identify their own interests with those of the people, it would not be very difficult to create, from the ample resources at their command, the means of establishing the communication on a basis as advantageous to all parties. But the Directors appear from the last accounts to be ignorant even of the existence of any grievance. After all the agitation by which we have endeavored to keep the subject before the public authorities, it is not a little amusing to find both the Directors and Mr. Mudge's Ministers enquiring wherein the present system is defective. Do the Directors really require to be informed at this late hour, that the communication by steam has been systematically confined to one port at the western extremity of India; that by this arrangement, the inhabitants of Calcutta, Madras and Ceylon, are deprived of the opportunity of embarking in the steam vessels; that our letters are subject to a heavy charge for land postage, almost equal to the steam postage levied in London; that this circumstance, by diminishing the number of letters sent, greatly affects the returns received from postage, and renders the enterprise more chargeable to the State; that the Post Office at Bombay is unable to distribute the packets throughout India, without the most obnoxious delays; and that if vessels of adequate power were to start from Calcutta, taking Madras and Ceylon by the way, letters would reach Calcutta from Suez in less time than is now consumed in transporting them from Bombay to Calcutta? Do the Directors require to be told that the vessels they employ, are too weak for the work; that the communication between Egypt and India is thus retarded at all seasons, and, during a third of the year, is altogether suspended; that it is disgraceful to the character of our administration in the East, that private companies in England should have been allowed to gain so infinitely the start of the Honourable the East India Company, with twenty millions sterling of permanent revenue, and the interests of a hundred millions of people to watch over? If these considerations should fail to produce any effect on the Court of Directors, let them read the declaration put forth by the Empress of Russia, that her schemes have reached such a state of maturity, that she can march an army to India in less time than England can dispatch troops from her own shores. Is this a time for lukewarmness on the subject of steam navigation in India? Is this a time for neglecting the only means by which to disprove the boast of Russia?

THE MEDICAL COLLEGE.—We hear that it is in contemplation to send five of the most advanced Native students of the Medical College, in Calcutta, to Scotland, to complete their medical education; and to devote 50,000 Rupees to this object. We trust the Committee of Public Instruction and the Members of Government will pause before they sanction so heavy an outlay for an object of such doubtful utility. If it be intended that these students shall, on their return, be appointed to Professor's chairs in the College, this expenditure is altogether unnecessary. It must be evident that their medical attainments, under the most favourable circumstances, cannot be expected to surpass those of the European medical officers who annually enter the public service; and that five individuals, equal, if not superior, to the five Native students, may at any time be selected from the service for those appointments, whose education has cost the State just nothing. If it be intended that they shall be engaged as practitioners in the European community, the money may well be spared. It will be long before Europeans have the same confidence in the skill of Native physicians, however accomplished in European science, which they place in that of their own countrymen. Neither is there any hope of extensive practice for them among the Natives themselves, which would warrant so large a sacrifice of funds. The Natives who are enlightened enough to prefer European medical science to Oriental quackery, will long continue to prefer the attendance of a European physician to that of one of their own countrymen; not to mention that the fact of the students' having lost out by a residence among the ancients, will create a strong prejudice against them. We see no one object in this proposal which will justify the abstraction of so large a sum from the pittance which Government allots, from the revenues of the empire, towards its improvement. Neither should it be forgotten, that the despatch of these students to the Medical Schools in Edinburgh, will add a hundred to the enemies of the College in Calcutta, by asserting that, with six Professors of eminent skill, each in his own department, it is utterly inadequate to its duties. This Institution, established on so magnificent a scale, and endowed with so rich a collection of talent, ought to be fully equal to all the exigencies of the country; and it is from the conviction that it is already capable of imparting all the instruction which the Natives need, that we raise our voices against this extravagant proposition. Instead of leaving for aid, as now proposed, on the College's part, we think it the duty of the Education Board to rest their dependence for the diffusion of medical science in India, on the means which exist in the country. It would be as just an insinuation on a body of honorable and well-educated men, to suppose that in the best paid Medical Service in the world, there should be any lack of capacity for bringing up the Natives to the highest standard of medical knowledge.

FIRST REPORT OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY'S INSTITUTION AT MADRAS.—A foundation was laid for this Institution in St. Andrew's School, which was opened in June, 1833. But the Institution itself was not formed till April, 1837. It then opened with fifty-nine pupils drawn from the previous school; and at the close of the first year, the number had risen above two hundred. This progressive increase continued till November last, when the roll exhibited 340 students.

and seventy-seven names, and the daily attendance amounted to two hundred and twenty.

The general plan and objects of the Institution are the same as those of the Assembly Seminary in Calcutta. It is Missionary in its character. "In its present stage it may be viewed," says the Report, "as a Normal Seminary to raise up Native Teachers, imbued with Christian principles, and with sound and useful knowledge, trained by their daily exercises, and by teaching their several classes to the difficult art of communicating practically what they know. At a more advanced stage, it will assume the form of a College for training as Native Missionaries all who shall willingly give themselves to this responsible work, who furnish substantial evidence of genuine love to Christ, who yearn over their countrymen with a desire to save their souls, and who are found to be possessed of suitable gifts and qualifications for the office." The animating soul of the system is a thorough Bible instruction; and its great instrument is the plan of mutual examination of each youth by his fellow.

In addition to the routine duties of the School, meetings are held every Wednesday evening, at which, in the presence of the teachers, the pupils maintain discussions on social or moral topics, affecting their own country, or bearing on their general studies. These discussions are afterwards reduced to the shape of Essays, which at a following meeting are read and criticised by the students generally. Four hundred Essays have thus been written. Specimens of them are printed with the Report of the Institution, which are very creditable to the writers. The stilts of composition, as might be expected, is susceptible of great improvement. In addition to inaccuracy of language, there appears to be an excessive tendency in the Madras youth to flowery figures. This weakness is not always cured by mere growth in knowledge; and, therefore, we would recommend the excellent conductors of the Institution to effect its removal by specific instruction and correction. It is to every reflecting person a palpable sign of a mind without a true language: in which the imagination riots at the expense both of the reasoning faculty and the moral sense; and to which words, consequently, are of more value than thoughts and conviction. The Essays, however, bear out the assertion of the Report: "Among some of the best youths, the desire to get knowledge amounts to a perfect thirst. They read largely, and with intelligence, some of the best English authors."

Indeed, the Institution at Madras appears just to have reached that stage, at which the intelligence and enthusiasm of the pupils first coming fairly out, scope is given for every sort of sanguine, undelined, or, one might say, illimitable hope. It is approximating the condition of the Assembly Seminary in Calcutta a little before Dr. Duff returned to Scotland. The Calcutta Seminary has advanced commonly, since then, in maturity of system and tuition, and in the intellectual character of its pupils: but sanguine anticipations have just had a reverse course. They have retreated to sobriety, just in the same proportion as the Seminary has grown to perfection. The Missionaries at Madras should prepare their minds to learn a similar experience.

Perhaps we do wrong, however, to suggest discouragement to them: for they have enough of it. We have already mentioned that in November last, the number of their pupils amounted to two hundred and seventy-seven: but at that time the struggle was, which has been noticed before in our columns, respecting the admission of pariah boys to an equal enjoyment of the benefits of the Institution with those of caste. The scholars who had risen to the higher classes were but in few instances withdrawn. They were too much attached to their instructors, and the system under which they had so greatly benefited, to be torn from them. But the junior classes were reduced very low; and for a time the influx of new scholars appears to have been nearly stopped. It is to be regretted that on this occasion, Native prejudices received support from a kindred Institution, the School of the Native Education Society; in which not only is the principle of admitting the distinctions of caste professed, but the respectable caste boys who had been withdrawn from the Assembly Seminary, were forcibly received; and they were retained, notwithstanding a remonstrance against such a course. "Time has come, in one of its most invidious interferences with human interests, here fortified by those who ought to have rejoiced in an opportunity of subduing its power. A little firmness and good understanding amongst the friends of Native education, would have banished the mischiefs of caste from the whole of the Madras Schools of unceasing; but now it may still have a long, though but partial reign. It is gratifying, however, to know, that some of the youths who had left the Assembly's Institution have returned to their places; and its conductors believe they have won the victory."

There is one part of the economy of this Seminary which we must notice before we close. "The Saturdays," says the Report, "have been set apart for peculiar religious exercises, as well as the Sabbath day, from ten to two o'clock. The attendance at these is voluntary. There is much in these seasons to refresh the labourer's spirit, and to fill him with good hope by certain affecting tokens that the time of harvest will come." Corresponding with this peculiarity in the Institution, there is a tone of religious earnestness in the Report, which will commend it to every Christian mind. The Rev. Mr. Anderson, who has had the sole labour of bringing the Seminary to its present state, was joined on the 24th January last, by the Rev. Robert Johnston, a colleague of his own selection; and our best wishes attend them for their enlarged success in their united labours.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, APRIL 25.

Dr. Baiken, who has succeeded Capt. Taylor as the new Post Office Agent, has published a long and valuable document, the object of which is to elicit information, which may tend to improve the communication by post. We hear that it is in the contemplation of Government to establish an independent Post Office for the Western Provinces.—Mr. James Butterland has just been gazetted as Principal of the Hoaghy College. We learn that Capt. D. L. Richardson has also been appointed Principal of the Hindoo College, an office which will invest him with some degree of authority over the arrangements of that Institution.—Letters from Aracan state, that on the 20th of last month, a smart shock of an earthquake was felt at Kyauk Piyoo, which was immediately followed by a magnificent burst of fire from the range of volcanic hills to the southward of that station, which continued to rise and fall in huge jets for half an hour. It was accompanied by reports resembling the discharge of distant artillery.—A letter appears in the Agre Ubbur from a common soldier in the Aux or the Lines, which gives a vivid description of the hardships which have been suffered by the troops in their progress through the Bidan Pass. We have transferred it to our own columns.—In the Supreme Court yesterday, a Native, Shree Muntio, was convicted of an attempt to kill his wife, and was sentenced to be executed on Saturday next.

—Eight Nannagars, or religious mendicants, who have come down from the Western Provinces, are, says the Gyananagar, going about the metropolis levying contributions from the orthodox Hindoos.—We are happy to perceive that Mr. Masters, the late head gardener of the Company's Botanic Garden, and the first practical gardener in India, has been offered the situation of Superintendent of the Garden of the Agricultural Society at Madras.

FRIDAY, APRIL 26.

A correspondent of the Englishman, this morning's paper, brings to light the fact that a hundred and fifty people, with crooks in their hands, belonging to Kaleruth Moonshies, have for some time been employed in attempting forcibly to break up a bazaar on the outskirts of Calcutta, and that under the very eye of the Magistrate; the poor people are tied up and beaten, and incarcerated.—The Mails by the Steamer which were announced in Calcutta four days ago, had not reached Calcutta yesterday afternoon.—Some individuals in India, who happen to have a little idle time on their hands, has proposed to establish a School from and after the 1st of May, under the auspices of the Sheriff —Yesterday, in the Supreme Court, Thakoorla was convicted of the murder of Ghunore Tarrhal, and sentenced to be executed on Saturday next.—Sir Robert Stevenson, after serving half a century in India, has embarked on board the Maize, in a very dilapidated state.—The Quarter of last evening explains that the lack of houses which the Bishop proposed to devote to the erection of a Cathedral, was not the amount of Begum Sonnoor's fund; but that His Lordship ungenerously proposes to appropriate 2,000*l.* a year of his own allowances for four years to this object. The site talked of in the southern segment in the grounds at Government House.—There is a report that the Ghazipur typhoid fever has been burnt down.

SATURDAY, APRIL 27.

The long expected Mail, extending to the 16th of February, came in yesterday. At the same time, the Semaphore announced the arrival of the Thames Light, from London, the 17th January, within a month, a day excepted, of the Mail.—We are happy to learn that Mr. Patton, the Magistrate of the 21-Regiment, proceeded yesterday in person to the house of Kalarah Moulvi, and liberated three persons who had been illegally confined there.—The Court of Directors have rescinded the restriction upon the purchase of shares in the Union, and Private Banks, by their own servants, which had been practically rescinded by the servants themselves.—The old Indian acquaintance, Mr. Dyer Smirke, having reached England, has been elevated to the rank of an Indian Prince. His Royal Highness has proceeded to Bome, to secure the performance of a grand service in honour of his grandfather in the church of St. Charles Boman, by the Sovereign Pontiff himself, to whom on this occasion, a legacy of 800,000 francs had been bequeathed.—The Bombay papers state, that Kharabe is in the kept as a British possession, on the ground that it was captured by the 11th and the 44th Regt.—Mr. Sannella, the Magistrate of Baghly, has been ordered off to Thibet, in act as Government representative in certain charges brought against Mr. Oldfield, the Civil and Session Judge, by Dr. Mackinnon. This rank officially derives on Mr. Baghly, but he is stated to be inadequately engaged in revenue cases.—The arrival of the Mail has filled the papers with European intelligence, to the exclusion of matters of a local character.

MONDAY, APRIL 29.

The atrocious murder of Mr. Hurdley, and his associates, on the Lord Kowlee, has elicited with the public indignation in the Supreme Court at Madras. He has been sentenced to imprisonment for eighteen months; two others, for six months; three, for one month, and one, for a fortnight. This ill-judged sentence is likely to produce a pernicious effect. But even this punishment would not have been sufficient, if Sir R. Cunney had not been the chief justice. An attempt was made to quash the indictment, and to let the prisoners off all together, on the ground that the names of the victims had been omitted in the charge. Such a system of law which is called the perfection of reason.—The January Mail from Bombay, not counting the day of arrival and departure, reached London in forty days, which is the shortest period in which a communication has ever been effected between England and India.—The Court of Directors have determined to abolish the rank of Senior Merchant, Junior Merchant, Factor and Writer, and to substitute orders of rank suited to the character of the empire.—The healthiness of the station of Agra, beyond that of any other place in India, is established by the fact, that during two years residence of H. M. 18th Fint, the number of illnesses did not exceed twenty-nine.—The papers announce the death of Mr. Leonard, the oldest inhabitant of Chanderagore, many years senior of that settlement.—The Griffiths has returned from Sydney, and we are not happy to learn, that the health of the Rev. Mr. McKay, so well known in Calcutta, by his labours in the General Assembly's School, has been considerably benefited by the voyage, and that he has been recommended to remain for some time in New South Wales.—The Nawab Tahawur Jung has just left Calcutta on a visit to Dacca, for change of air.

TUESDAY, APRIL 30.

Nicholas Clausen, the Assistant of a Mr. Marlean, an indigo planter, at Sonamuharg, in the district of Bordwan, was tried in the Supreme Court, on the 29th, for the manslaughter of Oken Coolie. It was a case of wanton atrocity. The deceased was brat in death by the prisoner, who was found guilty, as the Judge stated, on clear and uncontradictory evidence. He was condemned to life imprisonment for two years imprisonment.—An explosion took place yesterday morning at the gun powder manufactory at Liphure, by which five men were killed, and six wounded. The loss of property has not been considerable.—The Bombay Government, it is said, has engaged the Sypha to transport the Mails during the coming monsoon from that port to the entrance of the Red Sea, where a steamer will be ready to receive them. We hear nothing further of the attempt to send a steamer from Calcutta to Suva during the South West Monsoon. Such a step, called for feebly by the dictates of common sense and equity, will not, we fear, be adopted.—The Oplun clippers have now given due for some time from China, and their continued detention gives rise to the suspicion that affairs have not mended in the Opium line; that the vigorous efforts of the Chinese have succeeded in altogether extinguishing the trade. The Bengal Bank has wisely refused to make any more advances on this drug.—It is rumoured in the papers that received from England, that Sir H. Vivian is likely to succeed Sir Horace Fane, as Commander-in-Chief.—It is stated in the Moorshedabad paper, that Government is about to adopt the obviously judicious and necessary plan of creating a new district at Noddy, to be comprised of Thannah from Bhanganpore and Moorshedabad. We believe the farther Thannah of the former district is distant no less than one hundred miles from the Sadler Station.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 1.

We have now been without any intelligence from the Bengal Division of the ARMY OF THE INDIA for three weeks, and some little anxiety begins to be felt, as rumours of an unpleasant character find their way to us. Sir John Keane, with the Bombay army, joined Shah Sujah and Mr. Macnaghten on the 26th March, as the combined troops were to begin their march through the Indian Pass on the 27th.—Some observations were published through a correspondent of one of the newspapers some little time ago, to the effect that Col. Canfield had neglected the business of the Residency at Moorshedabad, and left the prisoners many months in arrears. We are happy to find that the charges was altogether unfounded.—It is said that fifty Hindustanee students are to be admitted into the Medical College, for the purpose of being instructed in their own language, by some of the most advanced students—Mr. Middleton, of the Hindu College, is to deliver a lecture on Friday evening next, on Astronomy, at the Mechanics' Institute.—Private intelligence has been received at Bombay, that the British Resident at Basrah has withdrawn to Karak, owing to the hostile attitude which Persia has assumed. It is said that the Admiral has landed two hundred men at Basrah to protect the Residency, and that the bura is actually under a blockade.—The bridge of boats on the Indus having been washed away by the stream, the communication between the island and the western bank has been suspended.

We beg to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of the following sums for the Friend of India:—

LATEST EUROPEAN INTELLIGENCE.

The London Mails of the 16th February reached Calcutta, on Friday last. The Mails via Madras files to the 23d of that month, were expected by the same opportunity, but the French Steamer having taken Syria in her way to Alexandria, had not arrived when the Berenice left Egypt.

Her Majesty opened the Session of Parliament in person, on the 5th February. The Royal Speech was, as usual, vague, meagre and unsatisfactory. The subject of the repeal of the Corn Laws was carefully omitted.

Lord Salisbury has resigned his office, as Colonial Secretary, in consequence of an unexpected arrangement made by the Ministry, without his participation, for his removal to another post. Lord Salisbury has succeeded him. Lord Morpeth, who continues to exercise the functions of Irish Secretary, has been brought into the Cabinet. The post of Viceroy of Ireland has not been filled up. Lords Carnarvon and Radnor are spoken of among the most likely candidates.

There is nothing in the papers now brought, which indicates the probability of any change in the Ministry.

The Royal Speech having alluded to the rupture with Persia, and the march of our troops across the Indus, Lord Brougham, in the House of Lords, condemned the policy which had been pursued, in his usually sarcastic vein. There was nothing in his speech which indicated either an intimate knowledge of the subject, or the large views of a statesman. Sir Robert Peel, in the House of Commons, censured the policy in more guarded and measured terms. The Duke of Wellington, with his usual good sense, declared that he should suspend his judgment till full information had been laid before the House.—Her Majesty's Ministers have declared their entire approbation of the course of policy which has been pursued by Lord Auckland.

The agitation throughout the country, on the subject of the Corn Laws, continued without abatement. A body of delegates from the manufacturing towns and districts had been appointed to meet in London, but they seem deficient in unanimity and judgement; and unless a more decided demonstration be made throughout the country, the question will be lost this Session. The Lords have refused to hear evidence. On the 14th February, Mr. Villiers moved in the Commons, that evidence be heard at the bar of the House, in support of the petitions for a repeal; but his proposal was negatived by a majority of 182, in a house consisting of 583 members. Her Majesty's Ministers do not seem to have made up their minds as to the part they will take in this question, which they declare is not a Cabinet question.

The state of France appears to be critical. Louis Phillip is Minister of a Ministry; and has dissolved the refractory Chambers. A very strong opposition has been organized against him, on the ground of his assuming the entire direction of affairs, and making the responsibility of a Ministry a non-entity. Many of his personal friends, and all the promoters of the revolution of July, have joined the opposition. If Louis Phillip were not the greatest of all the existing monarchs of Europe, such a crisis would subvert his throne, but the same wisdom which has kept him on a usurped throne for nine years, will, probably, continue to sustain him there.

The affairs of Holland and Belgium are also in a critical state. The definitive arrangements which had been proposed at the conference for the settlement of all differences, have been accepted by Holland, and rejected by Belgium, though at one period they were courted by the latter, and repudiated by the former. King Leopold has appointed the Polish General Skrzynski to the command of his army, and the emperors of Russia and Austria immediately quitted his Court. It is said that these two powers are organizing their forces in the direction of Belgium, as though they expected early hostilities.

The papers contain little respecting Russia. The Cabinet of St. Petersburg has endeavoured to defend the part it took in urging the Shah of Persia to the siege of Herat, and appears to be drawing closer its alliance with that power. The occupation of Karack, which was treated by the Indian journals with such sovereign contempt, is represented by Russia, as compromising the integrity and independence of Persia. It is also stated, that the Cabinet was anxious to come to an explanation, and, perhaps, a good understanding with England, on the subject of Eastern affairs.

Sir James Carnac embarked with his family and suite, and a guard of honour of forty men, on the Thomas Coutts, for Bombay, on the 10th of February.

The entire dependence of England on America for a supply of Cotton, has led the Chamber of Commerce at Manchester to make an earnest application to the East India Company, and to Government, "with the view of inducing them to lend their assistance in making extensive and well-directed efforts to improve the quality of East India Cotton, and to render it an available substitute for some portion, at least, of that of American growth."

In Canada every thing appears to be quiet, except the scaffold. No fresh disruption had been made across the border. Sir John Colborne had been fully appointed as the successor of Lord Durham. His Lordship's voluminous, but valuable Report on the Canadas, after being presented to the Ministry, got surreptitiously into the Times Office, and was published to the world before it had been laid before Parliament. The grand collision which was expected to take place in the Lords, between Lord Brougham and the Earl, will, it is supposed, come off; both the noblemen in speaking of each, using the term, my 'noble friend.'

Mr. D. W. Harvey has resigned the office of Hackney Cosh Licensor, that he might keep his seat in the House, and has lost his seat because he accepted the office of Licensor.

Her Majesty's Ministers have, it appears, entered seriously upon the subject of National Education. Their plan, as detailed by Lord John Russell, appears to exclude the idea of confiding it entirely to the Clergy of the Established Church, which has been a great offence. This has created so great an excitement that even the Rev. Mr. Close, one of the most pious and evangelical ministers in England, indulging in the most violent declamation on the subject. The London Patriot says, the question of National Education is a question of Police, and ought not, therefore, to be under the direction of any spiritual party.

The Printer of the Times has been fined 500*l.*, and sentenced to two months' imprisonment, for the celebrated libel on Sir John Courcy.

The Earl of Cardigan, thinking that nothing spoils an officer so much as a wife, has refused permission to Capt. Smith, the brother of the Princess Penelope, of Capua, to enter the 11th Dragoons, because he is married.

Sir Robert Peel, in his speech on the Address, in allusion to India, made use of these remarkable words:—"He did not offer any apology to the house for pressing this important subject on its attention. It was one which, he repeated, had been too long neglected. While we were squabbling about domestic questions of but secondary importance, we were disregarding and neglecting matters of the highest moment in India—we were neglecting questions on which depended peace or war—on which hung the fate of nations."

The Mexican Government disavowed the treaty made with the French at St. John d'Illas, and sent two generals to defend Vera Cruz. The French immediately invaded the place, but appear to have been repulsed. The Mexican Government has declared war against France, and issued letters of marque and reprisal. These letters were sold openly in Liverpool. And thus we shall have all the piratical vagabonds of both continents let loose, primarily on the commerce of France, but eventually upon that of the world.

It is surmised that Mr. Macaulay would join the Ministry. We should think he sets too high a value on his own peace of mind to quit the mild and cheerful walks of literature, for the burning, blistering field of politics.

DIFFICULTIES OF THE BOLAN PASS.

* I write after a march of 36 miles as laid down in the route, but which was found on being measured by a perambulator, 40 miles; and such fatigue as I never before experienced. I hope I may never undergo such again. The sufferings of the men from thirst were excessive; for half the way not a drop of water was to be had, and numbers were offering 1 rupee for as much as a dram of it. Others were so overcome by want of it, that it was with difficulty they could be persuaded against a most repulsive and unnatural way of quenching their thirst. Half way we had 20 camels laden with purkale filled with water, the prospect of which cheered many of the men to come up, which otherwise they could not have done. The rush of the advanced guard, which is a quarter of a mile ahead, as it approached the camels, was terrible. One tin canful rather increased than allayed the men's thirst, and even at this small allowance, there was not enough for half of us. The cries of some calling to the name of God for a drop of water were heart-rending. These and others who threw themselves down in utter exhaustion, were helped by some of the good-natured, who filled their bottles and goblots, and went round distributing their contents. In short such a march none of us ever made, and hope never again to make; some of the men said it was as bad as being shipwrecked. We don't know if we are to have any more of such work, but I believe not. Water, they say, is plenty beyond the Pass, but provision scarce. Things are not now so bad with us, and all we complain of, is the robbery of our camels by Dost Mohammed's people. Our Grendlers last night the other night. The guards have, in consequence, been increased, which though it may prevent these robberies, takes off many more of the men for duty, and we are already hard-worked enough. The only incident of any of us have suffered, is William Loveday, who left the regiment some time ago, to become Quarter-Master Sergeant of a Depot Corps. The other morning he went as usual ahead, to "take up the ground" for his regiment, and leaving the guard to always accompany him to protect him, went into a village where he was immediately seized. The fellows of the village not stripped him, searching him for money, and then commenced cutting him with their swords. His cries were heard by the guard of sepoy who behaved very well, running into the village seizing nine of the villains, and rescuing poor Loveday. But he is not expected to live, and I heard this morning that he was dead. The cuts he received from the fellows' swords, turned black immediately, and I hear, the Doctors say, they were poisoned. This is much talked of.—Agro Chkhar, April 13.

EUROPE.

RELIGIOUS.

LONDON CITY MISSION.—To the Editor of the Record.—Sir, I allow me to place before you the facts respecting the London City Mission.

1. The only change which has occurred in its constitution since its commencement, when you approve it, has been to make it far less Dissenting, since not half the Committee must be Churchmen, than all might be Dissenters.

2. Since its present constitution no clergyman. I believe, has withdrawn from it on account of its Dissenting tendency.

3. It is unjust to associate pious and peaceable Dissenters with those who are violent, or to separate from some Christians in doing right, because others are doing wrong. Why ought we not, on this principle, to leave the Church, because some Churchmen are Puseyites?

4. If it is wrong to associate with Dissenters in the City Mission, it is equally so in other Societies. The greatness or usefulness of those Societies makes no difference in the principle.

5. You cannot point out any means by which the poor may be visited, except this. I know of many souls saved through this instrumentally. I know that the poor of London are suffering by thousands for the lack of knowledge. The District Visiting Society cannot find them, because you cannot get district visitors in those parishes in which the clergymen do not favour their efforts. The Pastoral-Aid Society cannot, because the rule forced upon them by circumstances has been, that they will send no agents, except when invited by the clergyman. So that they are shut out from all the most populous parishes of London—St. George's, Marylebone, St. Pancras, St. Luke's, &c. &c. Nor can you even reach, much less form, a Church Society which could send either lay-agents or curates to those perishing crucifixes, in these and similar parishes. Such a Society would be crushed from the day of its birth. The effect of your advice is to ruin thousands of immortal souls. If you would not leave the memory of having hindered the truth being addressed to thousands who might have heard it, from plain, pious, sensible, experienced Christian men, with no other object in view than to save their souls, I would wish you to strengthen the efforts which you have laboured to destroy. Every one of your premises are fallacious, as I could easily show, but I do not want to enter into controversy, my time being better occupied. But I do interest you for Christ's sake, if you have any love to him, do not oppose his cause; do not hinder the ignorant lowering of his love, in any way, till you can show a better way in which that knowledge may be improved.

I remain, dear Sir, yours truly,

Walthamstow, Feb. 6.

BAPTIST W. NOEL.

P. S. I do not wish you to publish this unless you like to do so. My great object is to induce you, as a Christian man, to look fairly and fully into the facts of the case. Most gladly shall I join any Church Society which you see fit, to send lay-agents or clergymen to the poor throughout London, but if you find, upon inquiry, as you will, that it is injury, and if you find, too, as you may, that there is no in the City Mission the least secularism, then let me beg you, as I become a Christian, to retract your steps, and aid us in trying to save some of these poor emigrants from eternal death.

COLONIAL MISSIONS.—SERMONS were preached on Sunday and Monday last by the Rev. Alderman Wells, in honor of the independent chapels of this town in aid of the funds of the Colonial Missionary Society. The sum realized at the four services, we regret to state, was less than the importance of the cause demanded. The operations of this useful society are much equalized in several of our colonies—particularly in Van Diemen's Land, for want of pecuniary support to send preachers of the gospel. The ignorance of religion, and indifference to it exhibited by the mass of emigrants from this country, is truly deplorable; the labours of the Missionaries being almost as much devoted to their spiritual improvement as to the evangelizing the red man of Canada, or the black natives of the West Indies of America, this society has been the means of carrying the light of the gospel to several extensive tracts of our colonial possessions, which were formerly enveloped in great spiritual darkness. It has been particularly useful in Lower Canada, where six missionaries have for some time been labouring valiantly and successfully. In Upper Canada, there are 12 or 13 missionaries, all requiring the assistance of the society, and the committee are earnestly importuned to send many more without delay. There are many applications for more preachers in our penal colonies, where the gospel is spread by means of inmate labourers, which for the present the society is unable to accede to. The committee have recently sent out two Missionaries to Van Diemen's Land, who are now on their voyage thither. On their arrival there will be six Congregational Ministers labouring in that island. Since the embarkation of these two brethren, a distinct request from another party has been received, desiring two additional ministers. The writer states, to illustrate the state of the country, and to enforce his application, the two following facts:—In one district of the island, containing 268 inhabitants, there had been but three religious services during the period of nine years. In another place, a settler brought his baggage on board before a missionary, clergyman, and the latter having performed a sufficient quantity of work on the preceding day, and when informed that that day was the Sabbath, took the matter and the man were surprised, having been, until then, ignorant of it. I leave," says the writer, as well he might, "these two facts to speak for themselves." It was stated by Mr. Wells, that in none of our colonies were the interests of religion so much, or its religious support so much, as in the numerous and growing applications than at its commencement. As more ministers are sent out, the annual charge for their support will, of course, increase. The work is of immense importance to the emigrants themselves, and it is of equal importance to the communities they are founding. A community cannot be built up, or prosper, without piety and virtue. If there are no ministers and ordinances of religion, there can be no religion; and, without it, no circumstances, however favourable, can prevent the people from becoming vicious, degraded, and miserable. Its prospective importance is still greater and more extensive. The British colonies, if early impregnated with piety, will grow rapidly to the station and power of empires. The extent of the territory—the advantages of climate—the sources of wealth—the favourable geographical position for commerce and navigation of Southern Africa, Australia, and Canada, point them out as the seats of future nations of British origin. What a part may they be destined to act in future ages for universal spread of the gospel!—Linda Melville.

CONTRACTS FROM JERUSALEM.—Mr. Newman [Nunee?] a celebrated merchant, of the Jewish persuasion, and his family, have recently embraced the Christian faith, and have been baptised by the Rev. Mr. Melville. The event is said to have produced a great sensation among the members of the Jewish faith.—Ibid.

COLONIAL.

JAMAICA.—Advice from Jamaica to the 25th December, brought by Her Majesty's packet Elmer, communicate the members of the new House of Assembly, the absence of the members to the resolutions of the late house, and their consequent prorogation to the 30th of February by the Governor, Sir Lionel Smith. After his excellency's reply to the address, a disturbance took place in the house, in consequence of the Provost-Marshal-General attempting to force his way into the assembly, in order to summon the house to attend in the council chamber to hear the order for prorogation previous to the entry of the reply on the minutes. The result was the expulsion of the Provost-Marshal-General, and an angry discussion, in the course of which the expelled official attempted three times to summon the house—a measure which was not accomplished until after a division on a resolution to the effect "that the conduct of the Provost-Marshal-General, in attempting to force an entrance into the house with violence, after the closing of the doors, is a breach of the privileges of the house." On the return of the members from the council chamber another discussion arose, regretting the tone of the governor's speech, which was dwelt upon as likely to increase, rather than allay, the excitement which already existed on the questions at issue between the government and the House of Representatives. Quietness continued in the island.—Put.

SCIENTIFIC.

GEOLOGY: RHINOCEROS.—On digging the foundations of the new buildings at the Hotel de Ville, in Paris, the workmen, at the depth of seventeen feet, in alluvial yellow sand mixed with pebbles, found the right humerus of a rhinoceros, named by M. Cuvier, R. Tichorhinus. This rhinoceros bone has not been met with in the Paris basin, although all bones of elephants have occurred. The humerus now alluded to is only four lines less than that of the Cape rhinoceros, in the museum of the Jardin du Roi; it is sixteen lines less in length than the single horned rhinoceros of India, but its circumference exceeds each by one inch. M. Cuvier's opinion thus appears to be confirmed as to the relative size of the two-horned fossil rhinoceros, which he thought was of shorter and thicker proportions than the recent animal; and that this two-horned fossil rhinoceros has more analogy with the two-horned species of Africa than with any of those of India.—Put.

GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY.—Put. Jun. 28.—An extract was read of a letter from J. B. Franklin, Esq., H. M. Consul at Bolivia, dated La Paz, 25th July, 1848, in which he says,—"I have recently discovered the bones of the Mastodon near the Lake of Titicaca, at a height of 13,000 feet; and fossil shells in the Nevada de Antakana [?], in lat. 16 deg. 21 min., at an elevation of 17,000 above the sea. In November, I hope to visit the Cordillera of Carangas [?] remarkable for its active volcanoes; and on my return in Kinque [?] give you at the Geographical Society a good account of this part of the world."—Ibid.

STATISTICS: THE NEW CITY POLICE.—At the Police Committee of Aldershot, on Saturday last, Mr. Whitlair, the superintendent, reported the following statement of parties who had been in the custody of the City Police since the formation of the new establishment, from the 25th December last to 7th inst.:—Larceny, simple, 121—Ditto, by servants, 1—Felonies, 30—Assault, 38—Pawing illegally, 14—Fraud, 3—Misconduct, 19—Vagrants, 27—Witch, 14—Indecently exposing the person, 3—Embezzlement, 10—Obstructing officers on duty, 7—Attempting to commit suicide, 3—Attempting to rescue from custody, 1—Uttering bad money, 20—Extorting money under threats, 3—Suspicious characters, 18—Disorderly characters, 11—Receiving stolen goods, 1—Gambling, 3—Apprentices, runaway, 2—Child-dropping, 1—Repeated thief, 1—Attempting to pick pockets, 13—Drunk cases, 189—Total, 892.—Ibid.

THE NEW ART.—At the late meeting of the Royal Society, a highly interesting paper by Henry Fox Talbot, Esq., was read. It detailed the author's discovery, upwards of five years ago, of the new process of delineating objects. At first it consisted in laying the nitrate of silver on paper, and, by the means of the camera-obscura, and the solar ray acting on the paper, a perfect impression is obtained of any object in half a second; it was found, however, that the image thus obtained, by exposure to the light faded, and after a few days disappeared. Repeated experiments, and the most devoted attention of Mr. Talbot, by what he calls sensitive paper (a great improvement upon that which he originally employed), has overcome this great drawback; pictures he has had in his possession for years are now as vivid as they were when first produced. The image obtained is white, but the ground is beautifully coloured, and readily obtainable, either sky-blue, yellow, rose-colour, or black; green is excluded; these variations of colour Mr. Talbot considers as so many chemical compounds. Objects the most minute are obtained—the delicate hairs on the leaves of plants, the minute and they lively calyx, may, even a diamond, the emblem of all that is most fleeting in this world, is fettered by the spell of the invention, and remains perfect and permanent long after it has been given back to the elements which produced it; in short, as we see Mr. Talbot's own words, the picture is "soiled as soon as begun." The extent of the value of this invention cannot at present be anticipated; already the author has applied it with perfect success to the copying of sculpture, engravings, handwriting; and in every case so complete has been the image, that it has been mistaken for the original. The value of it, even now, to naturalists and others travelling abroad, nearly of an importance of drawing, must be incalculable. Mr. Talbot's paper was present, and paid profound attention to Mr. Talbot's paper.—Literary Gazette.

The scientific folks of Paris are busied in endeavouring to find out the composition of the plate by which M. Daguerre is enabled to obtain an exact representation of any object or scene. This plate, placed in a camera-obscura, reverts from the impingement of light certain impressions, varying according to the intensity; so that in a quarter of an hour the Cathedral of Notre Dame, for example, engraves itself perfectly on the plate. It was at first supposed to be chloride of silver, known to be susceptible of change from the effect of light; but on this substance light produces a shade, and vice versa: it is the effect permanent. On M. Daguerre's composition, in the contrary, dark spots on the object produce corresponding shade, and that in every gradation of tint. This, we say, has no effect on the chloride of silver; it was on M. Daguerre's composition, and reproduces its own image perfectly.—Put.

SORNAMELLEN.—Dr. Fritschel, of Bristol, knew much in the habit of attending a weekly market. He used to rise in his sleep, saddle his horse, and awake in a sense of his situation only by the animal snorting at the terrapin. Another ludicrous case was that of an expatriate, who had been a regular frequenter of a fashionable promenade at a watering-place. The dandy was seen to get up at night, and, while fast asleep, walked in his shirt along the lawn of the hill, lifted his glass at the indescribable air of a finished puppy, sniggered and smiled, and gracefully saluted parties of ladies, when he fancied he saw as when awake. Actual somnambulism, where it has, in reality, been induced, is merely a state of artificial somnambulism. The still translated Italian into French in his sleep. The curio-thing was, that when at a loss for a word, he turned it up in his dictionary.—Thurburn's Lectures.

EDUCATION.

In the House of Commons, on Tuesday night, Lord John Russell took the opportunity of presenting some papers relating to Education, to give a general outline of the views of Government upon this all-important question. So far as regards the general spirit and tone of his Lordship's observations, our readers will be, we think, highly satisfied. The speech was energetically delivered, and in many parts loudly cheered. The noble Lord referred to the plan lately promulgated at a public meeting in the Metropolis, which implied that the whole of the education in this country must be confined to the clergy of the Established Church. "He must say, that it did appear to him, that the promulgation of such a plan at the present day, so late in the history of this country, was altogether a serious obstacle to the general education of the people. (Hear, hear.)" From the accession of the House of Hanover, at all events, (that is, from the repeal of the Schism Bill,) "he conceived the general recognised doctrine of the State to be, that Education is free to all persons, whether members of the Church or of any other religious denomination. The principle of exclusion was no longer the principle of the State." He must therefore contend that the principle of exclusiveness, which had been set up,—the assumption that the State ought not to recognise or to encourage any education but that which is carried on by the clergy, is an assumption of a principle at variance with the general spirit of our laws and with the existing feeling of society."—Put.

SINGULAR CASE.

THE QUEEN.—Sunday morning a few minutes before twelve, as Her Majesty was proceeding from Buckingham Palace to the Royal Chapel, St. James', while the royal carriage was passing through the Millers' gate, a very respectably dressed middle-aged woman stopped from amongst the crowd and threw a petition through the open window into the carriage. She was instantly taken into custody by a police constable, and by him conveyed to the station-house in Gardiner's-lane. Inspector Partridge questioned her in English as to her motives in acting as she had done, but she gave him to understand that she was a French woman, and incapable of speaking a word of English. The Inspector then interrogated her in her native tongue, and the following is the substance of the replies given:—She said she was a native of Paris, that her name was Staelte Bernard, and that she was the wife of a Dutchman, who had been carrying on business for some time past in Edinburgh. He had, however, become a bankrupt, and having at the time of his bankruptcy kept back from his creditors some money and goods, was tried as a fraudulent bankrupt and sentenced to seven years' transportation, which sentence had been so far carried into execution that he was at present lying at Wandrich, preparatory to his removal abroad. Having now no friends to maintain herself and four young children, she had taken the above course as the only one available of laying her case before the Queen, and suing for her husband's pardon. She was not aware that she had done wrong, as it was a constant and allowed practice abroad. The Inspector detained the woman for about two hours, when a message arrived from Her Majesty, in the effect that the woman was to be continued as to her future conduct and then discharged. These instructions were accordingly complied with.—Ibid.

SERJEANTS-AT-LAW.—The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council sat on Saturday in the Council Chamber to consider the petition of Sergeant Tuddy, Wilde, Spaulkie, Atherly, and Merewether, relative to the exclusive privilege of practising in the Court of Common Pleas. The Lords present were, the Lord President, the Lord Chancellor, the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, the Master of the Rolls, Lord Wynford, Lord Brougham, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, the Vice-Chancellor, the Chief Baron of the Exchequer, Mr. Justice Bouquier, Mr. Justice Vaughan, Mr. Justice Erskine, and the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty. Mr. C. Austin supported the petition, the prayer of which was, "That Her Majesty may be advised that the sergeants-at-law are entitled to exclusive audience in the said Court of Common Pleas, and to order such measures to be taken in regard to the premises as will restore to the said sergeants-at-law the exercise of the rights and privileges which they have immemorially enjoyed." The Attorney-General and the Solicitor-General were afterwards heard, and Mr. Austin was heard in reply. The following is the form of the sergeants' oath, which was read by the Attorney-General:—"You shall swear well and truly to serve the King's people as me of the sergeants-at-law, and you shall truly counsel them that you be retained with after your cunning, and you shall not defer nor delay their causes willingly, for covetise of money, or other thing that may turn you to profit, and you shall give due attendance accordingly, so help you God." The Court rose at four o'clock.—Ibid.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBURGH. Dr. HERBERT MARSH, has been very seriously indisposed for the last three weeks. His lordship is of very advanced age, and those about him evidently perceive the rapid decline of his strength. If the Right Rev. Prelate should not survive until after Lady-day, a great loss will be sustained by his family, as several very important leases fall at that time, particularly that held by the Earl Fitzwilliam. Dr. Marsh was raised in the Episcopal Bench in 1816, and translated to the see of Peterburgh in 1819. The value of the Bishopric is about £5,000 a year. It is stated that the houses belonging to the see, now under rent to the Earl Fitzwilliam, and which fall in on Lady-day next, will be let at an advanced rent, and only to those who pledge themselves to support Conservative candidates. By this means the Tories will gain £10,000.—Standard Mercury.

ALBION COTTON WORKS DESTROYED BY FIRE.—We are sorry to state that Abriele Mills have been burnt to the ground; that throwing, at this inclement season of the year, and while provisions are sold at such an exorbitant price, a great number of families out of employment. It originated, we understand, from the gas; but so rapid was its progress, that, though every exertion was used to subdue it, it proved of no avail. The appearance of the fire when the conflagration was at the highest was truly grand and terrible: the whole sky for miles around exhibited one sheet of vivid light; and when the roof and walls fell in, the dense smoke that arose presented an appearance as if the earth had opened to allow the pent up volcanic ether to issue forth to terrify and destroy. No lives were lost.—Glasgow Chronicle.

CHAPEL EXTINCT.—The grammar of the celebrated Chaplain, and only heir of the name, has just perished before Vera Cruz.—Ibid.

THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY will be opened in June next, as far as Teyford, which is within six miles of Reading.—Ibid.

MUSIC IN THE MUSEUM.—A competent person is busily engaged in examining and arranging the board of music which has been lying for years at the British Museum, with a view of making a catalogue of it, and, of course, rendering it available to the musical world. It is stated that, besides a quantity of printed compositions, there are a number of curious MSS., some the productions of English Sacerdotes; and there is no doubt but some very valuable works will be found among this hitherto unexplored treasure. There is a very curious specimen in the library of the Welsh School, in Gray's Inn-road, of the musical notation of the Ancient Britons in the eleventh century. The characters are the handle letters with some very curious marks, but without bars or lines. Very little of this old harpmony has as yet been deciphered, for the key to it has been lost for ages.—Ibid.

A RARE CONCERNANCE.—There is now living in Harwood, near this town, an old man, whose father was born upwards of 180 years ago—a circumstance, perhaps, unparalleled in the county. The father was more than 85 years of age when the son was born.—Bolton Chronicle.

THE NEWCASTLE FRIER.—The amount already subscribed for Millie's orphan children exceeds £600.—Ibid.

MARY WALKER, BOLAN'S HUSBAND, was on Wednesday fully committed for trial at the assizes at Exeter, charged with being an accessory after the fact in the murder of Joseph Millie.—Newcastle Chronicle.

DEADLY DRATH OF A DRUNKARD.—On Sunday night, a man named John Phillips, late of the ship Hogben, went to bed in a state of extreme intoxication, and at twelve o'clock the same night was found dead. Gin was the cause of his death, and, while on the very brink of the next world, his cursing and blaspheming were dreadful—so much for the effects of drinking!—Atlas.

MANCHESTER.—As far as can be ascertained, there are about 25 cotton-mills now working short time, in consequence of the unprecedented dullness in the yarn trade, and the high price of cotton, caused by large speculations in that article in the Liverpool market.—Ibid.

DEATH FROM STUFF OF PUPPER.—An inquest was held on Monday at the White Hart, Kensington, on the body of a child named Blake, four months old, whose death, as proved in evidence, was occasioned by a spoonful and a half of syrup of poppies which its mother had administered, with an intention to produce sleep, the child being very restless and cross. The medical gentleman, who attended the infant, said the medicine in question was exceedingly dangerous in ignorant hands. The mother, it was evident, had administered it with the best intentions. Verdict, "Accidental Death." The jury expressed a hope that the case would act as a warning to mothers.—Ibid.

PRISONS IN SCOTLAND.—The wretched condition of the prisons in Scotland, both with respect to the buildings themselves and their internal regulations, is a reproach to that part of the empire. This sentence does not apply exclusively to those of the lesser towns and smaller counties, but to those also in the more considerable towns, and even in the metropolis itself. The mode of defraying the expenses of their management is also most unequal and unjust. A bill to remedy these defects was introduced to Parliament last session, and passed through the Commons with general approbation; but by one of those freaks in legislation which occur in the Upper House, it was there thrown out. The Hon. Fox Maule last night introduced a similar bill, and fortified the necessity for its adoption by statements, the result of his own personal investigation of several of the prisons in Scotland during the parliamentary recess. Sir George Clerk fully concurred in the necessity of such a measure. The wren annals and other public bodies in Scotland should be prepared with petitions in favour of a measure, the defeat of which, in the last session, occasioned in Scotland so much disappointment and regret.—Globe.

A MOVING BOG.—On Sunday night, the night of the eventful storm, three acres of the bog of Glensmuckalough, within 600 miles of Newmarket, and eight miles from Kesh, moved completely from its position, and after traversing a distance of a mile, and crossing a rapid river, braved on the opposite side. Not an atom of surface was to be seen where the bog left, but mere yellow mud. The occurrence, fortunately, has done any injury to houses or cattle, but it is an incalculable loss to the owner of the land, Mr. James Barry, as the bog rests on the very best portion of his farm.—Lancaster Chronicle.

FORGIVEN IN FRANCE.—ON ENGLISH BANKS.—Reinoud d'Houwer appeared the day before yesterday before the Court of Assizes, on a charge of having procured various forged bills upon London and Manchester, in the year 1833, at the banking houses of Messrs. Ferrere and Charles Laffitte, and having by such means realised the sum of £25,000. The confidence of the Paris bankers was due principally to the circumstance that the prisoner had been an acquaintance of Count d'Orsay. Since the offence, d'Henard had been travelling under fictitious names in different towns of England, and had afterwards proceeded in succession to Rotterdam, Mannheim, Switzerland, Italy, &c. &c. He was finally arrested at Florence. In his defence he stated that he was the victim of an adventurer who had assumed the name of the English banker Drummond, and who had employed him in a letter the forged bills to obtain cash for them. He added that he had met this individual by appointment at the Cafe des Panoramas, and placed in his hands £10,000, which he had obtained for the bills. He was found guilty, and sentenced to twelve years' hard labour at the hulks, to stand in the pillory, and to fine of 100*fr.*—Globe.

PUBLIC WORKS IN FRANCE.—The Journal des Debats calculates that 15,000,000 sterling have been spent in public works in France, during 1837, and 18,000,000 sterling in 1838. Amongst the many improvements which the Minister of Commerce promises to all commercial interests, as well as to those of France, is a general revision of sanitary laws and regulations in the Mediterranean, for which purpose a meeting of delegates from all the nations bordering on that sea is to be held towards the close of the present year.—Put.

MEXICO, 26th DECEMBER.—Negotiations are on foot between France and Denmark to effect the matrimonial alliance of the Duke de Nemours with a Princess of the Royal Family of Denmark. Doubts are, however, entertained whether it was the Princess Sophie Berthe Clementine Augusta, (daughter of Prince Frederic Charles de Holstein Sleswigburg), or the Princess Louise de Holstein (Gleichenburg, daughter of the Prince of that title, who represented the King of Denmark at the coronation of the Queen of Great Britain, who would be the happy fair. Duke Alexander of Wurttemberg was to repair shortly to Copenhagen to conduct and forward the negotiation.—Ibid.

BERNADOTTE.—On the 26th of January the oldest of the sovereigns of Europe, Charles John (Bernadotte) King of Sweden, entered his 70th year. The most aged sovereign after his Swedish Majesty are the King of Prussia and the King of the French.—Ibid.

COPENHAGEN.—A violent storm had been experienced on the 7th and 8th ult., by which a part of the port of Holbuen had been destroyed, and the sea had swept away many houses. Several sailors also had perished.—Ibid.

ANTIQUITIES IN AFRICA.—During the recent expedition of a French force, under General Galland, to the town of Neif, a dependency upon Algiers, one of those splendid triumphal arches erected by the Romans was discovered in perfect preservation, bearing an inscription which records that it had been dedicated to Cascella, and Julia, his mother, in the third century of the Christian era.—Ibid.

RAILROAD TRAVELLING IN AMERICA.—On the Baltimore railroad the cars are three times the length and twice the width of the old-fashioned kind. Each car holds 60 passengers. The seats, with slitting cushioned backs, are arranged in two tiers or rows, one on each side, with a passage way between them, sufficiently wide and high to admit man and woman to pass each other, during the journey, without any undisturbed closeness of contact. In the centre of each car is a small stove, sufficiently large to warm the whole interior and make it as comfortable as a room.

On the road, as at present organized, there are three of these long, large—not piratical-looking—cars, in all capable of taking 200 passengers and their luggage. The first car after the engine is appropriated for educated people, abolitionists, servants, amalgamationists, and other laggards of that description. The next car is used for badgers, travelling duffers, smokers, chewers, moustaches, colurs, &c., in their way to Washington to associate with the members of Congress. The third and last car is appropriated for ladies and their confidantes, young ladies going to the Washington to visit, and landladies and office-seekers, with their wives and children, in search of suit-treasurers. Each of these cars communicates with the other by means of the long central slides already described, having also doors at each end. When the cars unite there is a sort of platform, where you can go out and smoke a cigar. Each car is supported by eight wheels, two sets of two each at each end; so that if a wheel or an axle-tree should break, the train need not be delayed.

Nothing can be conceived more comfortable in the coldest weather than travelling on this system. It has all the ease and power of locomotion which a person finds on the steamer, with nearly double the rapidity of progress. In the night time, I am told, they have beds for the passengers; and in another year I should not be surprised to see diners, or at least refreshments or dejeunes, given in these cars at the very moment the traveller is going at the rate of thirty miles per hour.

I understand that the same system prevails on the road to Washington. If the new line from Philadelphia to Jersey city be organized on this plan, the winter travelling from New York to Washington will be in advance of that of the whole world for ease, comfort, dispatch and convenience.—New York Herald.

A STATE JUDGE.—There has been a ludicrous affair at Louisville. Judge Wilkinson attacked a tailor with a bowie knife, because he had not made him his coat to please him, and one of the tailor's journeymen coming to his assistance, was stabbed and killed by this pattern of a judge.—New York Paper.

THE CHURCHWAS.—Dr. Butler, one of the emigrating Cherokee physicians, computes that 2,000 out of the 5,000 of the Cherokees have died since they left their homes in June for the West.—Put.

AMERICAN NEWSPAPERS.—The Editor of the "Pravda Register," a paper in Illinois, Western America, announced on the 1st of last December, "That, in consequence of his being so much occupied in removing, he was only able, on that day, to print half a sheet instead of a whole one. Another editor, in the same hemisphere, informed his readers some time ago, "That his attendance upon his sick wife and children, rendered it necessary for him to suspend the printing of his paper altogether until their recovery; adding, that he had not one to assist him in any department of his establishment.—Ibid.

HYDROPHOBIA.—An American physician is said to have discovered that a few drops of any mineral acid, applied to the bite of a rabid animal, will prevent hydrophobia. This acid decomposes the poisonous saliva, and thus destroys its virulence.

THE DOPS OF TWENTY-SIX.—There used formerly to be at the Kirk of Trecroon, in Perth-shire, as many as 25 there were men, on account of the difficulty which the farmers and shepherds of that pastoral district had in preventing their dogs from following them. The dogs, in general, behaved pretty well, and lay below the seats; still, many quarrels arose; sometimes took place, and on these occasions the minister had to order the people to turn out the disturbers of the peace. With these exceptions, they kept in tolerably good order till the congregation was going to disperse. From long attendance at church, they knew when this breaking up was about to take place. The signal for uproar was the rising of the minister in the pulpit to pronounce the blessing. As soon as he did so, they used to rush pell-mell to the door, harking and succeeding for joy to be let loose, and therefore not a word could be heard. At length the minister, honest man, although himself of a plan to get quit of these disturbances. He told the members of the congregation that it would be better for them all to keep their seats till the paring benediction was over, and then they would all rise and walk homewards out. This was tried, and it did remarkably well; however, it happened one day that the minister of the parish was absent, and a stranger was in the pulpit, who, when he arose to pronounce the blessing after the last psalm, was surprised to see the congregation continuing sitting, which is against all rule and custom. At last an old grey-headed sinner called out to him, "Oh, just give us, now as we are only sitting a wee to clear the church; but what ye have done, we'll all rise and go out quickly."—Chambers's Journal.

AN IRISH ATTORNEY.—On the trial of an action brought by an attorney for the recovery of his bill of costs, which was heard in the Court of Exchequer, Dublin, last Wednesday, the defendant's counsel read from the plaintiff's bill the following items:—"To anxiety of mind, and want of sleep occasioned thereby, for 14 days, at 10*s.* per diem, 7*l.* As I was walking through town about your business, I was run over by a car, and I did not know what became of me until I found myself in an apothecary's shop, very sore and uneasy; in fact, I swooned by the skin of my teeth from death; for all this last time (I was a fortnight sick) and for anxiety of mind, not talking of great bodily pain, I charge the moderate sum of 12*l.* To time lost in endeavouring to borrow money for you, which I could not get. 10*l.* To great inconvenience in setting your house, and loss of time in drawing up deeds and leases, 100*l.* (Rears of laughter, in which the Court heartily joined). The Chief Baron charged the jury that, as the action was brought on a judgment obtained by the plaintiff, they must find a verdict for him; but recommended the defendant to bring the case in a court of equity.—Freeman's Journal.

TALLEYRAND was always Talleyrand (De Perigord.) The fact that the De Perigords were once sovereign princes was never, during a long life, absent from his mind, when even the icy hand of death was upon the brow of the old diplomatist, as he lay when the King of the French approached his couch to bid him farewell, he said, "This is the greatest honour yet paid to my house," and then he introduced his attendants one by one to Louis Philippe. And yet with all this it may be said of him as was said of Anthony by Tully, "In convalescent que nulla aris tradit possunt."—He had a witty mind which can be preserved by no art. But it must also be recorded of him as Cicero said of Catoine, "That he lived with the sad seriously, with the cheerful agreeably, with the old gravely, with the young playfully, with the wicked boldly, and with the wanton lasciviously."

THE RESUMPTIONS.—This subject, which occupied so much of the public attention some months ago, appears to have died out, since the able and conclusive reply of Government to the Address of the Landholder's Society was made public. This will be matter of little surprise to those who have studied the question, and have thereby been enabled to appreciate the clear exposition of the public enactments, by which it was disposed of in that reply. We have incidentally heard that the Society proceeded soon after to collect fresh and original materials for a more powerful appeal to the Supreme Government, which, by some untoward accident, have been mislaid. Anxious as we are that this vexatious question between Government and its subjects should be brought to a close, with as little delay as possible, upon the basis of a fair compromise between the demands of the State, and the convenience of those who have been living by a usurpation of its revenues, we could have wished that the Society had pursued a different course. The charge of a violation of the public faith upon which they claimed the abandonment of all farther process of Resumption, cannot be sustained by any appeal to the engagements of Government. The analogy of former administrations equally militates against the perpetual relinquishment of the prescriptive, though alienated, rights of the State. But a strong claim might have been urged on the patriotic principles, which are professedly the pole star of our Government, for a modification of those demands, and for leaving the rent-free holder in possession of a reasonable portion of the rents of his estate. It is to this strong argument that we wish the attention of the Society had been directed. Coinciding, as it would have done, with the views of the Court of Directors, we think it would have presented a much fairer prospect of success.

Several years back Mr. Millet drew up, at the request of Government, an Act, embodying all the Regulations which had been passed on the subject of Resumptions, from the time when the subject was first taken up. This Act also provided for certain ameliorations of the existing law, calculated to reduce the pressure and the odium of these proceedings. But after it had been put in type, it was deemed inexpedient to enact it, upon the ground, we believe, that though it differed from the laws in force only by its superior equity, a new law might be considered, in the present state of the public mind, in the light of a new grievance; and that the Resumptions might be misrepresented, as dating from this new law, instead of being considered simply as the execution of laws which had been on the statute book for half a century. Such, we understand, to have been the chief reasons for laying the enactment on the shelf. We have heard that the Act has now been taken up anew by the Legislative Council, and adopted, with additional provisions of a conciliatory character. We learn, that among its enactments, the most favourable to the popular wishes, is one which directs that the amount of revenue assessed on resumed tenures, shall not exceed one-half the rent paid by the tenant. The Draft of this modified Act has, we understand, been submitted to the decision of Lord Auckland.

To the enactment of this new Act, we know that the same objections are urged, which were advanced when it was originally drawn up; and it has been remarked, that what was inexpedient when the resumptions began in right earnest, must be still more impolitic now that considerable progress has been made towards the completion of them. It has been urged, that it would be unwise to disturb the public mind with a new law, the object of which would be either misunderstood or misrepresented. We must confess that these arguments appear to carry no little weight with them. Considering the extreme excitement which is felt on this vital question in all ranks of the Native community, we fear that it would afford an opportunity,—which most assuredly would not be neglected—for inflaming the public mind in a still higher degree. The enemies of Government would not lose so fair an occasion of augmenting the public discontent, by affirming that tenures which had been declared sacred by former Regulations, were now for the first time to be confiscated upon a new and modern law. We fear that the benevolent views of those who have urged the enactment of the law, would be, in a great measure, defeated. Is it not possible, however, to secure the good they intend, without any risk of mischief? Would it not be possible to pass a new Act, embodying all the healing provisions of the proposed Act, and to secure the gratitude of the people, by entitling it, An Act for modifying and mitigating the existing laws, regarding the resumption of invalid tenures? This would be a measure of mercy, unmixt with any alloy, and incapable of any mis-interpretation. And if it were made retrospective, with the view of embracing, as far as related to the question of reduced rent, the tenures which had been resumed and assessed within the last five or six years, the unexpected boon would double the rent of the landholders, and more than half remove the bitterness of their feelings.

AMORIGINES PROTECTION SOCIETY.—Several weeks back, we noticed the aim and progress of this Society, and particularly the prominent attention it was now giving to India. We were then aware that the Society had engaged the services of Mr. George Thompson, the eloquent advocate of Negro Emancipation, for informing and arousing the public mind at home respecting its objects. But as our information was from a private source, we did not feel at liberty to communicate it. Within these few days, however, we have received from Scotland copies of the Glasgow Argus of the 19th, and the Glasgow Saturday Post of the 24th November last, which contain reports of Mr. Thompson's speeches at some of the first public meetings he has addressed in the discharge of his new agency; and we have made large extracts from one of them in another part of our paper. Our chief object in doing so, is to apprise our readers of the new movement that has thus been made for ameliorating the condition of this country. It is to be expected that errors will be committed, it may be, both of opinion and procedure: and our readers will soon perceive that Mr. Thompson has, in the outset, expressed some ideas, which we have frequently opposed. Nevertheless, there is reason for congratulation, in the prospect, that the indifference to Indian interests, in Parliament and out of it, which has become a by-word, will now be terminated. If mistakes are committed they will be rectified in the progress of discussion: but we may hope that manifest and acknowledged evils will no longer be perpetuated, for want of agitation and remonstrance.

There can be no doubt that the present time affords singular advantages to the Amorignes Society, in their interference with Indian affairs. The universal feeling of security respecting our empire in the East, has been rudely disturbed. Danger has been brought distinctly to view. And though some part of the alarm now excited may have been groundless, and the whole exaggerated, yet enough has transpired both in the heart of our dominions, and beyond their limits, to awaken attention and inquiry. He must be a person very easily assuaged, who, in present circumstances, is persuaded that every thing is sound in our Indian policy and rule. The British Government of this country stands in the curious position of a culprit lectured and chastised for immorality by the pagan Emperor of China, and upbraided with tyranny and oppression by the ruthless barbarian of Russia, whose savage cruelties in his own subjugated provinces, have made him the abhorrence of the civilized world. He plots against our authority, and reckons on it as a fact, that our treatment of India is such, that our people will gladly take refuge from our misgovernment in his mild paternal sway. The Chinaman has us at his foot, and may deal out kick after kick at his will; we deserve it all. But must we own the double disgrace of the Russian's rebuke, too? It is an extremely bitter potion. Yet the false and insouciant boaster is not without something to countenance his presumption. At any rate it is time to look to our doings. Dishonoured as we have made ourselves; we shall have deeper dishonour still, if we do not amend under the rebukes we have received.

We shall offer no criticism on Mr. Thompson's speeches at present. But we may inform our readers, that he is a man of dauntless mind, of unshaken powers of argument, and declamation, and of lofty and generous principles. We shall not find him, like another who is no fit sinner of his labours, talking of laying his hand upon the neck in the cause of India; but if he takes India to his heart, and fairly enters upon her service, we may be sure he will never halt or swerve till she is freed from every evil against which he can oppose the heart and mind of England. He possesses the affections of his countrymen to an extraordinary degree; and in no place can he open his lips without multitudes crowding to listen. It is not his plan merely to pass from place to place, and awaken a temporary feeling by his harangues. He is forming Auxiliary Societies every where, to unite with the Parent Institution by which he is commissioned; and religion, humanity and commercial interest in every place combine to draw around him multitudes of the most influential of the people. His proceedings take away every lingering hope, that any of our old-school politicians might still be cherishing, of a return to the dark system of secret counsels and silent submission in India. It can no more be; and they must stomach the certainty as they best can.

THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.—The King of the Sandwich Islands, as we learn from a proclamation which was published in the Herald of last week, has peremptorily forbidden the importation of ardent spirits into his dominions, or the consumption of them by his subjects. This is the first instance in which political authority has been pressed into the cause of temperance. The edict has not been promulgated before it was required; we are rather led to fear that it comes too late to counteract the evils which intemperance has produced in the Islands. Before they had become the resort of the European community on both sides the Atlantic, the Islanders, with all the vices of barbarism, were yet free from the pollution of drunkenness. It is to the Captains of ships, and to the Dealers connected with them, whose clamour against the conduct of the Missionaries have been echoed through both continents, by the opponents of religion and virtue, that the unhappy Islanders have been indebted for the introduction of this vice. The fondness for spirits once introduced among them, was found to spread with that rapidity which characterizes the progress of evil. In no portion of the globe has drunkenness developed its destructive effects so fatally as in the Sandwich Islands. On no scene has it enacted a more fearful tragedy. The constitution of the people has rapidly sunk under this novel and powerful excitement; and thousands have been hurried to a premature grave, the victims of this despotic vice. Every successive census of the population has exhibited an alarming decay; and in the last calculation which we have been able to obtain, it was clearly proved, that at the existing rate of decrease, in thirty-five years, there would not be one of the aboriginal inhabitants left. The King has now stepped forward at the eleventh hour, to rescue his wretched subjects, if possible, from the jaws of destruction. Every philanthropic mind will feel anxious that his efforts may be crowned with success; but it is difficult to conceive the apprehension, that the remedy comes too late; that the evils have been too deeply engrained upon the national habits, to yield to edicts; and that the keenness of Christian dealers will prove too strong for a Government, which possesses so little power to defend its long line of coast from the visits of the smuggler. It is much to be feared, that during the existence of the present generation, the Sandwich Islands may become altogether extinct. It is an appalling consideration, that an entire branch of the human family should thus be blotted out of existence, not by the sword, or by pestilence, or by famine, but simply from its fatal intercourse with civilized nations.

Alas, for the credit of civilization. What incalculable evils has it not indicted upon the simple barbarian! What vices has not its absorbing love of gold introduced among the nations, with whom it has come in contact! What strange scenes does this nineteenth century exhibit to our view! Barbarian struggling, but struggling ineffectually, to ward off the gigantic evils which have followed in the train of civilized connections. The rude Chief of the Sandwich Islands endeavouring to retard the utter extinction of his people, by the interdiction of that deleterious poison, which the cultivated inhabitants of Britain and North America are striving to force on them. The half-civilized Emperor of China putting forth all the strength of the most compact Government under the sun, to prevent the introduction of an article which is rapidly undermining the intellect, the moral, and the physical vigor of his subjects; and Britons, with all their proud boast of civilization, fastening the malignant drug into the country without compensation.

BLUERS IN CALCUTTA.—We have been informed, that a little difficulty has lately been experienced in Calcutta, in procuring vessels, usually called Blurs, for the conveyance of goods between the ships and the shore, and vice versa; and that some of those who have suffered from the interruption, have resolved to construct and to employ boats of their own. Whether these difficulties have been partial or general, it appears highly advisable, that the merchants of Calcutta should have a more direct control over the vessels thus employed, as the detention of a ship for a single day from the want of means to receive or discharge cargo, may entail a serious loss. These Blurs are at present a complete monopoly in the hands of a few, who dictate their own terms; and these are so exorbitant, that we rather wonder the subject has not attracted earlier attention. A Bhur is manned with four men, and a manjee to steer her; the charge is two Rupees a day. At the same time, the charge of a pansway, with the same complement of men, is one Rupee only. For this sum the pansway will ply to a distance of fifteen miles; whereas the trips of the Bhur, on the most active day, are limited to the distance between the ship and the shore, and never exceed three miles. The boatmen of the punaway will readily put their hands to the loading or unloading of their boats; the Bhur men will not put their little finger to any thing but their oars. They are the most indolent, the best paid, and, consequently, the most independent and insolent body of men connected with the commerce of the port. A good punaway may be built for a hundred Rupees; a Bhur will cost, perhaps, two hundred; there is nothing, therefore, in the original outlay to justify so glaring a difference between the hire of the respective boats. But the Bhurs are provided by the head sirkars of the mercantile houses, and the exorbitant charge which is made for them, constitutes their perquisite. The only remedy for this state of things is for the houses of business to provide barges of their own. Their work would certainly be executed with more expedition, and at one-half the present cost. A Bhur employed four weeks in the month, would, at two Rupees a day, cost 48 Rs. Four men and a manjee, would cost 21 Rs.; the interest on the cost of the boat, 2 Rs.; in all 51 Rs.—saving 25 Rs. It may be said that the boats might not be employed in the service of any house more than half the month; but even in this case, the charge for fourteen days would be less than the hire of a Bhur for four weeks; and the objection might be altogether removed, by a mutual interchange of their services, between the different houses, at a fixed rate of a Rupee a day. We think the subject is well worth the attention of the mercantile community of Calcutta. Obstacles will be raised to the plan by those who are interested in the abuses of the existing establishment; but a little firmness and perseverance will easily overcome them, and place the system of transporting goods upon a sound footing.

THE CALCUTTA CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.—On Saturday last a new weekly paper was started with this title, which, albeit its conductors have not had the civility to send a copy of it for our inspection, we are bound to notice; and the kindness of a friend, in supplying their lack of attention, happily enables us to do so. The Prospectus of our new Contemporary, purtains a good deal of the modest character of an apology for presuming to be. When the undertaking has been described, it evidently comes so near our own, that some difficulty is felt in justifying what is so like an intrusion upon the proper sphere of others. But, it seems, our new brother feels assured, from our "manly, generous and catholic spirit," that we shall be amongst his firmest supporters and warmest friends. Whoever he may be, he is evidently a gentleman. So we must either write ourselves down anything but what is manly, generous and catholic, or speak this rival fair, and call him friend. As there is no help for it, then, we may as well make friends with him, and wish him well; which accordingly we hereby do.

Whether the Christian Advocate and we shall interfere with each other, we cannot tell; but it is very probable we may; and much to be desired we should. Projectors are rather fond of being precise and definite in their plans; and our brother may now have some very nice scheme in his head, by which all things of certain sorts are to be excluded from his thoughts, and those of other sorts to be deemed properly within his range. We, too, have had conceits of that kind in our day. But now, were the truth known, we suspect there is very little rule in force about the topics brought before our readers, except that such as we like we discuss, and such as we do not like, we let alone. The Advocate, therefore, if he be particular on the matter, will find it rather difficult to avoid coming upon our beat. About our intruding upon his, we shall never trouble ourselves with a thought. We shall be very glad now and then to get a subject from him, especially when times become dull, and thought is languid; and it will be a marvel and a pity if he always thinks us we d. A little wholesome difference of opinion is good even amongst friends. On vital points we are not likely to have any dispute with our cotemporary; but such points will naturally be more regarded when they are maintained by two authorities instead of one. Whether, therefore, we differ or agree, we hope good will come of his existence and labours.

Indulgence is generally claimed, and with reason, for the early numbers of any periodical. We shall not, therefore, attempt any criticism of the first number of the Christian Advocate. We would only observe, that the printer stands in very great need of a competent corrector of his press. In addition to the Editor's exposé of his principles and intentions, the number contains papers on the Benefits of free and temperate Discussion, the Mechanics' Institution, Insurance and Marine Law, the Theology of the Englishman, as elicited by our remarks on the administration of Heathen Oaths, and a few minor notices. Some of these we should have transferred to our columns, had they not been pre-occupied by important matter. In the correspondence department, there is an interesting notice of the Jews of Calcutta, which we must some time place before our readers. In the meantime we bid our neighbour "God speed." If he finds a sufficiency of subscribers to support his paper, he may be satisfied there was room for it; and its publication will be justified. If he does not, he may conclude he has committed a mistake, which, however, it will be easy to rectify.

ADMINISTRATION OF HEATHEN OATHS.—We are happy to find that this subject is exciting general attention. Since we formerly noticed it, it has been discussed in the Calcutta Newspapers; and the Christian Observer, and the Christian Intelligencer of the present month, both contain papers attempting its elucidation. We have likewise received a letter upon it, from a gentleman in the Civil Service, which will be found in another column; and now we would try to ascertain whether, with all this talk, any real progress has been made in the question. The Englishman has brought a little sneering, a little irrelevant law quotation, and some curious casuistry to oppose the view we formerly took of the matter. On the other hand, the Harkness, in two very sound and sensible notices, has shown that his brother editor has shirked all the difficulty of the case; and left the question just as we had put it. We should have gladly given the articles of both our Contemporaries; but our very limited space forbids it. The omission we beg may not be attributed to disrespect for either. In the paper of the Christian Observer there is an amplification of the argument; but we see no essential addition to it. In the Christian Intelligencer we have three papers on the subject. The first is a long and able article, reprinted from the Banbury Oriental Christian Spectator, for December, 1836, which maintains the opinion we formerly gave; and its date shows we were mistaken in our surprise, that the question had not been treated before. The second is a short communication from the same Periodical of the next month, apparently by a Banbury Civilian; and to it we shall presently return. The last is a letter from a correspondent of the Intelligencer, who would vainly justify the existing practice, but in truth gives a very lame defence of it. He seems to be a well meaning person; but his skill as a commentator on the scriptures, is but small. His argument would countenance the idea, that the holy Apostle of the Gentiles, in becoming all things to all men, was of an slippery character, as to change his principles and practice with his company. Nothing, we believe, could be further from the truth respecting Paul, or more inconsistent with his integrity in general. The supposition is monstrous; and our Apostle, if called to the judgement seat, would not have hesitated to swear a heathen witness "per Jovem Opt. Max. or per Nomen Cæsaris," or by whatever may have been the common form of oath."

Upon the whole, then, by the discussion some confirmation has been received of the opinion, that a Christian Magistrate cannot be held guiltless in administering Heathen and Mohammedan oaths. It remains to inquire, whether any progress has been made in ascertaining the expediency or necessity of requiring such oaths at all. On this part of the case, we would first quote a sentence or two from a discussion of the point which occurred in 1825. The Grand Jury of Calcutta, in the fourth term of that year, observed in their presentment: "The reluctance of the respectable Native to come forward, as a witness, arises from feelings of a mixed nature. It is discernible to be instrumental in depriving another man, even justly, of property, liberty, or life; painful to have his own character exposed to further dishonourable suspicion, by the counter evidence of others, and to appear as a witness at all, is like infringing on a profession reputed infamous, however frequently resorted to for aid. He dreads disgrace, rather from taking an oath at all, than from its violation, when taken; and the odium of having rashly appealed to, and thus virtually abused the sacred object by which the oath is administered, forms by far the principal consideration in the objection of an unpractised or respectable Hindoo to swear in the present form." To this the Quarterly Friend of India added, that in prescribing an oath, "as essential to the validity of Hindoo evidence, the British Legislature were entirely mistaken. An oath of any kind, if not absolutely forbidden by their shastras, is, through custom, rendered so dishonourable, that scarcely a man whose testimony is worthy of credit, will venture to take one. But it is a fact, that many respectable Hindoos who are not brahmins, would rather perish than consent to touch the Toolsee leaf, or the waters of the Ganges, by way of swearing. Respecting the latter, indeed, the shastras expressly declare, that he who swears by the waters of the Ganges, consigns his race to future torments for fourteen generations. It is impossible for a Hindoo to confirm his evidence with the oath prescribed by the British Legislature, until he has lost every feeling which can render his testimony worthy of credit."

Now let us advert to the illustration which our Correspondent, Indes, advert to the value of the oaths in question. He tells us he found a bundle of rags had been substituted for the Koran in his Court for eleven years; and thousands upon thousands of oaths, therefore, had derived all the solemnity they possessed from this precious substitute. Perhaps it would not be an idle jest, were the Sudder Dewanny to issue a Circular, commanding the immediate examination of all the swearing Korans throughout the country. Who knows what a number of rags might be found. But it is a serious question—what effect may this substitute of rags have had on the administration of justice? Some might say it could have no effect at all; for what was believed to be the Koran, would be just as good practically as the Koran itself. Yes, were it really believed to be the Koran; but suppose a witness were sufficiently superstitious to dread giving false witness on the Koran, and yet resolved to give such witness, is it not plain that the Native Officer of the Court has it in his power to accommodate him with the rags on a consideration, and so allow him to perjure himself with an easy conscience? If with a hawk like the Koran, there is such scope for corruption and falsehood, how much more is there with the waters of the Ganges. Even Dr. O'Shaughnessy, we believe, would be unable to detect in the Ganges any portion of celestial Urrita, by which analysis could distinguish it from the water of a tank; and how easy is it, therefore, for a scrupulous Hindoo to be accommodated like the Mohammedan. In fact, these oaths are no security for obtaining the truth; and no Judge in the country places the slightest reliance on them as such. Let false testimony be promptly punished with the penalties of perjury, and then we shall have a certain guarantee, for which neither rags, nor rainwater, nor moonshine can be substituted.

We have now only to revert for a moment to the correspondent of the Bombay Christian Spectator, before alluding to. This gentleman has cut the knot for himself. As the Regulations, he says, do not prescribe a heathen oath, let direct simply that the oath used should be considered as binding on the conscience, he introduced a form of oath of his own, to which no one could object, whatever might be his religion. It was this: "He who gave me life, who is God, to whom I must give an account, by him I swear that this matter now to be declared is the truth." This was approved by all parties, and held to be universally binding. But we would ask, whether a servant of Government is allowed a great latitude of interpretation respecting the Regulations. We shall be glad to find that in this case he is. The discussion might then be closed.

PAINFUL DISCIPLINE.—We have thought it better to allow our readers a week's respite on this subject.

We are indebted to an esteemed friend for the following account of the dreadful Persecution of the Christians in Cochín China, by the public authorities, under the sanguinary orders of the King. The account will be read with melancholy interest; and will attract the deep sympathies of all denunciations of Christianity.

DREADFUL PERSECUTION IN COCHIN CHINA.

Extract of a letter, dated Upper Cochín China, 3d Jan. 1880.
(Translated from the French.)

"The year, 1880, has been for us a year of calamity and desolation; and for Touquin and Upper Cochín China one of misery and tribulation. The sword of persecution has made great havoc in the vineyard of the Lord; Heaven has been peopled with holy martyrs, but there have been likewise some apostates, and all together places the Christian Religion in these regions in serious danger. Two Dominican Bishops were arrested and beheaded for their faith last July; three Spanish clergymen of the same order have been also arrested and beheaded; seven indigenous priests (four of the Dominican Mission, and three of the French) have been likewise arrested and beheaded for the faith. All these generous Confessors and Martyrs have decolled the Church of God, and done honour to the Mission, by their courage, firmness and constancy they exhibited in the midst of their tortures, and by the noble-mindedness and resignation with which they shed their blood, and gave up their life for the Christian Religion, and the faith of Jesus Christ. Monsieur Havaud, of the diocese of Rennes, Bishop of Quairi, and Vice Apostolic of Western Touquin, died last July of sickness, brought on by excess of misery and fatigue. His Lordship was only three days ill. I have been told that Monsieur Simonin expired during his flight in the mountains, but I have not received an official relation of his death. We also have had a furious attack here in Upper Cochín China, on account of the dispersal of a small College we had founded. Monsieur Caudal was at the head of the little establishment, but the people of the district, not having taken sufficient precautions, were acted with sufficient prudence, the Pagans came to know the whole, and in order to obtain money, threatened immediately to give information to the Mandarins; but having no hopes of gaining any, they effectually denounced that this district contained a European priest, an indigenous one, a College, &c., whereupon a Mandarin proceeded thither with 300 soldiers, and the next morning by daybreak blockaded the village. Monsieur Caudal and the indigenous priest were enabled to flee, and make their escape; all the Chiefs of the place were arrested, and were put to the torture; were confined to the Head Quarters of the Province; underwent the interrogatory, but being overcome by dint of the torments inflicted on them, they had the weakness and misfortune to apostatize. A young céle of M. Candaf's, named Domine Thien, a lad of 18, was the only one among them that refused the faith; he suffered every sort of torment, and strenuously submitted to martyrdom. M. Candaf having had to undergo a great deal, in order to avoid the pursuit of the soldiers and Pagans, worn out at length with misery and languor, as well as exhausted with hunger, expired on the mountains of Upper Cochín China, on the 26th of last July. Monsieur Jaccard was involved in this business, through the odium and malevolence of a Mandarin, and especially of the King, who has been this long time seeking for a pretext to do away with him, so that this noble-minded Confessor was strangled on the 21st of last September, (St. Matthew's day,) with the aid, Domine Thien. Monsieur Baris and two Tonquinese priests have been arrested, and have suffered martyrdom; the former having been beheaded; and the two latter strangled for the faith, on the 24th November last. Upper Cochín China is by no means in peace; all there is disturbance and confusion; all the clergy are dispersed and concealed; all the canopies broken up. I have lately heard a melancholy piece of news. A Chinese vessel was lost in the beginning of December, to the north of Upper Cochín China; some persons saw the ship at sea without her sails, and making no way in any direction; she appeared a complete wreck, and all hands seemed to have perished. They floated on shore slaves, planks, boxes containing European articles, viz., books, pictures, mitres, episcopal sandals, white money, &c. The Ilalians have seized a number of the effects, and drunk all the wine; the Christians have had very little of any thing. I have sent orders to purchase whatever they can.

I subjoin a synopsis of the number that fell victims to this awful persecution.

THURSDAY, MAY 2.

The letters sent by the Mail of the Hugh Lindsay have been considerably short of those despatched by the preceding Mail. They numbered only 10,519 covers.—A new steamer of 990 tons burden has already been commenced at Douliay; this, and other circumstances, evince the fixed determination of Government to put their Steam Flotilla in the East on the most efficient footing.—The Aeng Pao, which has the line of communication between the provinces of Aracan and the rule of the Irrawaddy, has been ordered by Government to be put into a state of complete repair. The object is to improve the commercial facilities of the road.—The export of rice from the province of Aracan during the present season has been unusually large. An American vessel, the Lovely, has just called on that coast, and taken a cargo of rice from thence to Boston.—An Act has just been published, which enacts that on stamp duty, of institution fee shall be payable in respect of any Appeal from any Court of the East India Company to Her Majesty in Council.—The Landholder's Society has resolved that a respectful letter be addressed to Government, praying that some means may be used to bring to the notice of Her Majesty's Government, the injustice inflicted on India, in consequence of the duty now charged on Indian tobacco, being higher than on other colonial tobacco.—Letters have been received from Rangoon, with intelligence from Ava, which states that Capt. McLeod, the locus tenens of Col. Burney, had obtained an audience of the King, and had received handsome presents for himself and his suite. The cause of the superior favour shown to Capt. McLeod is said to be the intimacy which existed between him and Thierawadder, before the latter usurped the throne.—The Huckoo states, that Government has directed the abolition of the Pilgrim Tax at Juggurath. No official intimation has been given of any such measure; and we cannot discuss our mistat. It is, however, barely possible, that Government may, in this instance, have determined to "do good by stealth," to avoid the blunders which may follow the fame.

FRIDAY, MAY 3.

In a letter published in the Habit Two Courier, the writer, after stating that 900 or 1000 more Coolies had been commissioned out from Calcutta to New South Wales, pours a torrent of filthy abuse on all the philanthropists who are opposed to this trade. To what extent may his indignation be expected to arise, when he hears that the philanthropists are sons of the ascendant, and that the further exportation of coolies is forbidden.—The Seminaris, after a rigid scientific examination, has been found to be dangerous. It will be necessary to have her machinery removed, and the vessel refitted.—The Abercrombie Robertson has arrived at Malacca, with news from China to the 15th of March. The intelligence is more disastrous than ever. His Imperial Majesty's High Commissioner had arrived from Peking, in extinguishing the Opium trade. The members of the mercantile firms of Jardine and Co., and Dent and Co., had been ordered to leave Canton, and Mr. James to leave Macao. This trade was virtually at an end. Opium was offered at 200 to 150 dollars the chest; less than the prime cost and charges, and there were no buyers. Some of the superior provincial officers who had winked at the contraband trade, had also engaged the attention of the Commissioner.—At a meeting of the Asiatic Society, held on Wednesday last, Col. Baines produced a letter from Amersfoort, dated the 23d March, which contained an account of an awful earthquake that had occurred there, a day or two previous to that date: the letter concerned the earthquake very vividly—the houses had rocked so violently, that chimneys and towers tumbled about the rooms. The writer lost two infants and several slaves; and the next morning they found the country under water, and the earth tumbled up in several places—every brick house had been thrown down, and many trees had been lost—the palace of the King, at Ava, had shared the same fate, and was lying prostrate, burying many people in its ruins. An Armenian merchant, his wife and two children, were buried under the ruins of their own house.

SATURDAY, MAY 4.

The soi-disant Pertab Canal has been an ill-advised one, to go with parade to the Badshah Dosty Adawut. He was treated as he deserved.—The earthquake, which was felt at Amersfoort on the 23d of March, appears to have been felt at Rangoon.—Letters from Tehran state, that Mr. McNair, the British Envoy at the Court of Persia, left it on the 2d of January, on his return to England, and intended to take Russia on his way home. Col. Snel was in retreat in charge of the Mission at Larsoon, until the receipt of further directions.

MONDAY, MAY 6.

Authentic information has been received of the important events which have transpired at Basra. The Admiral arrived there in the Wellington, and was for the Persian Governor to call on him. The earthquake, which was felt at Amersfoort on the 23d of March, appears to have been felt at Rangoon.—Letters from Tehran state, that Mr. McNair, the British Envoy at the Court of Persia, left it on the 2d of January, on his return to England, and intended to take Russia on his way home. In consequence of Sir John Keane's having seized 1,500 camels, laden with grain, belonging to the Bengal Army, both men and cattle suffered greatly from want of food.

TUESDAY, MAY 7.

The Madras-papers maintain with confidence, that a letter, sent from Madras to Calcutta, to an officer in H. M. 44th, and through by the last Mail, distinctly states, on the authority of Marcellus papers, that Laura Phillips had been really, and indeed ascertained.—Rumours are again that that the Burmese and the English are preparing for a war, and that the two Queen's Regiments now expected, will be sent, on their arrival, to Maulmein. We believe the report is entirely without foundation.—The Agricultural Society's exhibition of fruit took place yesterday. The tract for prizes on the part of the Native Malabar, is described as having been very wretched; the Malabar, it is said, took the best of their fruit to market, and brought what they could not sell there, for the prizes. This is so completely in coaracter, that it can be easily crested.—At the meeting held at the Union Bank, to adopt the new deed of Partnership, last week, Mr. Dickens gave notice of his intention to propose that the capital stock of that Institution should be raised from eighty lakhs, to a crore of Rupees, or one million sterling.—At a meeting held at the Town Hall, on Saturday last, in reference to the Bengal Salt Company, which the late Mr. G. A. Prinsep introduced so successfully to establish, his brother, Mr. W. Prinsep, read the Report of the Acting Committee, from which we learn that the number of lakhs taken by Europeans, amounted to 848; by Natives, to 708; and that the application to Government, to conduct the Salt Works on the Excise system, had been referred to the Court of Directors. Mr. Dickens was appointed Chairman of the Company.—There appears to be little prospect that a tender will be despatched by Government to the Red Sea in June. A sailing vessel will start for Aden from Bombay on the 20th June, which, it is supposed, would reach that point in fifteen days. The Great Western would do it in less than ten.

We beg to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of the following sum for the Friend of India.—

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

GENTLEMEN,—In your paper of the 4th instant, you speak of Bengalee Poetry in more favourable terms than I could imagine to be justly applicable to it. Could you take the trouble to state briefly what the Poems in that language are, which you deem to be not undeserving of comparison with the literature of Greece and Rome?

I supposed that such an estimate of even the noblest specimens of Indian Poetical Literature, was furnished only by those scholars, in whom the novelty and unexpected fertility of the Oriental field of authorship, had produced a somewhat exaggerated idea of its riches.

Notwithstanding the superior efficacy which, I think, instruction in Western Science and useful knowledge of a novel character generally, when conveyed in the English language, must assert over the same instruction when imparted through a Vernacular medium—yet the effect which it appears, from your remarks, the extension of English education has produced, to diminish the number of Vernacular Schools and pupils, is greatly to be lamented: and it is to be hoped, that your observations may do some service in bringing about the revival of Schools in the Native languages. If you could give any Statistics of the existing Vernacular education carried on by Missionaries, they would possess much interest.

Yours faithfully,

April 17, 1859.

JIGTARA.

We are only able this week to mention, for the information of our Correspondent, that the four principal poems in the Bengalee language, are the Ramayun, the Mahabharat, the Kabeer Akhara, and the Umadoot Anugol. We shall take an early opportunity of returning to the subject.—Ed.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

Sirs,—You have of late published some observations upon Oaths, Hesthen Oaths, the Koran, and the Gunga Jal. In part I am inclined to agree with you; in part not. You appear to regard them as being of no use; presuming, I suppose, upon the old principle, that no oath will cause a dishonest man to speak the truth, and that for a true and honest man, they are unnecessary. Now, I have known witnesses depose upon oath, in direct opposition to their statements made at the Thumrah, which are taken without oath; and their reasons for doing so have been, that upon oath they feared to tell a falsehood; and their statements when sworn to, were found to be true. Whether they spoke truth when the oath was administered, from religious conviction, or to his ear, or from fear of the consequences of perjury, is not certain; but I am inclined to think, that the fear of the consequences was the soft persuasion that influenced them. If we be authorized to punish false affirmations, as we now do false complaints, the promulgation of the sentence, and its execution, will greatly promote the interests of truth; and in the inferior Courts, I think ought to be, with advantage, dispensed with. (Once upon a time, in open Court, my suspicions were excited, as to the verity of the Koran. I mean, whether the parol tendered to depose in cases, really was the Book of the Prophet and the Faithful. I ordered the Mullah Kuranee to open it in my presence, and show it to me. He objected, and exclaimed, "No Sahib had ever done this before! It was contrary to custom and creed." The beauties of the Koran could not be unveiled before the eyes of an unbeliever. In short, he refused. I told my Nair to bring me the book, with an injunction or two which brought them to a filial state of mind; for the greater part of my Andas were Mahomedans, and took the Koran's side. I earnestly unfolded every outward binding, and found inside a piece of dirty cloth! There was not even a scrap, or a verse, or a written page of paper of any description. No extract; no text from the Holy Book; and yet this Oath-officer had trampled every oath upon this bundle of dirty kraph for eleven years! (I should have said for the lawyers, as in eleven years legal swearing, and the validity of all the decisions upon the Koran. I hope this question will be discussed fully in the Friend of India for far more present, our Oath-taking and Oath-swearing ring system is a sickening mockery of the name of the Universal Ruler, in which all the nations of the Earth shall be blessed; whose "Be-ye-Truth, and whose Shaloo-e-Idolatry." What is truth? Doctrines prevail? At this time and hour there is an organized band of perjurors and suborners in this city, who are the terror of all, who grow fat and prosper in their career of iniquity. Through their influence there has been our hanging affair, I know, and they are rich and successful in their trade, which greatly profits the "mild Hindoo." Oaths are binding, and regarded as sacred by the better and more respectable part of the Native community; but they are the minority, and seldom appear to give evidence upon oath in Court. If impressively administered as an appeal to the Deity, so as to awaken their sleeping minds and feelings, I have known the natives regard the oath as a solemn and binding adjuration; but generally it is regarded as an empty ceremony, and is the cause of much mischief and injustice from the Belch check there exists upon perjurers, and the difficulty of being proved to convict. Lies and false depositions are easily ascertained; don't mean exaggerations and confused statements, but deliberate and interested falsehoods; not so perjury, which numbers do commit with impunity.

Yours truly,

ISHER.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

Sirs,—In some of your lately published numbers, you have expressed an intention and wish to bring to public notice, my biographical observations upon characters connected with India, as well as the tendency of their measures and public conduct. I therefore propose, with your consent, to pen a few remarks respecting our late Ruler, Lord W. Bentinck, in hopes that they may be inserted in the columns of the "Friend of India," a Journal which is conducted with much ability, and judicious freedom of discussion. It is not my intention to enter into a very full view of the subject, for I have no leisure to do so. I propose to express my own individual opinion upon the character and results of the more notorious resolutions of our late Ruler, and their effects upon British interests in this country; as well as to state the real benefits which he conferred upon the Native community, which opinions I feel satisfied will be confirmed by the agreement of a great majority of those who are acquainted with them, and their consequences. The leading features of His Lordship's administration were a fixed determination to retrench, an eager desire and will for innovation, and I am willing to believe, a wish for improvement. Subsequent experience has proved the impolicy of many of his orders, which have been modified or altogether reversed; and none have been more conspicuously disowned, than his union of the Magistrate with the Collector; the abolition of Corporal Punishment, more especially in the Army; the Commissioner system; the merit-fostering and the espionage, which he encouraged and introduced; the Half Batta Order, and the unbounded tenderness of his measures to lower the European character; and which it is to be feared, have been followed with that result. I will pass over his little peculiarities of manner and expression, which are numerous upon record; as for instance, when he indulged in a piece of pleasantry with an acquaintance of mine at Calcutta, who (having sought an interview, for the purpose of stating his grievances and losses by an appointment which he held in that neighbourhood having been curtailed of half its emoluments, and of which he was then the incumbent,) was asked by His Lordship, "How long, Captain —, have you held your present appointment?" "About five years," my Lord. "Indeed! what a very lucky man you have been to draw such good allowances, (about 200 Rs. per mensem extra,) so long; and with one of his blandest smiles, the Ruler bowed him to the door. I will pass over, I say, those tawny sallies, and proceed at once to facts. One of His Lordship's first edicts, was the obnoxious Half Batta Order, which is approved of, and determined to carry into effect. This measure has been so fully discussed and canvassed by all parties, that my further comments would be inopportune. It gave great dissatisfaction to the army in general; and its hardships were fully felt by impoverished Sahibdars, and those who were least able to bear them. The saving to the State was, comparatively speaking, trifling, especially when we consider the ill-feeling which arose from it. If it be said that Lord William's hands were tied, (to use his own expression and excuse for every harsh order,) and that he was compelled to obey the orders of the Court, the necessity of which is by no means certain; then, assuredly, by disposition he was eminently qualified for the duties and labours of an official executor of inviolable obligations and decrees. It is singular and prejudicial to his character that he should have been selected; and that so high-minded a personage as Lord W. Bentinck is represented to have been by some amongst his partisans, should have agreed to do all the dirty jobs which his predecessors had declined. An individual, perhaps, was required, possessed of qualifications, combining the "enforcer in modo," with the "forfeiter in re," and his o-helpers have said that man was Lord W. Bentinck.

The next measure which Lord W. determined upon, was the union of the Magistracy with the Collectorate. No order has tended so much to disorganize both departments, as this; and we are informed, that it was enforced in the face of the most valiant remonstrances against it. Some of those I have seen; and our most experienced functionaries declared, that it was utterly impossible for one overburdened officer to do justice to the Government, the Natives, and himself. But His Lordship, with that resolute adherence to his own will, and pertinacity of opinion, which were his chief characteristics, overruled the many sound objections which were advanced, and Collector-Magistrates were appointed. I defy his partisans to point out one district in which this system has worked well; indeed, its defects have now become so glaring, that in most of the larger Zillahs, the union has been virtually annulled.

The misery and injustice which were the results of this union may not be known to all; but the consequence has been, an impression on the minds of our Native subjects, that we cared not for them. This feeling is still prevalent, and some time must elapse before it can be fully eradicated. I will specify one district for general information, and vouch for its truth and accuracy. In Zillah Behar, in the year 1837, there were cases filed on the Magistrate's list, amounting to 374, all pending from the year of the union, 1833; there were 73 appeals unheard and undecided; there were whole bundles of what are there termed, "bar owerstek" Missils, the meaning of which is cases brought over; that is to say, put upon the shelf half investigated, until a future opportunity, or until the Collector-Magistrate might have leisure to attend to them. Some of these cases were of a serious description; and amongst them, I found one of a wilful murder, which was perpetrated in 1834. I apprehended the murderer, while attending to the cultivation of his field, in confident and comfortable security; committed him, and he was eventually hanged in 1835. He confessed his crime, and stated that he had lived at home quiet at his ease; and that no efforts had been made to apprehend him; and that I must have been the pre-determined instrument of his punishment. During such a state of things, the oppressors and bad characters literally levelled black-mail, and grew rich in the prosperous and unheeded career of crime. The wronged, in hopelessness of redress, refrained largely from bringing their cases to notice, and quietly submitted to their fate. These are facts; they speak for themselves, and need no comments. However startling they may be, they are true. With respect to the Revenue, its alightsness seemed a greater degree of attention to it; but yet these matters fell into a very confused and disorganised condition. I happened to be the Head Assistant, in 1835, to the Collector-Magistrate of Behar; and well remember the earnest and repeated protestations which my official superior made for extra assistance, and the repudiation of the two offices; that he was overwhelmed with business; and that it was impossible to dispose of it in a satisfactory manner. No relief was afforded to either himself or the Native community; and yet this officer had been severely reprimanded by the authorities for inefficiency; and I believe put upon reduced allowances, because he could not attain the end, without the means, and perform the anomalous and impracticable duties of a Collector-Magistrate! The time has arisen when the bad effects of this union are seen and felt. They were pointed out to the Ruler beforehand, but His Lordship was not exempt from those little fallings and errors to which we are all liable; and amongst them, we may fairly number, wrap-headedness, and a certain preternatural notion of judgment, which made him notoriously intolerant of opposition to his conceptions, even in the shape of argument and proof. He was wont to term objections made to his line and policy, insubordination and disobedience. His peculiar friends called him resolute; the discerning public declared him obstinate.

A wise man has written thus: "enjoyers get errors, nullifiers and indifferents in errors persevere." The truth of this remark is applicable to our late Governor. Some of his measures have been greatly modified, and many altogether abandoned; not by himself, although he must have been well aware of their bad effects, but by a more judicious Government. I may mention the system of Commissioners, with both Police and Revenue duties, to superintend the Provincial Sapeys, an arrangement which has been lately put upon a better footing; the Post Magistracy; the re-appointments of a Superintendent of Police; the disjunction of the Magistrate and Collector in many Districts; the refusal of that most unaccountable command, that no young Civil Servant should obtain preferment, until he had been three years emancipated from College; and the virtual cessation of his merit-fostering favoritism and system of espionage. With respect to the tridentist period, and the Ruler's flag thereupon, that no junior Civilian should be entitled to promotion, until his apprenticeship, as it were, of three years, should have expired, the order was contrary to Act of Parliament, which declared that portion of the time spent at Harford College was to be reckoned, with reference to our capability of holding offices.

The same may be said of the o-helpers, who were appointed, as so much of o-helpers were, by this act, were formally abolished and put aside by the Great Mogul power of Lord Bentinck; and I well remember the discouraging effects, and the depressing which we still feel, upon the issue of the aforementioned rule. many became indifferent to their duties and official business; and although we were told that the tribunal order had been annulled by the Court, I can only remember two instances in which the Ruler did not abide by his original intention; and the invariable return to our applications for appointments, was, that the period of penance had not passed away. With the exception of two Government House favourites, we were all put upon a par, do what we would, upon this principle, it may be conjectured, that if the bell will not fit the men, the men must be made to fit the bell. His orders respecting the merit-fostering and espionage system, I plainly affirm were the result of a low and suspicious mind; which subject brings me to the remark so generally made, that the Ruler's conduct and exposed opinions justified the impression, that he cherished suspicions that the servants of the Government, in every department, omitted no opportunity to over-reach him. Fully impressed with these unworthy and offensive views; and having ascertained the necessity of enforcing some real and beneficial reforms, the Ruler, without careful discrimination, ordered many precipitate measures to be put in force, the ill effects of which have been since made apparent. He may, with justice, be supposed to have predetermined in his own mind, that our Indian administration was altogether conducted upon wrong principles; that nothing was done rightly, and that the whole machinery required alteration. Turning a deaf, or indifferent ear to the representations of many of the more experienced officers in every branch of the service, he did not give that unbiased and close consideration, which the various questions of his reforming system called for, but rushed at once into them. He could not "let well alone;" and though we may smile at the energy of his livest-pouss prestin plans, and admire the strength of mind and forbearance which he evinced, in enduring the remonstrances of those officers who entertained doubts as to the utility and permanent advantage of his schemes, still it must be admitted that they have been, in many respects, injurious, if not complete failures. I will make a few observations upon one notorious order, the abolition of Corporal Punishment, in both the Civil and Military Services. We are informed very generally, that very few, if any, favourable answers were received to the Circulars which were issued in the different Functionaries, desiring their opinions upon the proposition; and yet in the very face of this dissent from those who, by virtue of their situations, might be supposed to know most about the matter, and whose judgement was entitled to much attention, the Ruler proclaimed its abolition.

EUROPE.

EXTRACTS FROM THE SPEECH OF GEN. THOMPSON, ESQ. AT A PUBLIC MEETING HELD IN GLASGOW, ON THE 14TH NOVEMBER, 1838.

In the meantime, it was to the East Indies that he begged to direct their attention. When Mr. Montgomery Martin was in Glasgow, some time ago, he spoke largely of the condition of the natives of our East India possessions. He spoke also of the famine which raged in the upper provinces of what is called British India. He (Mr. Thompson) had told them, that these famines were produced by a combination of causes—that they were partly attributable to the neglect, through centuries, of the tanks, and aqueducts, and canals of the country—these had been suffered to go wholly, or nearly, into decay—that they grew partly out of the want of public roads, which rendered it impossible to get the superabundance of our provinces conveyed into another where starvation prevailed. Then there was frequently a monopoly of the fruits of the earth in the hands of those who constituted themselves the lords of the soil. But I told you, besides, that the grand cause of these wasting visitations in that beautiful and fruitful country, was the manner in which the land was taxed by the Government, and the mode in which the revenue was collected. To these causes, taken together, was the evil to be attributed; and, though it might be impossible to give immediate relief to India, yet such measures might be taken as would prevent its recurrence in future. The radical cause of the periodical famines in India appeared to be the assumption by Government of a proprietary right in the soil; and, as a consequence, the right of taxing the land to any amount, however exorbitant, and of framing an arbitrary mode of collection. Here Mr. T. said he would go a little in detail into this matter, but, deeply interesting part of the subject; and he hoped that, when they recollected that the fate of 100 millions of people depended on the proper settlement of this question—that the missionary operations of the country must be comparatively in vain—that all the philanthropic efforts of the benevolent, must be to a great degree useless, unless the ground-work of a better system be laid, by the adoption of some other mode of Government—when they recollected that, he trusted they would not turn a deaf ear to what, under other circumstances, might be considered unbecomingly minute details, it has (said Mr. T.) been hitherto generally asserted and believed, that the State in India is the sole landlord—I say generally, because the opinion is not now so uniform among the whole of the administrative body, either in this country or India, as it once was; but it is of the utmost consequence that this point should be cleared up before we seek to apply a remedy to the existing evils of India, growing out of the agricultural affairs of the country. The land tax of India is confessedly more oppressive than in any other country of the world. It has had the effect of compelling the cultivators to abandon their fields, and of deterring others from tilling them. The frequent dearths that afflict India may be attributed to the prevailing system of collecting the land revenue. These dearths, with all their dreadful consequences, must inevitably take place periodically, unless such a system be adopted as will encourage agricultural industry, and develop the resources of that country. It has been over and over again stated, that the peculiar and separate rights of individuals and the government, in respect of the lands, are undetermined and unknown—and hence the question of remedy has been considered as impracticable; but I believe that all, who will be at the pains to become informed of the results of the inquiries which I have been enabled to derive at a satisfactory conclusion upon its most important preliminary point. The question to whom the soil of India belongs, is one which should be approached without prejudice and without preconceptions. A love of justice, and a respect for ancient rights, should guide us in our researches. Our earliest accounts of India, supplied by Europeans, exhibit the country as extremely flourishing—with institutions of unequalled perfection—governed by a civilised and intelligent people—among whom were many profound philosophers, renowned by the Greeks, (Gymnosophists). Such appears to have been the condition of India before the time of Alexander the Great. Each village was in itself a little republic, requiring no extraneous laws for its government. Each field contributed a specified proportion of its crop towards the support of the municipal officers of the village—another portion, which the State from which the village derived its jurisdiction, took in discharge of its own distinct privileges, and from external assistance or unenrichment. The portions of the crops thus rendered to each one-tenth of the gross produce, leaving with the proprietor eight-tenths. The Institutes of Menu (the latest commentary on which, by Calaneo, is believed to have been written eight centuries before the Christian era) fix the portion of the State at one-twelfth, one-tenth, or one-eighth part of the produce, in times of peace—to one-sixth in time of war, and to one-fifth in time of actual invasion. The latter was the condition in which Alexander the Great found the land tax in his time, as mentioned by Arius, three centuries before Christ, and as it was found by the Mahomedans who invaded India in the tenth century. A very celebrated lawyer of the South of India, who wrote in the 17th century, fixes the amount demand of the Sovereign at one-sixth of the produce of the land from the proprietor, shall be deemed infamous in this world, and shall be cast into hell flames in the next." Now, although this edict was not always rigidly adhered to by the Kings of the South, yet, according to the most authentic accounts, the land was saleable in that country at from fourteen to thirty years' purchase, all the time when British obtained possession of India. The Mahomedans were more strict, without exception, assert that the Hindoo land tax never exceeded, in time of peace, one-sixth of the produce. The exaction of the tax into money was the business of the Government, and from the responsibility of which the cultivator was entirely exempt. The Mahomedans invaded India early in the 10th century, but they only obtained a precarious footing at Delhi in 1206, and in the Deccan in the 13th. They increased the land tax from one-sixth to one-third of the produce, and by this impost drove out of cultivation vast and fertile tracts, most of which were conferred tax-free upon their (the Mahomedan's) religious establishments. The wealth of India declined during the latter period of their rule, and, before we obtained any territorial possessions, famines, like those which are now so frequent occurrences, occasionally desolated India. The British were not the consequence of the rigorous exactions of the Government, and the utter neglect of the roads which once existed throughout Upper India, but which were suffered to become overgrown and impassable. Our first territorial acquisition was in the year 1763, in the province of Bengal, and we have since become masters of a mighty empire—an empire not inferior to all Europe, excluding Russia, and embracing a population of 24 millions of souls, besides 14 millions of tributaries. I cannot help wishing I possessed the ministerial authority, and distinguished ability of our venerated chairman, in order that I might impress on this audience the awful responsibility which would, as a nation, we lie to God, in regard to these 150 millions of human beings. Little are we accustomed to calculate the amount of responsibility which rests upon us, in consequence of having made ourselves the masters and rulers, and tyrants, and tax-gatherers, over scores of millions of our fellow creatures. We are all in the habit of sounding to the echo the praises of our country for her missionary operations; and I would be the last man in the universe off Goa to detract from the sublimity and the glory of these great modern efforts for the redemption of the world; but when I look at these portions of the globe, on which the Christian may have smiled, or the missionary wept—when I think of the blessings conferred by missionary labours, and contrast these with the countless injuries, the millions of murders, the exterminations, which have been perpetrated, and all of which are more directly traceable to us, as a nation, than are our missionary operations, which are the voluntary efforts of individuals,—when I dwell upon this contrast, I blush for my country, and feel that she should hide her head in shame and penitence, and never speak of herself as a just or Christian nation, till, rightly estimating her Christian responsibility, she asks atonement for the gigantic crimes she has committed against the rights and liberties of mankind. (Cheers.) He need not have perceived the circumstances that brought us into contact with the native princes of India, who by various means were subjected, first, to the forfeiture of their power, and, lastly, of their dominions; their inhabitants, frequently worried out by long bad government and oppression, throwing themselves into our arms for protection. And what are the princes of India now but slaves of the Government of India? What but crouching and often disaffected princes; and the danger to our British empire in India is not from the power of Russia, but from those in whose friendship we ought to have been strong—our danger is not from the Goewaks; not from a solitary, or even from many independent native princes, but from the 100 millions of people whom we have enslaved for half a century. They have perceived that while Christian in name, we are in many respects infidel in practice; and the danger to their affection will be allayed from British rule, and that their arms and their energies will be transferred to another power—then farewell to greatness, farewell to power—India will be lost, and we shall stand condemned and punished in the face of heaven. (Cheers.) But to resume, how have we acted towards these conquered or ceded possessions? We have neglected to make any wise masters of the institutions as perfect as they are admirable; and, through our ignorance (though often with the best intentions) we have inflicted upon the inhabitants the dearest injuries. First, we made ourselves the proprietors of the soil, and, setting on that assumption, departed from all the principles and recognised rights which had guided former Governments. Forfeiting the practice of our predecessors, which was to take only a small portion of the crops, we every where imposed a satwaj tax, at an unvaried rate representing perhaps one-half or one-fourth of the produce (as prices fluctuated as the ground was more or less abundant), but which, in process of time (chiefly owing to the diminished value of grain), came to be equal to the value of the entire crop—say, in many instances, greatly exceeded the price obtainable for the whole produce of the land. The exactions of the collectors, therefore, were limited only by the capacity of the cultivator to pay the impost. And what was the consequence of this line of procedure? Why, the cultivators abandoned the land; and where there had been once fruitful and smiling fields, nothing was now to be seen but impenetrable jungle, where the tiger, stretched in his lair, was ever ready to spring upon his victims—to take the mother and the child, nay, to destroy whole families, as had more than once been experienced in this ill-fated country—and the huge bosom-writer, and numberless reptiles, called themselves where the husbandman was wont to pursue his labours in peace. I speak literally, and those who know any thing of India know that it is distressingly true, that where fertile fields and waving grain once stood, remunerating the cultivator, and speeding plenty over the land, nothing is to be seen but the barren and unprofitable wilderness. Mr. T. then went on farther to show the evil effects of such government on the natives, and also to point out that, instead of enriching the Government, their exactions had only tended to impoverish them, for there seemed, he observed, to be some eternal law of nature by which it was ordained, that those who unjustly oppressed their fellow-men, whether nations or individuals, should never reap the fruit of their iniquity. Mr. T. then proceeded.—The impolicy and injustice of the system he had distressingly obvious, and also to point out that a permanent settlement of the land-tax was made throughout the great provinces of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, embracing an area of 1,200,000 square miles, and including a population of nearly 40,000,000 souls. This settlement transferred for ever the proprietary right of the soil, whether cultivated or waste, to a race of chiefs who through ages had been what might be called the liegemen of counties, whose duties he mentioned in collecting the revenues already mentioned for the support of the State—in keeping in repair the public roads—and in the maintenance of an efficient police. For the performance of the first duty they received a per centage upon the amount raised—for the second they received the necessary sums out of the revenue, or assignments of land; and, for the third, they were authorised to take tolls, regulated and limited by the State. By the permanent settlement system, these hereditary chieftains, or Zemindars, as they were called, were, from being public officers, converted into sons of the soil, proprietors of all the soil comprised in their respective counties—they were exempted from the support of the general police and the tolls, hitherto taken for the keeping up of the roads, (which, however, under late governments had been neglected,) committed to the custom masters. This last named charge became the means of grievous oppression—the monies raised were diverted from their original purpose to the uses of the State, and the roads, the substantial basis of the prosperity of a great agricultural country, were, at last, altogether neglected and abandoned. It is not desirable on this occasion to go into a detail of all the workings of this well-intentioned, but ill-digested scheme. It may be sufficient to remark, that since it came into operation, now 45 years ago, the Government has derived a fixed and regular revenue, while the other sources of state finance have greatly increased. The new landlords, under the denudation of proprietors, having rented the waste land at very reduced rates to the peasantry, have, in most cases, virtually reduced the land-tax throughout their districts,—vast tracts of forest lands have been reclaimed—and the population has greatly increased. The newly constituted lords of the soil have become wealthy, and have been able to send their children to the metropolis of India to receive a polished and scientific education, and to transmit to them an increasing rich inheritance (as they might be said to hear.) While, however, this permanent settlement measure has promoted the wealth and independence of many of the present proprietors, it has fallen far short of justice to the original and rightful owners of the soil—the members of the village communities. Their rights have been disregarded—their patrimony rapidly and ignorantly alienated. In not a few districts, scenes of revolting injustice, aggression, and cruelty have been enacted, the inhabitants have been handed over to the tender mercies of men who have been put into possession of power, which they have abused, to the impoverishment and ruin of those whose ancestors were once wise, and wealthy, and happy, upon the lands from which they are now driven by the iron rule of avarice and oppression. These evils, however, are not to be ascribed to the permanent settlement of the land revenue, but to our present disregard of the rights of individuals. The settlement has not been made with the proper persons. Ancient usage and laws have been overlooked—institutions, equally venerable and equitable, have been inconsiderately broken up, and a grievous wrong inflicted, where only good was intended. In the first place, we unjustly assumed a proprietary right in the soil—in the next place, proceeding without sufficient calculation, we fixed a tax upon the usurped soil, which was frequently more than the market value of the entire produce—and, lastly, when, aware of the error committed by this mode of taxation, we determined to relinquish the management of the land to others, and to fix permanently the revenue it should yield, we transferred the right we had assumed, not to the representatives of the original proprietors and cultivators, but to persons who had from their infancy been merely officers under the State, collecting imposts for public and patriotic purposes. In proportion as this right is abused do the cultivators feel the injustice of the course pursued towards them. This second mistake was at length perceived by the members of the Home Government, and awakened their concern. They marked the melancholy consequences in cases where the mere proprietors of the contracts (named emphatically in the Act Estates) were ignorant or unmindful of the rights of the village landholders. They say, too, that not only had they erred in passing by the real proprietors, but also in abandoning the tax on all the waste lands, now made available by the present contractors, and they, therefore, resolved to extend the permanent settlement no farther. Now introducing the various departures from justice and sound policy which we have noticed, this increase has on the whole, conferred lasting benefits upon the natives, and, with their attendants, pestilence and contagion have disappeared, and the country presents, for hundreds of miles along the banks of its noble rivers, one unvaried scene of cultivation—a scene not witnessed in any other part of India. The policy of the Government, and the general ignorance which prevails on the subject of the rights of the natives, have hitherto prevented the extension of the permanent settlement to the mountainous and the provinces to which we have referred. Hitherto every lesson has been lost upon the rulers of the desolates of the East. In vain has the annual diminution of the revenue, and the abandonment of the soil by the cultivators, appealed to the interests of the great absentee Lords of the wide and fertile plains of India. In vain have wailing families and desolating plagues appealed to the compassion and humanity of those who are clothed in purple and fine linen, and fare sumptuously every day. In vain have the public servants of the Company, including their own Governors, laid their reports and suggestions before the Board. The united claims of justice and mercy have been sacrificed to a blind and miserable, and temporary expediency. What, then, remains but to appeal from the chartered sovereigns of suffering and down-trodden myriads to the sympathy and wonder-working energy of a great and free people, who, when rightly informed, will not hesitate to muster again their mighty power, and check the march of oppression in the East, as they have done in the West. It cannot be that those who have wept, and prayed, and laboured for the eight hundred thousand slaves of the Antilles, will be deaf to the cry of one hundred million of their fellow-subjects, in a land which requires only an equitable administration of its public affairs, to make it an earthly paradise to its inhabitants and the granary of the world. I am perfectly aware that the attention of the philanthropists and religious societies of this country has been directed to the attainment of other and equally laudable objects—some of them of paramount importance to the moral and spiritual welfare of the natives of India. But it is sufficiently apparent, that to facilitate the accomplishment of their high ends, the great measure of justice to which I have now alluded, must be made co-extensive with the population and the soil of that country. This is a necessary preliminary step. No wide moral amelioration can take place until the march of extortion and famine is arrested. When this shall be the case, the millions of India will be disposed in amiable to the generosity and benevolence of their rulers. They will learn to look up to the Government under which they live as one of a paternal character, and will listen, without reluctance and without exception, to the counsels which regard their future and eternal state—counsels which must in a great degree fall of effect, while those in whom they are tendered are languishing and dying under the multiplied and accumulating evils of the present system. You point the Indian to the cross; and the dying man says, "away with the cross, give me bread." If you would preach the cross with effect, you must first put the bread in his hand; and then you must lead him to the cross, and then give him the bread of life, and the water of which if a man drink he will thirst no more. After some further remarks illustrative of the necessity of providing for the physical wants of the natives of India, in order to prepare them the more readily to receive the gospel, Mr. Thompson proceeded to detail the necessary remedies. Some one would perhaps be asking what did he want? His reply was—Justice for India. They often heard of justice for Ireland; and he would not be a party to silencing the cry; he would rather help to swell the chorus, and join in the demand for all that was just and equitable, and desirable, for Ireland as for India. We often hear of justice to Ireland, and to her aborigines; we hear it rising from her deep-set vale, and her hidden mountains, and from the banks of her slumbering lakes, where the monuments of her proud antiquity are mouldering into dust; and Ireland and her sons have been made for England, and their aborigines only to be plundered by her tyranny. He would not put down the cry of justice for Ireland, but he would join in its mournful strains, as they swelled upon the lips of Erin, and in her songs of sorrow and of sadness; and in the chorus of justice to Ireland, with her seven millions, he would sing justice to India, with her hundred millions. (Cries of Amen.) Mr. T. then proceeded to put out the remedies, which were, first, of all, the settlement of the land tax upon a just basis. He then exhibited the advantages which would result from a new system: first, the confidence and esteem of the natives; but, still more, the advantages which would flow to our trade. If even to the amount of five, a year were consumed by each nation, a demand of 50 millions in manufactures would be made upon the mother country. He contrasted the amount of taxes paid by the people of India with those taxes which were paid by other countries. In some places 50s., and in others as high as 80s. a year were paid in taxes, while in India it only amounted to 4s. India! the land of gold, the garden of the world, where the sun scarcely ceases to shine, and where, instead of a hard unmanageable soil, the husbandman had but to turn the brick, beat the atom, sow the seed, and up they came a crop to gladden and beautify the land. And yet the people could only pay 4s. a head. Ask, continued Mr. T. the weavers of Paisley how much they pay?—ask the cotton-spinners of Lancashire, at the pickings of the mines, how much they contribute to make up the 50 millions of our revenue? But let us turn from this dreary, black land—from the bronze-tinged people of Calcutta, with its barren mountains, its rugged rocks, its black heaths, and roaring rivers—let us turn to that land, where poets lure to revel amid oriental beauty and bloodshed; and yet from the people of this land there can only be raised 4s. a head. Mr. Thompson then went on to observe this was a favourable time to do something for India. In the first place, every person was afraid of Russia; the whole talk was, what news about India, what of Russia and the Caspian Sea, and what of Persia? All this was to be favourable to a renunciation of the system in India; and they might rest satisfied that the danger was not from Russia, but from the internal misrule of the Indian Government itself. Another favourable prospect was, that a considerable proportion of the Court of Directors were in favour of the permanent settlement of the land-tax, or, in other words, of doing justice to the people of India; and in the Court of Proprietors the measure was supported, and the voices of the country were confidently looked to, to strengthen the hand of the friends of India. The press was also beginning to write on the subject, and now was the time, in many respects, the most favourable, for agitating this question, that could be chosen. —Glasgow

RELIGIOUS.

FIVE NEW CHURCHES will shortly be consecrated and opened in London. The first, built and endowed by the trustees of the late Mrs. Hynman's munificent bounty, is situate in Paradise-street, Rotherhithe, where a new church has lately been opened in the lower part of the town near the Commercial Dock; the second is in Park-street, Southwark; the third is situate at the bottom of Carlisle-lane, Lambeth, on ground presented by the Archbishop of Canterbury; the fourth is in Berwick-street, Soho; and the fifth, in the Trotter-ground, Whitechapel. —Pict.

OWSEYAN—SOCIALISM.—An visiting the large manufacturing districts, the travelling secretary of the Religious Tract Society was grieved to find that vigorous efforts were making, and that to a great extent, for the circulation of infidel and obscene tracts, by parties calling themselves Socialists. They ridicule and reject the Holy Scriptures, deny the moral responsibility of man, charge all sin on the holy and ever-blessed God, and suggest various and horrible plans for indulging, with impunity, in the grossest licentiousness. Marriage, which the word of God declares to be "honourable in all," is pronounced by them to be a vice, and not a blessing to society; and even a woman tramples from place to place to lecture against it. It is truly lamentable that large numbers of persons are disposed to receive such sentiments, and are thus "led captive by the devil at his will." The unblinking avowal of sentiments so inimical to social order, may, however, be a means of checking the progress of this abominable system. Meanwhile the friends of truth, morality, and religion, weakening their strength by divisions. The columns furnished by the "Tracts for the Times" are followed by many; and a Roman Catholic priest, on the opening of a new and splendid church at Leeds, rejoiced that light was at length breaking on the minds of the Oxford divines! Surely such facts loudly call on all the followers of the Redeemer to unite in fervent prayer for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit; that error, in every form, may be successfully opposed; and that the efforts in this work may be proportioned to the urgent necessities of man. —Christian Spectator.

THE ROMAN CATHOLICS are about to build a magnificent church in Manchester. —Pict.

THE COMPLETE EMANCIPATION of the Jews in Denmark, according to a letter of the 14th inst. from Copenhagen, has been voted by the States of that kingdom by a majority of 92 to 20.

LABOUR. Jan. 28th. The Religious Schism (as it is called here), which has been going on throughout the country ever since the rupture of its relations with the court of Rome, has spread and increased so greatly as to excite much uneasiness in the Government. The main-confederates deny the authority of the bishops appointed since that rupture took place, and refuse to have any communication in spiritual matters with the priests appointed by them. The district of Vienne appears to be the centre from which this schism has radiated. —Ibid.

EDUCATION.

PRACTICAL SCIENTIFIC EDUCATION.—We are well pleased to hear that the Council of King's College, in addition to its well-organized system of instruction to which we lately alluded (ante, p. 700), have recently added a teacher of Mineralogy; and, yet further to determine the practical direction of their course, have, at a recent meeting, assigned five for the foundation of one, if not two additional professorships, of an exclusively practical nature, having for their object the development of the economy of the mechanical arts, and the composition of machinery. An arrangement has also been made, as we are informed, by which students who have attained a certain stage of their progress, will be secured admission to various manufactories and public works carried on in the neighbourhood of the university. The inspection is to be made under the personal direction of competent teachers, and to be connected with a course of reading in arts and manufactures, and with subsequent lectures and examinations. Much aid and judgement are apparent in these first efforts in an untraded path, and it is gratifying to us to find that public opinion has responded to them. —Athenaeum.

AN AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE for the education of persons destined for agricultural pursuits is about to be established in the vicinity of Abingdon, under the title of the Kent School of Agriculture. —Pict.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE.—RETIREMENT OF PROFESSOR VAUGHAN.—Dr. Vaughan has resigned his office as Professor of History in University College. In the final arrangements of the College, in connection with the London University, it is left to the decision of the Council, whether the office of Professor of History, together with the option of the students as to what classes they will attend; and Dr. Vaughan's room for residing in, that in those circumstances, he can see little prospect of being able to secure that degree of attention to history, as a study of the class-room, that would justify him in giving so much time to the duties of his professorship as he has found to be necessary to a proper discharge of them. We understand that Dr. Vaughan intends to publish his extended course of lectures on general history, which directions to the historical student, as to the method of studying history, and the best sources of information concerning the history of the principal nations in the ancient and modern world.—Ibid.

LITERATURE.

CONTINENTAL LITERATURE.—In the present dearth of home publications, we cast an eye over the bulky half-yearly catalogue of new German works, and it appeared to us as forming in every department of literature, that to select the most fruitful were somewhat difficult. We think, nevertheless, that history, poetry, and novels, may be named as the three favourites. In the first, national history is the prevalent passion; and every, even the smallest state, as well as many a separate town, has not only its historian, but several rival historians, who, with indefatigable industry, investigate records, collect and arrange every obscure fact tending to illustrate the state of Germany during the early and middle ages, and down to the present time. Of these provincial historians, the Hessian, Römmler, enjoys by far the highest reputation. But antiquarian historical research is by no means confined to Germany; and Dr. Ashmole, who has devoted his services to Spain, after publishing a history of the Visigoths in that peninsula, proceeded to narrate and depict the condition of that country during its period of brilliant prosperity under the thumgaleo Celts, and is now writing of its sufferings and decline under the rule of the ruler African Almoravides and Almohades. Poets swarm in Germany. Many, whose very names are here unknown, as Götlin Lenau, Kerner, Maass, Freiligrath, Schöck, Müler, &c., &c., are, at home, highly esteemed, whether in lyric, narrative, or dramatic poetry; while young aspirants publish anonymously, as Wendheim, which may be Englished—indeed, embryo, or growing poets. But novels are at this moment the harvest, par excellence—the fruits of authors and auditors far too numerous to think of mentioning any names. Nor are the reading public or the enterprising booksellers content with this home produce. Each year, even such as fall mill-born from the press, insect in a German parl in every circulating library; as do all the French novels of the day, the most innocent and immortal not excepted,—some of these last being occasionally translated by ladies! Even modern Greece is made to pay tribute; and a rumour, on the earthquake of Capri 1843, having thus appeared, it has been translated and published in Berlin. The history of the foundation of the Kingdom of Haasar, has given birth to a new story, in which Lord Stange is represented as the mercenary instrument of the poor youth's crimes.—Athenaeum.

The Minister of Public Instruction in France has ordered that in all the colleges of the kingdom, at least one foreign language shall be comprehended in the course of instruction, and that in all the royal colleges of England and Germany shall be taught. In the chief towns in the south of France, near the frontiers of Italy and Spain, the language of one or other of these countries may be respectively substituted for either of those prescribed above.—Ibid.

SCIENTIFIC.

ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY. Nov. 27. Col. Sykes in the chair.—A series of Mammalia collected in India by Mr. MacClelland, were on the table for exhibition, and Dr. Horsfield stated that he was engaged in examining a list of the species in the classes Mammalia and Aves, supposed by that gentleman to be new to science, and that such of them as proved to be hitherto undescribed would be submitted to the Committee of Publication for insertion in the Society's proceedings.—Mr. MacClelland's notes and descriptions of the following new species were read to the meeting: Mosopus striatulus, Amphelis cinerea, and four species of the genus Sciurus, for which the specific names Gymnurus, Lobrius, Asiaticus, and MacClellandii, were severally proposed.—The reading of a paper by Col. Sykes, on the Fishes of the Decan, and the exhibition of illustrations, occupied the remainder of the evening. Of forty-six fresh-water fishes, procured by Col. Sykes on the Plateau of the Decan, at a height varying from 1500 to 2000 feet above the level of the sea, it appears that forty-two belong to undescribed species, all of which were named and characterized by the author. He also establishes one new sub-genus of the carp family, under the name Rhodes, comprehending five species, two of which he describes in Moore, Vigors and Ogilby.—Athenaeum.

FISHES OF THE OCEAN.—Mr. Valenciennes, having enriched his collection of fishes in M. Valenciennes, that able naturalist has found, that the ichthyology of the great Canaries, and the isolated islands of the Atlantic, Ascension, and St. Helena, although they are nearest to the coast of Africa, closely resemble that of South America. This agreement might be due to the currents, as far as the Canaries are concerned, but this reason cannot apply to Ascension and St. Helena, which are situated in the present current, which enters the Atlantic from the channel of Mozambique. M. Valenciennes announces the discovery of a new eel from Teneriffe, where it is the only fresh-water fish.—Ibid.

ROYAL INSTITUTION.—The first evening meeting for the season was held on Friday evening, when Dr. Faraday delivered a lecture on the electric powers of the gymnasts and the torpedo. The first part was devoted to an illustration of the phenomena of electricity, and those which more particularly related to its action and influence on organic bodies. Various experiments on the torpedo had illustrated the analogy of its action with that of the electrical machine, more particularly in the production of the spark and the formation of a magnet. The most minute anatomical investigation had shown that both in the electric ray and eel the parts containing the apparatus that produced a shock was an appendage not essential to its vitality, and that, but only might it be removed with impunity, but that, in fact, the animal distinct greater vivacity when this source of nervous action was removed. The anatomy of the gymnasts was still more wonderful than that of the torpedo, its powers of vitality and motion being confined to a small portion in the upper part of the body, the rest containing the electrical apparatus. The investigation that had already been made led out a hope that their further prosecution would tend to a greater elucidation of the nervous power, and as the portions in question might be removed without inflicting pain or injury upon the animal, it would be desirable to see how far electricity would restore these powers. The meeting was very numerously attended.—Pat.

MOLAR PNEUMONA.—There is now on the eastern limb of the sun a spot, nearly large enough to be seen without a glass. With a power of 150 to 200, it appears nearly oval, of a dark black, and separated by two bright lines from the northern side—on the north extending to the centre of the sun, and forming a bright spot of considerable size, equal in brightness to the rest of the sun. By the angle this spot subtends it cannot be much inferior in size to the whole earth. There are likewise more than 20 other small spots on various parts of its disc, all of which seem to be confined in width to 30 degrees of the sun's equator. As the spot will approach near the sun's centre, it should be carefully watched until its disappearance. It is compared with its previous place—if it still continues in its exact situation—or whether its motion coincides with the sun's rotation on its axis. By a careful observation from day to day, it may be the means of bringing, in some degree, to light the physical construction of that luminary, which is at present conjectured.—Pat., Jan. 21.

NAVIGABLE ENTRANCE OF THE MURRAY.—We learn that the entrance to Lake Alexandrina and the River Murray from the sea has recently been thoroughly explored by Captain Gill, late of the Fanny, and found to be a perfectly safe and practicable entrance, having upwards of three fathoms on the bar at the shallowest part, and about seven fathoms outside, and an equal depth inside the channel. Captain Gill passed out and in several seasons without difficulty in small craft or slugs, there being a high water no breakers whatever in the air way, and scarcely a tide ripple. He considers it an easy and perfectly safe entrance for vessels of moderate tonnage, and there is room and depth of water inside for the British navy. For steam-boat navigation the passage, under any circumstances, is practicable; and this fact alone is of importance, as ensuring the direct communication from the sea with the interior. Scarcely less important is the confirmation of the report made to the Government some time ago, that an arm of the lake, or a series of lagoons, believed to be navigable, extends westward, as far as Baudin's Reefs, nearly to the boundaries of the province, thus rendering the greater portion of that fertile district—the Australia Felix of Major Mitchell—accessible to our enterprising settlers. It is impossible at present to calculate the effect which these discoveries are likely to produce. In our next we hope to present a more minute detail of facts, and to offer some observations on the position in which these discoveries so unexpectedly place the colonists.—South Australian Gazette.

SOURCE OF THE OXUS.—The following notice of the discovery of the source of the Oxus, by Lieut. Wood, one of the officers serving under Captain Alexander Burnes, F. R. S., in his political and scientific mission in Central Asia, is contained in a letter from Captain Burnes.—"This discovery is by the Oxus rises in the elevated region of Pamir in Sikand. It issues from a sheet of water, encircled on all sides, except the west, by hills, through which the infant river runs; commencing its course at the great elevation of about 15,000 feet above the level of the sea, or within a few feet of the height of Mount Blanc. To this sheet of water, Lieut. Wood proposes to assign the name of Lacus Victoria, in honour of Her Majesty the Queen Victoria."

COAL IN THE EAST.—A letter from Odessa states, that M. Koutchyn, who had been commissioned by the Governor-General of Little Russia to search for coal formations in the Steppes of the Ukraine, had discovered an abundant mine near the village of Stilla, in the district of Soultie Gally, and at the distance of 180 versts (about 92 English miles) from Alexandrovsk, of the Dnieper. The coal produced by this mine is judged to be good for steam-boilers, and may be transported with facility to the ports of the sea of Asoph by the Don, and to Odessa, and the town of Kherson, by the Dnieper.—Pat.

NOVEL MODE OF NAVIGATION.—The French Government steamer Vence has been fitted out on a new principle for working the vessel with either sails or steam, and is now on her voyage from Rochester to Mexico, for the purpose of testing this important invention. When fallen with of late by a Spanish ship, north lat. 31, long. W. of Paris 14, the captain reported that her rate of sailing under topsails, mizzen-sails, and royals, had been for two days and a half upwards of eleven knots an hour.—Ibid.

PROGRESS OF THE ARTS.—Invention no longer creeps at a tortoise pace; every useful discovery is now instantaneously made known throughout the globe. The progress of late years has been nearly at the same moment by many different nations. Asphalte is at present the rage in Germany, as with us; footways formed of it have already added to the comforts of Mannheim, Frankfurt, Stuttgart, Secera railways, also, in progress, contribute to heighten the fever of German speculation. The Northern Imperial Ferdinand Railway, from Vienna to Prague, advances rapidly, having 20,000 labourers employed on it, and it is expected that the eighty miles to Braun will be completed this year. About twelve miles have been already opened for the amusement of the citizens of Vienna. The Austrian laws relative to railways allow the projectors the profits of the undertaking (which must not exceed fifteen per cent. on the capital) for fifty years, after which period it reverts to the government. The carriage of the mails is also contemplated, and in every purchase, sale, or other contract made by the projectors, Commissioners on the part of the Government is a necessary party. About twelve miles of the Leipzig and Dresden Railway are already opened from the former city. Also the railway from Mannheim to Hale is in progress, and excites glowing anticipations.—Athenaeum.

THE BRITISH AND AMERICAN STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY has this week contracted with Mr. J. M. Laird, of Liverpool, (the builder of the Iron mail vessel Rainbow, belonging to the British Steam Navigation Company,) for an iron steam ship of 1,200 tons, to be called the Atlanta, and intended to run between this country and the United States. In conjunction with the British Queen and the President. From the experience Mr. Laird has had in this description of naval architecture, and the speed he has already attained in the vessels he has built, those well able to form an opinion on the subject, confidently predict that this vessel will reduce to ten days the average passage between Liverpool and New York.—Ibid.

MISCELLANEOUS.

AMERICAN ABOLITIONISTS.—The December number of the Windsor Review, just published, is not only a good one, but remarkable for the light which its leading article, by H. M. (Harriet Martineau), has thrown upon the present state and temper of the American mind. The public attention in England has, from time to time, been attracted by details of the valuable efforts of the abolitionists in the United States to set about the emancipation of the negroes, and of the disorderly and persecuting re-action which those efforts have excited in the slaveholders. But few of us were aware of the nature and extent of the movement, or of the deep and enduring spirit in which it was conceived, and is now carrying out, amidst a series of persecutions that might have well become the darkness of the Middle Ages. To conceive a better notion of the full meaning of this new, and, as we think, most pregnant moral phenomenon, Miss Martineau judiciously alludes to the difference which subsists between the position of the European abolitionists, denouncing a partial and a distant wrong, isolated from those whose pecuniary interests they attack, and supported by public opinion and the sympathies and respect of their neighbours and fellow citizens, and that of the American advocates of emancipation, surrounded on all sides by the abuses they combat, striking at a national crime in the presence of the criminals, and momentarily exposed to the contempt, the hatred, and the violence of the masses of their fellow citizens. We in England, amidst all our respect for the Clarksones and the Wilberforces, who commenced the crusade against slavery, have been accustomed to indulge in an occasional smile of self-satisfaction (not to say vanity) which sustained them under their trials; but their feelings were tranquillity itself, to the deep, and we must say, awful exhibitions of infamous will, of courage to act, and of firmness to endure, which fully justify the epithet applied to the passing moment by Miss Martineau, of "the Martyr Age in America." Amidst the numerous armies of martyrs to metaphysical dogmas for which almost every sect of religion has had to boast and to blush, the present are the first who have shed their blood and their tears in testimony to a great moral truth; and this alone should be sufficient to fix the eyes of all beholders upon the passing spectacle. If, however, the object sought be all human,—if earthly, and not heavenly interests, are alone compromised in the struggle, it is undeniable that the force of the martyrs is almost wholly derived from the righteousness of their religious feelings. In contrast, therefore, this prevailing influence of American society with the temporizing, self-seeking, compromising spirit which has of late years sprung up and developed itself among Englishmen, manifesting itself not only in our political discussions, but in our political dimensions, and on every occasion where the coarser pecuniary interests are opposed to strict improvements said to sound morality, we find matter of still more worthy and pressing consideration. Among what classes of American society are such feelings generated? how produced? what is their action, for good or for evil? what their natural consequences? what their revolutionary influence? These are grave and serious matters; for it is scarcely possible that the struggle can be long continued without being felt in England. One other striking feature in the contest, is that of the collateral questions it has already called into discussion, especially that concerning the rights of a free press, and a free expression of opinion. On this point, we think Miss Martineau utters an important truth, when she says, that other sorts of freedom besides commercial freedom from slavery will come in with it; that the aristocratic spirit, in all its manifestations, is purging out; and that the turbulence and tyranny which have excited such a resistance are the immediate and visible offspring of the old-world, feudal, European spirit, that still survives amidst their free institutions, and in spite of them. The rapid spread of the abolition flame amidst circumstances so hostile, proves that it is in harmony with the frame of American sentiment; and that it is an exponent of something pervading and influential—of something prophetic of a social revolution, still more striking and still more grasping than that which produced their political regeneration. Notwithstanding the unusual extent to which we have drawn out this notice of a single paper, we must yet find room for the following lines, written by W. L. Garrison, and inserted in his month of abolitionism, (originally a poor, ill-educated printer's boy), and left behind him on the walls of the prison, to which he had been assigned for his writings on the field-labourer theme:—

I boast no courage as the battle field,
Where blood and tears mix in a horrid fray;
For love, or fame, I can no weapon wield,
With burning still an enemy to slay.
But test my spirit in the blazing stake,
For advocacy of the rights of man,
And truth,—or on the wheel my body break;
Let Persecution place me 'neath its ban.
Insult, defiance, proscribe my humble name,
Yes, put the dagger to my naked breast,
If I reced in terror of the flame.
Or recent prove when terror rears his crest.—
To save a limb, or shun the public scourge,
Then write me down for aye,—exile of woman's love.

—Ibid.

"HAVEN'T WE A WOMAN FOR A KING?"—At the Court-leet of the Manor of Frothing, the niece of the late baronet and errier proposed to become a candidate for the office. The steward of the manor objected to her because she was a woman; to which she replied, "God bless you, Sir, that's no reason; haven't we a woman for a king?" (The ladies present and the steward of this reply induced the steward to admit her as a candidate; and on a show of hands she was unanimously elected.—Worcester Journal.

EXTRAORDINARY PRESERVATION.—The following is an extract from a letter received by the Ctr on Friday morning:—"The key, Bay of Dublin, Jan. 18, 1839.—You must believe the following almost incredible circumstance. As Her Majesty's mail steam-ship, St. George, was on her passage from Liverpool to Dublin, on Saturday evening, she discovered a child floating about upon a plank on this side of the rock. The captain of the steamer, with the greatest promptitude and humanity, steered towards him and picked him up; and next day he was in Kingstown in good health. He is a boy of about six years of age; English accent, says both his parents were lost in one of the Liverpool and New York packet ships, wrecked in the late awful hurricane, and thinks he was at least five hours floating on the water. He has, in the mean time, been carefully taken charge of."—Pat.

JOHN ANKERSTROM, the assassin of Gustavus the Third, was exposed to public gaze after his execution, as a curiosity in Sweden. The authorities were obliged, after a few days, to discontinue this ceremony, as each morning the head of the doomed conspirator was found covered with a wreath of laurel, and in his hand a rose, containing in the Swedish tongue the following words:—"Blessed be the hand which saved his country."—Ibid.

THE KING OF THE BELGIANS has purchased large estates in Styria and Bohemia. The purchase was made through an agent, who made it appear that he wished to buy the estates for himself. The castle of Ehrenhausen, near Graz, is now fitted up with princely magnificence, and the fine collection of paintings belonging to the King in London and Brussels is to be removed to that castle. The sellers must be now greatly mortified at having sold their estates at so low a price.—Frankfort Journal.

THE FRENCH ARMY, according to official returns just received, appears to have an effective force on the peace establishment, of 311,412 men, and 63,142 horses; and on the war establishment, of 320,285 men, and 121,892 horses.—Pat.

THE LATE MURDER IN GLASGOW.—THOMAS McKinnis has made the fullest confession of his guilt, but does not view it in a criminal light. He states in substance, with the incoherence of a lunatic, that for the last six years he had been in a dreadful state of distress; that things were coming to a crisis, and having had the greatest love for his sister, who was a most virtuous girl, and for whom he would have travelled the whole earth, he had, after mature reflection, come to the determination of renouncing her from want and misery. Every means he had tried to preserve her without effect; and on the Saturday night previous to the commission of the deed, he had resolved to save her by putting her out of the world. With this intention, he rose about one o'clock on Sunday morning, after his sister was in bed asleep, and having put on his trousers, he struck a light to see the position in which she lay, that he might the more effectually put her out of the dreadful pain in which she was. After this he extinguished the light, because he would not for the whole world have let his sister see who it was that touched her. He said he did not know the best place to strike, as he had never witnessed a murder committed before, although he had seen a man of the name of Hare armed with daggers. He then got his knife, and just gave her the slightest slash, because he thought if however it touched her she would have expired at once. He would not for thousands have done it, had he thought otherwise, as it was all for her good; but she got up, jumped out of bed, and grasped him by the neck, which irritated him, and he then saw that the business would have to be completed. In the struggle his hand was cut by the knife; but after repeated stabs, his sister fell, and her head striking on a tub, he saw all was over. He then took her out, and laid her out of the body with a sheet. He then took off the shirt he had on, which was bloody about the neck, where his sister had grasped him, and put on a clean one. He afterwards went to a friend's house in Salt-market, where he told what he had done, and where he was apprehended. When asked by the Superintendent of Police, after the examination, whether he would wish to be confined in Gaol or Bridewell, he seemed quite startled, and declared that such gross tyranny had never been witnessed in time. He had done a great deal, in which he was justified, by saving the poor woman whom he loved; and would he be sent to Bridewell for doing so? The body of the unfortunate young woman has been interred, and her murderer committed to prison. If anything had been wanting to convince us of this man's insanity it has been furnished, as we above noticed, by a mass of his writings, which have been found in his house.—Glasgow Herald.

ROAD TO THE RED SEA.—We learn, by letters from Alexandria, that 800 Europeans crossed the Isthmus of Suez last year, on their passage to and from India; and that a regular coach conveyance will be soon established between the shores of the Levant and the nearest points for embarkation on the borders of the Red Sea.—Post.

A HAZARDOUS EVENING.—During the storm on Monday last, a boy named Stevenson was sent by his mother with his father's dinner. On his journey he had to pass the banks of the canal, when a sudden puff of wind blew him into the water. A lad who saw the accident ran to find Stevenson and told him of his son's misfortune, upon which the wretch replied, "I can't help; I won't lose my work now." The father went home, and he and his wife retired to bed, without even an inquiry after the child. On the following day the body was found; and at the inquest the jury expressed their disgust and indignation at the heartlessness of the parents.—Sheffield Iris.

THORWALDEN.—The papers make mention of an act of munificence on the part of Thorwalden, worthy of a master of his sublime art. He has devoted the sum of eighty thousand riksbankalers, received by him from the Danish Government, for the marble statues of Christ and the Apostles, conceived for the Cathedral at Copenhagen, to the foundation of a Museum (Gallery of Art?) which is to bear his name, and for which a committee had already collected thirty-five thousand riksbankalers. The building is to be commenced in the course of the spring. We also hear from the Continent that the colossal statue of Schiller, moulded by Thorwalden, has been successfully set at Munich. A great block of granite, brought from the Italian Fieschi, to form its pedestal, and it is expected that the monument will be completed early in the ensuing year. The city of Mayence has in the meantime voted the great sculptor the honour of citizenship in return for his model of the statue of Gutenberg.—Athenaeum.

GERMAN MUNIFICENCE.—A wealthy German nobleman, Count Stanislaus Habsburg-Skarske, has, it appears, recently set the possessors of property a striking example of charitable munificence. He has expended over his whole estate, consisting of three towns, thirty villages, the theatre and other buildings in Leoben, together with his personal property and whatever he may hereafter acquire, for the purpose of founding a hospital for the support of poor persons and of orphans. The building about to be erected, in order to carry into effect the intention of the generous donor, is calculated to contain 400 paupers and 600 orphan children.—Ibid.

VISIT OF CHALDEE CHRISTIANS TO ENGLAND.—On the 12th of August last, there arrived in Berlin, upon a wretched Russian wagon, three strangers, who, with their long beards, and the whole character of their attire, might have been taken for Russians of the lowest class. Upon inquiry they proved to be Chaldee Christians who had taken this route, having journeyed overland to St. Petersburg, to go to England, their avowed purpose being to lay before the Bible Society of London the distressed state of the Christian communities in the Persian provinces of Assyrian and in the vicinity of Lake Urmiah. Their names are David Gabriel, fifty years old; Jusuf Johannes, aged thirty; and Gabriel Shahriz, aged twenty-six; the latter called himself nephew of the Bishop of Tabriz. They were scantily supplied with the necessaries for so long a journey, and soon attracted the notice of the benevolent inhabitants of Berlin, who presented them free board and lodging during their stay there, went down to a corresponding London, and engaged for them a passage to England. The writer of this account, aided by Prof. Petermann, the orientalist, and Carl Riner, the geographer, and an interpreter of the name of Oenli, who spoke Turkish, took great pains to get from these travellers ample details of the state of their country, respecting their own personal situation and property, the civil institutions under which they lived, and more especially the state and doctrine of the Christian churches in that part of the East. All who saw and conversed with them were much pleased with their general demeanour, the candour and freedom with which they replied to the numerous questions which were put to them, and the moral habits they seemed to have brought with them from a country enjoying, among many political privations, the advantage of a more approaching degree of civil simplicity. They had been acquainted with Colonel Montefelt, a corresponding member of their country in 1849, and Colonel Skid in 1847; they were fully competent to give information respecting the relative geographical position of the various towns, villages, &c., in their own country; the eldest had been at, and could give a fair account of Shiraz and Abu Shehr, the youngest had been in Arabia; they distinctly declared themselves to be Protestants, living in the diocese of the Bishop of Selima, but under the superintendence of the Patriarch Mar Simon, at Kueshan, near Julam-rik. Some circumstances occurred to create in the minds of a few who saw them, a suspicion that the tale these Chaldees told was not in all points the true one; but the apparent contradictions, the writer thinks, were of a very trifling nature, and the result, on the whole, much to their favour.—In the above narrative may be added that these three poor Chaldees arrived in London on the 1st of September; they showed their letters and documents to the British and Foreign Bible Society, who, after a full and mature consideration of all the circumstances of the case, were of opinion that the men were not authorized to come to London to make demands they professed to be the bearers of; at the same time, owing to the benevolence of some few individuals, they were not allowed to leave the country, but were taken on board a vessel to return to Constantinople, on their way to their homes; that at first the Chaldees thankfully accepted, but they afterwards changed their minds, without clearly explaining for what reason; consequently, the passage money was forfeited, and the three Chaldees left London, after a stay of nearly two months, to beg their way home; it is believed now Paris and Marseille.—Ibid.

LAWRENCE'S LEGACY.—The Athenaeum states, that of the 100,000*l.* left by the late Mr. Angelo Taylor to endow a college of languages at Oxford, 80,000*l.* has already passed into the hands of the lawyers, and that "the crows have not yet done with the carcass."

A SIXFOUR CROWN annually at Brough, in Westmoreland. On the eve of the Epiphany, the annual procession of the Holling (as vulgarly called, but properly the holy tree), takes place, in commemoration of the star by which the wise men of the East, or Gentile country, were led to the place where Jesus Christ was born in B'lehem. This illuminated tree (an ash), with natural well-formed branches, or extra ones introduced, to form as regular symmetry as possible, with 25 or 30 branches, has at the point of each branch a flambeau, composed of well-greased rushes, tarry rope lines, and other combustible matter. The ball of the tree is so contrived, that a man may, by a primitive engine, carry it perpendicularly, brilliantly lighted, several times up and down the street, preceded by a band of music, and crowds of people of all descriptions cheering along. The practice has been kept up alternately, between the maypole of man, at the White Swan and the Black Bull Inn; nothing of the kind being known in any other part of the kingdom.—Post.

PAUPER'S BLOOD.—When Emperor Francis I. happened to be ambassador in Venice at the Court of Vienna, he once on one day with the Emperor, a difference of opinion arose, which led to some sharper expressions than etiquette permitted, when the Austrian monarch, who had already fully contradicted Contrini, exclaimed with sudden warmth, "If your Excellency doubts my word, you ought at least to respect my superior rank, and be silent." The impoverished blood of fifteen centuries rushing into the cheeks of the laughing Venetian, "Basta," he exclaimed, "spoke to a Contrini of rank! Let me tell your Majesty, that my family gave five sovereigns to their country before your ancestors ceased to be horse-boys." The congenial pride of the old republic was as prodigiously gratified by this rebuke, that Dominico became doge upon his return, with universal acclamation.—Ibid.

LORD WILLIAM BENTINCK'S ADMINISTRATION.—We have inserted a long letter from a Correspondent, Index, in which all the alleged delinquencies of Lord William Bentinck's Government are drawn out in the most aggravated form to public view. We apprehend no detriment to the credit of his administration, from the closest scrutiny of it; and the present discussion is, therefore, likely to do good. Our Correspondent assures us, that he "has not been influenced by passion, or induced by any ill will towards His Lordship." We give him full credit for the best of intentions; but a cursory perusal of his letter is sufficient to convince the reader, that his mind is not exactly in that unprejudiced state, which would qualify him to form a comprehensive and impartial judgement on the subject. He says, "that he has strictly confined himself to measures." Had he done so; had he condemned the man for the measures, and not the measures for the man, he would scarcely have dragged into an examination of Indian politics, Lord William's wretched attempts to drain the fens of Lincolnshire. If there had been no latent leaning in his mind against Lord William Bentinck, he would not have begrudged the statue which public gratitude is now erecting, to one whom he himself acknowledges to have blessed India with the four great measures of the abolition of Suttee; the suppression of Thuggee; the construction of roads; and the introduction and advocacy of Steam communication.

It would be impossible for us, in our limited space, to follow Index over the whole field of censure in which he expatiates; neither, indeed, is it at all necessary to the defence of Lord William's measures. Many of the measures which have been condemned by one party, as vicious, will appear, in the view of others, as virtuous and praiseworthy. Some of his measures will find an ample excuse in the adverse circumstances in which he was placed; and a small residuum only must be referred to the imperfection which clings to human judgement the most mature. Who has forgotten that the great Chatham, with his dying lips, deprecated the independence of America? Who does not remember that Cauning maintained to his latest hour, the propriety of the Test and Corporation Acts? If, therefore, some of the numerous measures which were crowded into a brief reign of seven years, have not passed advantageously the test of experience, let us not forget that the mature judgement of the greatest men on public affairs, has been found equally defective.

And what, after all, are the objections brought against his administration? "A fixed determination to retrench." But why did not Index, in justice to his own reputation, enquire whether there was any necessity for retrenchment? Before retrenchment is ranked among political vices, he ought, at least, to enquire how long the integrity and honour of the British empire in the East could have existed without it. This is a short and simple question, which requires no profound study of political economy. A slight acquaintance with Co-ker is all that is necessary to answer it. We know well that it is inseparable from the weakness of human nature, to laud the political spendthrift, who has lavished the public funds on individuals, by a long anticipation of the resources of posterity; and to reserve every censure for him on whom it devolves, to correct the evil consequences of that extravagance, by rigid economy. But a writer like Index, who claims impartiality, should not have forgotten, that the odium of retrenchment justly belongs to him who caused it, not to him who steps forward to rescue the State from ruin, by putting it in practice. Is it the son who retrenches his expenditure to preserve the patrimonial estate from the hammer; or the father who has loaded it with encumbrances, who ought to be the object of our censure? Had Lord William not restored the equilibrium of our finances, could we have taken the field on the present emergency, with a full treasury?

Another charge against him, is "an eager desire and will for innovation;" and, says the writer, "I am willing to believe, a wish for improvement." Will our Correspondent take it upon his conscience to assert, that there was a single alteration in the frame work of Government, which was adopted by Lord William from a wanton itch for innovation; that a single change was made by him, except on a conviction that it would be beneficial? Our Government, from the day it was established, has been one of constant mutation, though not always of improvement. Our institutions have been almost as fugitive as the functionaries by whom they have been worked. In the time of Lord William many of them were found to be so encrusted with the rust of time, as to require both alteration and reform. We will not tire the reader by recapitulating the defects which had crept into the administration; but we ask, with confidence, whether any thing could have presented a stronger necessity for reform, than the arrangement by which the lazy leisure of an Opium Agent was rewarded with a salary more than double that of the Foreign Secretary in the Royal Cabinet of England? What man of sense could have resisted the temptation of ridding the country of the idle, heavy, lumbering, six-horse coach of the Provincial Courts? The appointment of Revenue Commissioners is charged as an error on Lord William by our Correspondent; yet there are many in the service who approve of the office. It would be difficult to shew that the system which preceded it was more efficient; there is, certainly, a preponderance of good over evil in the appointment; and we, in India, should be cautious how we speak disrespectfully of an institution of which so much can be said. As to the union of Magistrate and Collector, we have long since abandoned it to the tender mercies of Lord William's enemies. His Lordship, like Homer, must have been nodding when he celebrated their unnatural nuptials, notwithstanding the service had forbidden the banus. But we ask boldly, whether the object and tendency of all Lord William's measures, was not to bring all cases of a criminal nature to the earliest issue, and to expedite the decision of all civil suits? We ask, too, whether a greater sense of the necessity for work was not infused into the minds of the whole Civil Service, by the tenor of His Lordship's proceedings; and whether he did not leave it infinitely more efficient than he found it?

The "abolition of Corporal Punishment" is another grievance. However much this innovation may have been abused, we think it will be eventually found, that in this case Lord William has only moved on a little ahead of his eyes.

and anticipated the judgement of posterity. In another quarter of a century, the civilized world will have dispensed with beating men like harts, just as it has already got rid of selling them like cattle. Nothing is easier than to tie a man up and lash him, except, perhaps, it is to convince one's self that by this summary proceeding all the ends of justice have been satisfied. But the man upon whose back the indelible marks of shame have once been inflicted, becomes, like the first man on whom a mark was set, an outcast and a vagabond. The door of hope is shut upon him. His return to an honest life is made to depend, so to speak, on a miracle. Perhaps the Natives have not exactly reached that state of civilization at which the lash may be laid aside, without, in some measure, encouraging vice. Perhaps also, the British Government is not sufficiently vigorous and efficient to be able to substitute another punishment equally terrible. The safe abolition of the whip is a test of progress, rather in the Government, than in the people. The knout in Russia, and the Penitentiaries in America, teach us that to be able to abolish Corporal Punishment, presupposes a high state of civilization in any Government. After all, the worst that can be said on this subject, is, that Lord William was premature in his attempts to unbrutalize our Government.

But the merit-fostering minute! With all its faults, we would venture to say, that if it had proved a hundred-fold more mischievous than it has proved, it would still be an infinite improvement upon the old system. Any service, in which the most important posts are filled up by seniority, must inevitably be weak and inefficient. It is sure to give us for the most responsible situations, either men of superannuated intellects, or men whose erudition will not allow them to quit the country. The empire requires all the talent of all the services; and even more would not be redundant; and we can never return to the old days of official seniority, and official senility, till we have resolved that the empire is not worth preserving.

Then we have, for the hundred and first time, the old hackneyed, threadbare subject of "Half Batta." But why should it be forgotten, that we have Lord William's own letter, stating that it was repugnant to his judgement; and that if the smallest discretion had been left with him, he would have used it with the widest latitude, and have suppressed the order? Then, say his enemies, why did he not resign? But if a Governor General is to throw up his office every time he is required to execute an order, of which he doubts the expediency, where will the mutations of office cease? The Half Batta Order is certainly one of those ordinances which cast a doubt over the wisdom which has entrusted the destinies of this empire to the Directors. But Lord William did all that a man of honour could do. Finding the Court dugged and peremptory, he recorded his dissent, and carried the order into execution. He did more; knowing well that if his sentiments had been known, he would have been exonerated from all censure; he withheld that knowledge from the public, and sustained a storm of abuse, compared with which, the vituperation of the Austrian Carolus of Sicily was a flea bite, rather than weaken the administration, by allowing it to be suspected that any difference of opinion existed between him and the Leadenhall Street Cabinet.

"The undoubted tendency of his measures, was to lower the European character." The great object of his measures was to raise the Native character; and if there be any one who considers this synonymous with the depression of the European character; who considers that any diminution of the immeasurable distance between the two races is a degradation of the European character, let him abuse Lord William. In our opinion, it is not any measure of Government that can impair the natural superiority of the European over the Asiatic. It is only the European himself who can effectually lower his own character. It is when he invests himself with arrogant airs; when he treats the Natives with supercilious contempt; when the public authority with which he is vested, is to be traced, not only by acts of despotism, but of tyranny; when every word, every gesture, every look, betokens the "Lord of human kind," that the European character sinks in the eyes of the Native. It was the whole scope and aim of His Lordship's administration to prevent this degradation.

Another charge against Lord William Bentinck's administration, is an indisposition to receive information, and great obstinacy of opinion. Any one who knows the industry with which His Lordship endeavoured to acquire the most accurate intelligence relative to the state of India, and the untrodden paths in which he sought it, will easily acquit him of the former part of the charge. That he was not always guided by the judgement of others; that he finally adhered, in many instances, to the decisions of his own mind, must be allowed. How far this was a vice, will admit of much discussion. Those who disapproved of his measures, of course called it obstinacy; while those who coincided with him, admired him for his resolution. The line which separates obstinacy from firmness, is generally drawn by our individual feelings; and is, therefore, subject to constant fluctuation. Perhaps, then, the best mode of deciding the question, is to resolve that the measures which have our approbation, were the result of resolution; and those of which we cannot perceive the wisdom, were the effect of obstinacy.

On the whole, we think posterity will adopt a different judgement of the administration of Lord William, from that which the prejudices or partialities of the present age have formed. We have seen the contemporary judgement regarding Clive, Hastings and Wellesley reversed by the decision of a succeeding age; and a like process awaits the character of our late Governor General. We are too near the period of an administration, which wounded many feelings, and over-ruled many interests, to be able to form a calm and comprehensive view of it. Yet we cannot but perceive, that while he is censured by the Europeans "of the pale" in India, his name is revered by the Natives; and we may naturally infer, that there must have been some healing principle in its administration, to recommend it to the favour of the conquered.

CHINA.—The intelligence received from China, on Monday last, is more important, and, unhappily, more distressing than our most fearful forebodings would have allowed us to anticipate. The Imperial Commissioner Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary, especially charged by the Emperor with the task of extinguishing the Opium trade, issued a proclamation on the 18th March, ordering the foreigners to shew their good faith, by delivering up all the Opium then in the river, and to prevent the future importation of the drug. On Tuesday, the 19th, the Hong merchants requested the attendance of the merchants at the Consulate, and informed them that, unless the edict of the Commissioner was complied with the next day, two of the Hong merchants would lose their heads. Wednesday passed over, however, with only flying rumours. On Thursday, the 21st, a general meeting of the Chamber of Commerce was held, when it was resolved to send in a letter to the Hong merchants, stating that a matter of such importance required deliberation; and that they hoped to give a definitive reply by Wednesday, the 27th. The Hong merchants delivered in the letter to the Commissioner; who, however, declared that, unless a certain quantity was delivered in the next day, he would on Friday morning sit in judgment on the Hong merchants. Another meeting of the Chamber was convened, at which the Hong merchants stated, that unless a quantity of Opium was delivered up, they felt assured that two of them would be beheaded in the morning. Mr. Dent, it appears, was ordered to go within the city by the Imperial Commissioner, but both he and the Chamber considered this step imprudent, unless under a safe conduct. On Saturday morning, the 23d, the two senior Hong merchants, without their battons of office, and with a loose iron chain on their necks, repaired to Mr. Dent's house, and told him, that unless he proceeded within the city, they should be beheaded before night. A meeting of the Chamber was called, at which it was resolved, that Mr. Dent should not go; but at the earnest request of the Hong merchants, his partner, and two or three other gentlemen, agreed to repair to the Commissioner, and to inform him of the reason of Mr. Dent's reluctance. They had interviews with the inferior officers, but the only reply they could obtain, was, that if Mr. Dent, who they said had six thousand chests of Opium, did not obey, he would be dragged out of his house, and put to death. Early on Sunday morning, the 24th March, a Proclamation was circulated by H. M. Superintendent, Capt. Elliott, stating that Her Britannic Majesty's servants were detained against their will; and that no further confidence could be reposed in the Provincial Government; and ordering all British ships to proceed to Hong Kong, and prepare to resist any aggression on the part of the Chinese Government. Between six and seven P.M., Capt. Elliott landed at the steps of the British consulate, and hoisted the British flag. A meeting was immediately convened of the British merchants, when a public notice was read, in which Capt. Elliott explained the reason of his having lost all confidence in the Provincial Government; desired all British subjects to make immediate preparation for the removal of their property, and declared his intention to demand a passport for the free passage of all Her Majesty's subjects; the refusal of which, would be regarded as proving a determination to detain them. That same evening, Sunday, at nine o'clock, the native servants were desired to withdraw from the factories; all people were prohibited to sell its inmates any food, and a guard of troops was placed at the British consulate, to prevent the escape of Mr. Dent; while the river was covered with boats, prepared for action. On the 24th, the Chinese Collector of Customs laid an embargo on all British trade in the port. On Wednesday, the 27th, the Canton paper stated, that the Superintendent was in communication with the Chinese Government; and that the three days he had fixed for the reception of passports, would expire that evening. This is the extent of the intelligence received direct from Canton by this opportunity.

The Good Success, arrived at Singapore on the 25th April, brought intelligence from Macao to the 10th of that month. On the 27th, that is, on Wednesday, Capt. Elliott issued a notice to the British subjects, stating that he, and all British and foreign merchants, being forcibly detained by the Chinese Government, without food, deprived of their servants, and cut off from all intercourse with their respective countries, had received orders to deliver up all the Opium held by the English in China. He, therefore, called upon all British subjects to surrender the Opium in their possession to him, to be delivered to the Chinese Government, and guaranteed indemnification to all the merchants. A subsequent notice, without date, states that His Excellency, the High Commissioner, had stipulated that the servants should be restored, after one-fourth of the Opium had been delivered up; the passage-boats would be permitted to run after one-half had been surrendered; and the trade opened after three-fourths had been delivered; and every thing to proceed, as usual, after the whole had been given up. Breach of faith is to be visited, after three days of loose performance of engagements, with the cutting off supplies of fresh water; after three days more, with the stoppage of food; and after three days more, with the last degree of severity on the Superintendent. Thus, by a train of unexpected circumstances, has the surrender of twenty thousand chests of Opium, valued at two millions sterling, been forced from the British merchants and British authorities in China;—and thus ends the Opium trade.

These events give rise to a crowd of reflections. Will the British Government recognize the indemnity guaranteed to the Opium merchants by the Superintendent, while he was not a free agent? Will the British Parliament come down with two millions sterling from the revenues of England? Will they force this payment on the Company; and are the Directors bound, by the terms of an engagement, in which they had no voice? Will Britain sit down tamely under the violation of national faith, in the arrest of its representative? Will it submit to the insults of a barbarian Government? Will the British Ministry bring the Chinese to reason, at the mouth of the cannon; and will the people of England forego the luxury of tea, during the process; and can the Exchequer bear up under the abeyance of the duties on this article for two years? These are grave questions, which, in the excitement of the moment, it is impossible to examine with due deliberation; but we shall return to the subject next week.

The Superintendent states, that all the foreigners are detained with him at Canton, and threatened with starvation. Among these are the American Consul and merchants. Will Commodore Read proceed forthwith to China with the Columbia, and demand instant reparation for the insult which has been offered to the "Star-spangled banner?"

THE PILGRIM TAX.—The Harkara of last week reiterates the intelligence, that orders had been issued to relinquish all demands from the Pilgrims, at the approaching festival at Jaggermath. This may, or may not, be the case. Our expectations on this subject have been so repeatedly balked, that we must suspend our belief, till we have bona fide evidence before us. The abolition of the tax on pilgrims at Allahabad, which we announced some months ago, would almost justify a hope, that the Court of Directors are going at length to redeem the pledge which they gave to the public six years ago;—time will show.

The connection of Government with Idol Temples at our Presidency, originated entirely in financial considerations. The State interferes with no shrine from which it does not gain revenue; except, perhaps, in the case of Hydenath, in Boorbhoun, of which the State revenue, though not the superintendent, was relinquished above forty years ago. It is, perhaps, on this ground, that the dissolution of the alliance between the Government and the Temples has begun with this place. At Madras, however, the case is different. The public patronage of idolatry did not, it seems, arise from any sordid considerations of gain, but from "moral and political principles." We allude to this article, a curious document which has just been dragged to light from the archives of the India House, by the Editor of Alexander's Magazine. It appears that the Court of Directors were very unwilling that it should be made known, and actually refused permission to Mr. Gordon, who had made a transcript of it, to expose it to public view. It is a document of no little importance. It is a Report made by Mr. Lionel Placc, the Collector of the Company's Jajgeer at Madras, to the Revenue Board, in 1793. It enables us at once to ascertain, at what period, and upon what grounds, the Madras Government began its unhallowed connection with the idolatrous shrines. Mr. Place says, "The management of the church funds,"—meaning thereby, the money appropriated to the worship of idols,— "has heretofore been thought independent of the control of Government, for the strange reason—that it receives no advantage from them." Now we beg the reader to bear in mind, that the advocates for the continued connection of Government with idolatry, have always appealed to certain pledges which Government was affirmed to have given to the Natives, on the first acquisition of the country; and they have loudly represented, that the withdrawal of all State patronage from the temples, would be a violation of national faith. We learn, however, from Mr. Place, the great founder of this connection at the Madras Presidency, that down to the year 1793, that is to say, for thirty years after the acquisition of territory at Madras, Government had not interfered in any measure with the temples; that the temples had accordingly fallen to decay; that the "sacred temple" at Conjevaram was threatened with total ruin, from the roots of a tree which had insinuated themselves into the walls. If any pledge whatever had been given, Mr. Place would not have omitted to bring it prominently forward. We infer, therefore, that at the Madras Presidency, no pledge whatever was given to the Natives, that the British Government would take the idolatrous shrines under its own especial patronage. That patronage commenced after thirty years of total neglect. It was extended, upon the representations of Mr. Place, who sighed over the desolation of idolatry for want of it. "The magnificence of the festivals," says he, "and processions of this celebrated pagoda (Conjevaram) is miserably fallen off for want of them,"—thatis, the good offices of Government,— "and the rich ornaments which decked the idol, but were lost during the war, have, on account of the poverty of the church, never been replaced." He urges on the British Government, that the Nabobs of the Carnatic had immortalized their names by gifts to these temples. And so the British Government set to work to earn this immortality; placed the temples under the patronage of the State; employed the public officers to force labourers to drag the car, without remuneration; and never paused in this career of immortality, till eighteen of these victims had been crushed to death under its wheels.

We must not, however, do the Madras Government of that early age the injustice to conceal, that it was not altogether indifferent to the shrines of idolatry. Amidst the systematic neglect of all the institutions of idolatry, there were still two places to which its attention was strongly attracted by that love of money, which the Apostle represents as the root of all evil. There were two shrines, Trivulore and Pednapollam, of peculiar sanctity, at which the pilgrims, and others, made gifts. These gifts the Government seized, and appropriated to its own use. Mr. Place, whose howls yearned over the decay of superstition, and who seems to have had no other idea of a church, than that it was synonymous with a Heathen Pagoda, begged that these revenues, which had been made a lay, might be restored to the "church funds," and disbursed for the benefit of the "church." And the pious Government readily fell in with his proposal. What would be the transport of Mr. Lionel Mace's feelings, could he now revisit the earth, and hear the pealing of the cannon of Fort St. George, on the birth-days of the gods! We now proceed to give his letter.

"The pagoda marah explains itself to be for the support of religious ceremonies and public worship. In Trivulore, it amounted to 48-6-4ths—in Carangooly, to 58-6-4ths—and in Conjevaram, to 48-6-4ths: the principal pagoda of Conjevaram receives a general marah throughout the jaghire, except in three pergunnahs and that of Trivulore in three of them; all the lesser pagodas enjoy maniamas where they are situated, and many, also, shorums.

"The management of the church funds has heretofore been thought independent of the control of Government, for this strange reason—that it receives no advantage from them; but, in as much as it has an essential interest in promoting the happiness of its subjects, and as the natives of this country have been superior to the good conduct and regularity of their religious ceremonies, which are liable to neglect, without the interposition of an efficient authority, such control and interference becomes indispensable. In a moral and political sense, whether to dispossess them of the practice of virtue, or to promote good order and subordination, by conciliating their affections, a regard to this matter is, I think, incumbent. So forcibly was the case of even a short attention which I was able to give to it, that at the late Conjevaram feast, which, from a want of it, had always been interrupted by feuds and competitors, the greatest harmony subsisted; opposite pretensions were accommodated or compromised; and no part of the festival, to which crowds from all parts of India assembled, suffered the smallest obstruction. Testifying so fully, as the circumstance does, the good effects of indulgence to the religious prejudices of the Natives. I do not hesitate giving, as my opinion, that the managers of the church funds should be chosen from among the most respectable and substantial Natives that are to be found, and who, I imagine, are the most ready to accept the trust; that several of the present, although appointed by the Board, and because being men of no property, they embarrass the funds under their care, should be set aside; that the accounts of expensiture should be at all times open to the inspection of the Clear; and that the Board should take into their serious consideration the repairs that are absolutely requisite to the principal pagodas in the country, particularly those of universal resort at Conjevaram. In every country, although funds may be assigned for keeping in repair and preventing the decay of places of public worship, they will occasionally require and receive the efficient aid of the existing Government; yet none of those now in allusion, have participated of its bounty since the English have had a footing in India; that they are in ruinous condition may, therefore, be inferred from hence; but the fact cannot be more clearly demonstrated; and how kindly relief is called for, when I mention that the sacred temple, where the idol is deposited, at Little Conjevaram, is threatened with total destruction by the roots of a tree which are insinuating themselves through the walls, and cannot be eradicated but by incurring an expense, for a necessary ceremony, of private 200 pagodas, which the funds are not able to bear. Several of the other buildings are also in an equally ruinous condition, and some utterly destroyed.

"I cannot take a more proper occasion than this to represent a subject which, I should hope, only required it in order to obtain the relief which I am about to solicit. The Little Conjevaram pagoda formerly received, and continued to receive, after the accession of the present Nabob, and even after the grant of the Jaghire, a very considerable marah and some shorums in many parts of his country; but, since the war of 1789, these have been entirely taken away from it. Whether or not this circumstance may be known to the Nabob, I am not informed; but as I can hardly think that he would withhold, on a proper representation, what has immortalized preceding Princes,—that he would be the first to destroy the benevolent end for which it was instituted—and that he is not sensible of the self-satisfaction which so laudably arises from promoting the general happiness of the people whom he governs; so I would wish to engage the good offices of the Board and of Government to interfere for a restoration of the advantages which these pagodas anciently enjoyed. The magnificence of the festivals, and processions of this celebrated pagoda, is miserably fallen off for want of them, and the rich ornaments which decked the idol, but were lost during the war, have, on account of the poverty of the church, never been replaced.

"The gifts of pilgrims, and others, at the anniversary festivals at Trivulore and Pednapollam, have heretofore been collected and appropriated to the uses of Government; they are, however, trifling, together, not amounting to much more than six hundred pagodas per annum and it would be a liberal sacrifice to allow them to be added to the church funds, or disbursed in such manner, for the benefit of the church, as the Clergy may direct; with whom I would, nevertheless, recommend that the collection should remain.

"I have already said much upon the subject of repairing the pagodas, and, perhaps, no stronger inducement could be held out for the attainment of the end proposed. (The rebuilding of towns.) When completed, the tanks will, for many years, be monuments of British dominion in India; and it would be a pity that the same spirit of liberality should not be extended to other objects, uniting to accomplish the same public benefit."

LACROIX'S ELEMENTS OF ALGEBRA; TRANSLATED BY VINCENT L. REES, LECTURER ON MATHEMATICS AT THE HINDOO COLLEGE.—We are glad to see a volume like this issue from the Indian press. It proves both the advance of scientific education, and the possession of every facility for further progress. It is not our design to enter on a critical examination of the book. It claims our approval, without passing through such an ordeal. The character of the original work is a sufficient security for an adequate representation of the principles of Algebraic science; and Mr. Rees may safely be confided in, for the transformation of the examples and illustrations into accordance with our local peculiarities. We have no doubt he will be found to have performed a very useful service for our Schools and Colleges. His volume contains more than 430 pages of elegant and expensive printing; and is sold cheap at eight rupees. Yet, we apprehend, it will be too expensive for general use, as a class book. In its present form, it deserves the liberal patronage of the Committee of Public Instruction, and of the various Educational Institutions in the country; but we would urge Mr. Rees to prepare an abridgement of it, which might be sold for a couple of rupees, and brought into universal use.

A PLAN FOR THE INTRODUCTION OF THE EUROPEAN SCIENCE OF MEDICINE AND SURGERY AMONG THE NATIVES OF INDIA. BY MAJOR W. HUGHES.—The tract, of which we have quoted the title, or rather a portion of the title, gives proof of the author's benevolent character; but, we fear it will serve but little other purpose. It is a heterogeneous collection of extracts from the Ancient Medical Science of India, the present Native Medical Practice, the efforts of Government to improve it, Dr. O'Shaughnessy's suggestions respecting an Indian Pharmacopoeia, the Medical Statistics of India, and a few topics more of a like nature. The "Plan" of Major Hughes is the smallest object of his attention. It is laid in the reader's way in bits and scraps, and is no where presented as a consistent whole. The following paragraph is the only distinct mention of it that the pamphlet contains; and, of a certainty, it is sufficiently meagre:

"19. Native Medical Colleges.—The plan for the formation of Native Medical Colleges for the instruction of Native Doctors is to be employed as such among the inhabitants of towns and villages generally, and would, necessarily, at least at first, be different from that of the College at Calcutta—that is, the pupils instead of being four, should not remain above two years at the proposed Colleges; and though they should be taught the English language, to a certain extent, their instruction should be chiefly through the medium of the Hindoostanee language; for to render the measure one of immediate or early benefit, it would be advisable to devote the time of the students to the acquirement of medical knowledge from translation; whereas, if such knowledge is to be principally gained by the perusal of English works, they would lose, in learning the latter language, the time which, at first, would be best devoted to teaching them a practical knowledge to such an extent, as shall qualify them to afford medical aid to their fellow-creatures, in the cases of those diseases which are most prevalent among the natives in the districts where they are to be employed; which require prompt remedies, rather than the exhibit of great science."

The object, then, of Major Hughes's plan, is to furnish the whole Native community with medical practitioners who have had European instruction; and the means by which he would accomplish that object, is a two years' course of vernacular instruction. And both the object and the means are deserving of much stronger recommendation than he has given them. The idea is good, and is capable of general application to every kind of professional instruction, which we have to communicate to the people of India. To none is it more applicable, than the instruction of native ministers of the gospel.

For the execution of his plan, Major Hughes recommends that the Colleges at Benares, Agra, and Delhi, should have each a Medical Superintendent assigned them, and two qualified pupils from the Calcutta Medical College, in order to form medical classes as part of their economy; and he goes so far as to propose Dr. A. R. Lindsay, Dr. R. B. Duncan and Dr. James Baiken, as the first Superintendents to be appointed. Upon the able Professors of the Calcutta Native Medical College, he would throw the task of preparing directions for the provincial Colleges; in which it is recommended that, in addition to a given number of foundation pupils, any Native practitioners should be admitted to study.

We hope the suggestions of our author will not be wholly useless; and, indeed, there are few honest endeavours to do good which do prove entirely useless. The information he has collected is not new, but is it always accurate; and his proposals are too indistinct for adoption. Yet he may be the means of stimulating attention to his subject in some who are more competent to manage it; and it may be all the better that he interferes so little with what they might see good to recommend.

RESOLUTION OF GOVERNMENT ON PRISON DISCIPLINE.

The Appendix to the Prison Discipline Committee's Report, published as a separate volume, is prefaced by a Resolution on the Report itself, adopted on the 8th October, 1838, in the Legislative Department, by the Honourable the President in Council, after having consulted the Right Honourable the Governor General, and, therefore, in concurrence with His Lordship. To this document we now direct the attention of our readers; and it need not detain them long. His Honour appears to have looked at the subject with something like a despairing perplexity. He seems oppressed with the apprehension, that to go into the business in earnest, will require a power of money, and to get that money will be a job indeed. But the Report of the Committee commends itself to especial favour, by "the moderation of views" with which it is drawn; that is, by the opportunity it affords of spending time in talk, and postponing action and expenditure. The Resolution begins with the end of the Report, by disposing, first, of the general scheme of reform proposed by the Committee. On the general principles laid down by the Committee, His Honour for the most part concurs with them. He does so, amongst many other things, in their rejection of education in the goals, and the prohibition of religious instruction. On the other hand, he reserves for future consideration, the influence of rewards, the most desirable sort of convict labour, and, especially, the question whether labour on the roads should be wholly discontinued. He disapproves of the system of forcing convicts to work upon the roads at a distance from their district goals; but rather leans to the belief that in many cases, and under proper regulations, out-door labour within a reasonable distance from the prison, may at present, with advantage, be admitted.

But the most important part of the Resolution refers to the experiment which the Committee proposed, of erecting a Central Penitentiary in Calcutta. His Honour in Council would be glad to have before him a plan and estimate for the erection of such a Penitentiary with all its suitable appendances, as well as estimates for the improvement of the circles of district gaols connected with this central building; and wishes for this purpose, that Mr. Grant, the intelligent Secretary of the Committee, may be put in communication with the Military Board; and that all the information requisite, may be collected in a definite shape, for submission to the Government, and, eventually, to the home authorities. He is of opinion that as soon as a plan and estimate can be prepared, the sanction of the Honourable Court of Directors should be solicited for the immediate erection at this Presidency of a Central Penitentiary of the size recommended by the Committee.

Now, as Government have thus sanctioned the great recommendation of the Committee, we should be glad to learn that the zeal and ability exhibited by the Committee in their inquiries and deliberations, had been consistently followed up by promptitude in beginning the execution of their scheme. Have Mr. Grant and the Medical Board yet furnished the desired plan and estimate; and are they on their way to the Court of Directors?

Having expressed his opinions on the Committee's general scheme of reform, the President in Council proceeds to notice their recommendations for the immediate improvement of the existing system. They are generally approved. In particular it is desired, that the rule respecting the weight of fetters, which the Committee adopted from the Bengal Committee on Convict Labour, should be immediately circulated by the Supreme Government for general observance. His Honour thinks, with the Committee, that a small range of solitary cells should be immediately built in every gaol, in such a manner, if possible, as to fall in with the general alteration which would be rendered necessary by the eventual adoption of the whole plan of the Committee. And, for the reasons stated by the Committee, as well as with reference to the Reports of the Committee on Convict Labour, His Honour is decidedly of opinion that the entire system of employing the convicts in road-gangs or otherwise, under Engineer or Executive officers, at a distance from the gaols, should be immediately put an end to throughout the Presidencies.

These, and some other points of the Resolution are of great importance, and we should be exceedingly glad to learn, that corresponding orders had been issued respecting them. But from what we have heard, we are led to fear that the Government can not only pass resolutions and leave them unexecuted: but that they pass resolutions and then issue orders in direct contradiction to them. This appears to have been the course adopted respecting the feeding of the prisoners—a point of which we showed the exceeding importance, in our first article on the Committee's Report, on the 18th of April. As a matter of justice, not to say humanity, it is necessary that the convicts should have a sufficiency of food, of that mixed nature which it is well known is essential to healthy digestion; and that it should be afforded oftener than once in the twenty-four hours. As a matter of discipline, it is necessary that the prisoners should be debarred the gratification of marketing and cooking, and be deprived of the opportunity of saving money out of their allowances, either for bribing their keepers, or for more creditable purposes. With these views, the Committee recommended that money allowances should be entirely stopped, and rations be universally given, under such regulations as should insure a proper variety of food, and a sufficient quantity of stimulating condiments to assist digestion: and also that no convicted prisoner be hereafter allowed to cook his own victuals, but that a Brahman and Mussoulman cook be provided for each gaol.

On this vital point, the recommendations of the Committee have received the entire approval of the President in Council, who is of opinion that they ought to be immediately and strictly acted upon throughout all the Presidencies; and, that, for the first year or two, half yearly reports of the results, both as regards the health of the prisoners, and the expense should be rendered to the Supreme Council. Yet, we understand that, in the very teeth of this opinion, the Sadler Dewanny have received orders to issue instructions, that, in future, all prisoners in Bengal are to receive uncooked rations of a seer of rice, a seer and a half of firewood, and a kharab of tobacco daily. Rather than carry such an order into execution, the Government had much better leave the matter as it is. It will rectify no existing evil, but add to all that exist new mischiefs of its own. We suppose it was intended to put all the prisoners in the country on an equality, respecting their food; and, it must be confessed, a uniform grain allowance would make a nearer approach to that, than a money allowance. The value of three or four pice differs exceedingly in different districts; so that such a sum daily would, in some places, be a profuse allowance, but in others, a bare and scanty one. The value of a seer of rice is equally various, but as in every place the price of the staple grain regulates the price of most other provisions, at least of home production, the difference of value in the rice would be a less inconvenience. Where the prisoner has to purchase his dhal, fish and other chutneys by the sale of his surplus four or five Chattricks of very cheap rice, most, though not all, of those articles would be found procurable at a price proportionally as cheap as the rice. But what is the great importance of a uniform allowance either in money or grain? Is simplicity of accounts and estimates worth purchasing at the cost of so much loss and suffering to the convicts, as must be the result of such uniformity? We imagine not.

A grain allowance has this inconvenience to the convict, that it is twice subjected to the deductions of trade profits before he can make use of it. The grant made to him by government is first diminished by the profit of the mooder, through whose hands the grain is supplied; and when the same mooder takes back a portion of it to be bartered for other articles, the amount of allowance contained in that portion is twice taxed with the mooder's retail profits. This will be the case where there is honest dealing: but how much the evil will be aggravated by the illegal and dishonest practices of the mooders, it is impossible to say. They are a class of men, who will not let slip an opportunity of making gain at any thing. The convicts will be at their mercy, and will suffer accordingly.

If Government will not take the trouble or risk of establishing cooks in the gaols, let them give the prisoners full rations, such as both the Prison Discipline Committee, and the Convict Labour Committee have recommended, without leaving it to the convicts either to barter or purchase any thing. But certainly cooked rations would be far preferable. Dissatisfaction on the part of the convicts might be guarded against, as easily as it is done in the European Regiments of the Army.

On the subject of Transportation, the President in Council recommends, that rules for the better management of the convicts at all the penal settlements should be immediately prescribed: but on the great question between transportation for life and imprisonment, one which the Committee have arguand so ally, His Honour does not think the Government are yet in circumstances to come to a satisfactory decision.

THE PUNJAB.—Scarcely had the community recovered from the astonishment, occasioned by the intelligence from China, than information is received of the death of RESERVE SIKH. The course of life he has long led, and the alarming attacks of disease to which he has been so frequently subject, had fully prepared Government for the event; yet it came suddenly, and adds to the difficulties of our present position. Never since we obtained footing in India, has the mind of any Governor General been distracted by such vast, intricate and multiplied combinations. During the past twelve months, we have had nothing but an uninterrupted succession of startling events. On whichever way we cast our eyes, we perceive circumstances which call for the exercise of the highest order of statesmanship. The atmosphere is clouded all round the horizon. Afghanistan, Russia, Persia, Egypt, Burma, Nepal, China, the Punjab. Here is a maze of political difficulties which might make the strongest nerves quiver. But if Britain is the destined instrument in the hands of Providence for the mental and moral regeneration of Asia, we are immortal till our work is done; and we have two centuries of labour before us. Happy, indeed, will it be, if the present difficulties shall lead the British authorities to examine how far they have fulfilled the high trust reposed in them, and to determine that the return of peace shall be the signal for a single-hearted devotedness to the object for which we hold empire in Asia.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, MAY 5.

The Columbo Observer brings to light a practice in the district of Tinacelly, which, if true, calls for the instant interposition of Government. It is affirmed that, in the district of Tinacelly, an additional tax of from eight annas to six Rupees a year is levied on the Native Christians; that a lieutenant officer is appointed to collect it, who exacts it through the agency of whips, clubs, and a wooden instrument used for the purpose of compressing the fingers. It is to be hoped that the account is altogether unfounded. A letter from Peshawar, dated the 17th April, states that a messenger had come in to Dr. Lord, from Candahar, with the information that the Candahar horse had moved out thirty-six miles from that place, and encountered the English troops, and met with a repulse; and that they had fled, leaving all their guns and baggage behind them.—Letters have been received from Rangoon to the 19th April. After Col. Benson had come away, Captain McLeod received an intimation, that a visit from him would be agreeable to Tharrawaddie. He proceeded to the Palace, and was very cordially received. He was distinctly given to understand, that the visit was not official, but private. But even this visit will be of use. It will enable the Acting Resident to give accurate information of the state of things to the King; and this cannot fail to induce him to sue for war.—The first instalment on 1582 shares in the proposed London Steam Company has been paid up into the Union Bank.—A long report of a meeting of Indigo Planters, held at Tirhoot, appears in this day's Hurkaru. The object was to petition Government for a redress of grievances.—A Post Office Notice states, that the 20th instant will be the last day for the despatch of letters to be sent by the Provia Gulf Steamer, and the 31st proximo for the sailing vessel to Aden, and Steamer from thence to Suez.—The Members of the Mechanics' Institute have been invited by Professor O'Shaughnessy to attend the course of lectures given by him, at the Medical College.—A letter from Moorshidabad states, that the Editor of the Newspaper there, has been imprisoned by the public authorities, and fined ten thousand Rupees. Impossible!—Col. Sutherland has dealt very summarily with the Jaulpore Rajah. He ordered his envoys to his own tent, and informed them, that unless five lakhs of Rupees were paid in four days, he would strike his tents, and return with a force, which would bring them to their senses. On the appointed day, just as he was preparing to break up his camp, the money was counted down.

FRIDAY, MAY 10.

From the last accounts which have been received from Penang, it would appear that the Siamese had regained possession of Quetchah, and driven all the Malays from it.—A very severe shock of an earthquake was felt at Gowinghly, in Assam, on the 28th ult. It is reported as having been the severest which had been felt by any English resident in that country.—No further intelligence has been received from the ARMY or THE NAVY, of a later date than the 8th; and the report of an engagement with the Goudahares, is not confirmed; indeed, from a comparison of dates, it would appear to rest upon a very imperfect foundation.—The Commercial Advertiser publishes the account of a most terrible human sacrifice in the district of Backergunge. A veddy Zamiaie had a cause pending for a long time in the Courts. He at length gained it, and immediately performed a grand Poojah, at which he determined to offer a human sacrifice. One of his own sons was immediately selected, and immolated. The whole affair has been brought to the knowledge of the Magistrate, who has instituted, it is said, a very strict investigation into the matter.

SATURDAY, MAY 11.

Private letters mention the death of Mr. Fane, an able and valuable member of the Civil Service, who had proceeded to the Cape, for the benefit of his health.—Letters have been received from the Mauritius. A furious hurricane was experienced off the island, at the last equinox, which proved extremely destructive to the shipping, more especially to the Northerland, the largest vessel which has yet been built at Moulmein. She was completely dismasted, lost her rudder, threw a hundred tons of cargo overboard, and was saved from destruction, by being taken in tow by the Victoria.—No later intelligence has been received from the army, and there seems reason to mistrust the information which was brought by way of Peshawar, of the engagement with the Candahares.—Mr. John Bird has taken his seat, as provincial councillor at Malacca.—A Court of Enquiry has been held at Madras, on the young officers who abused the officers of the Lord Louth, in their mutinous and outrageous conduct; and they have been severely reprimanded according to the degree of their guilt.—Chowra has broken out with dreadful violence at Beiliffy; the casualties among the men of the 20th, have been appalling. Lieut.-Col. Poole, who commands the Regiment, has fallen a victim to this disease.—A statement has been published of the number of fires in the native part of the town, during the last year; they amounted to 168 tiled houses, and to 120 thatched houses; the greatest number consumed in one month was in March.—A Native, Surup Chundur Doss, has just published the prospectus of a History of India, in the Bengalee language; and we are happy to learn, that the School Book Society has subscribed for one hundred copies of it.

SUNDAY, MAY 13.

The City Article of the Calcutta papers announces a fall in the price of Bengal Bank and Union Shares, which appears unaccountable. The proposed increase of the capital stock of the Union Bank may well account for the fall of its shares. The branch of the Bengal Bank, established at Mirzapore, is said to be doing a large and flourishing business.—The Lord Louth is at length in from Malacca.—The Frederic also announced this day from Mohart Town, has a large portion of the 21st Fusiliers. The men and women were immediately put on board steamers, and sent up at once to occupy the empty barracks at Chittaur.—Letters and papers have been received from Moulmein to the 24th. Dr. Richardson, who had been sent on a Mission to the Court of Siam, has been received in the most courteous and splendid style. We have given in another place, an account of the audience he had with the King.—Later accounts from Ava state, that although Capt. McLeod had been received with every favour by Tharrawaddie, he had met with slights from his ministers. This will not, however, hasten a war. Nothing, we believe, will hurry an one, but some-ling disaster to our arms, which shall infuse into the mind of the King more confidence of success in a trial of strength with us, than he now has.—Accounts from Ferozepore state, that the Political Resident at Lahore, had applied for a medical officer to attend Rungjee Singh, who was so ill as to be speechless; but no immediate danger is apprehended.—The Governor General has been pleased to reduce the charge of postage, and from the AUR or THE LAKSHI.—We learn that it is the intention of the Court of Directors to reward the eminent services of Lieutenant Pottinger, who so nobly defended Herat, by raising him to the brevet of a Major, as soon as he attains his Captaincy.—It was currently reported in the Camp at Ferozepore, that news had arrived from Peshawar, of the fall of old Candahar; and that batteries had been opened against the new town.—A slight shock of an earthquake is said to have been felt at Calcutta, on Saturday morning last.—The Bombay papers confidently anticipate the arrival of the Atalanta, with the March Mails, on the 6th of this month.

TUESDAY, MAY 14.

Intelligence, more disastrous than any which has yet been received, reached Calcutta from China yesterday. We refer the reader to our editorial columns for particulars.—The letters just received from the eastward, leave no doubt that the Quench struggle has terminated for the present, leaving the Siamese masters of the country; and that there is little hope that the Malays will be able to regain it.—The Nabob of Jujur, to whom the Governor General lately sent a complimentary letter, for the assistance which he recently afforded, in the suppression of Thuggee, lies now dangerously ill. The Rajah of Kiseengur, Kulian Singh, is dead, and his body has been burnt with sandal wood.—Sylhet has been deluged with rain, which has flooded the country around to such an extent, that the inundation exceeds that of the height of the rains last year.—Lieut. Belleau, in charge of the canals, near Calcutta, has personally visited the villages on its banks, and finds that the complaints raised by the poor, against the oppression of Kajmangh Bar's people, are universally true.—A scene of oppression has been exhibited on the very outskirts of our metropolis, which calls loudly for redress. If such things take place, within six miles of Government House, what must be the sufferings of the poor, and the oppression of the rich, six hundred miles from it?

WEDNESDAY, MAY 15.

Yesterday, the important intelligence was received in Calcutta, that the Maha Rajah Rungjee Singh died at Lahore, on the 24th of last month.—It is said that there are letters in Calcutta from the advanced Brigade of the AUR or THE LAKSHI, which state that the Chiefs of Candahar had made their submission to the British, and agreed to supply the troops with provisions, and the horses with forage.—The baptism, by Dr. Wilson, of Bunbury, of a Parsee, a follower of Zoroaster, has occasioned an extraordinary sensation among that community. We shall furnish all particulars next week.—A meeting of the Landholder's Society is to be held this day, in Calcutta, when "some important subjects are to be brought forward."—It is generally understood that Government will suspend the next Opium sale. What else can be done?

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

RECEPTION OF DR. RICHARDSON BY THE KING OF SIAM.

"On the 17th February, as had been arranged, I had my audience. I was said to be highly honoured by the unusual style in which I was received. At 10 o'clock, the King's boats arrived, when, accompanied by Mr. Hunter, Captain Brown of the ship, W. T. Hamilton, Messrs. Smith and Hayes of Mr. H.'s house, and an officer of Captain B.'s ship, we started and were met by some Portuguese officers in the Siamese service, at the landing place. Mr. Hunter and myself had each a sort of swinging conveyance like a hammock, and horses were furnished for the other gentlemen; a small detachment of cavalry and elephants, and 2000 foot soldiers, were drawn out in lines on the road, through which (after entering a gate, which we did as usual by a circuitous route,) when we got out of the conveyances, we passed to the Prakhung Hall of Justice outside the Palace; at this place we waited 45 minutes, with some Siamese officers, till the Prince had all arrived, when we proceeded to the royal presence. An uncommon crowd of people were collected, who were quiet and orderly throughout; outside the gilt door, which was shut, and where we waited just long enough to have it opened, the people who had accompanied us, prostrated themselves as often as they had time. When the door was opened we walked in, and seated ourselves behind the presence, (which had been sent a day or two previous,) on a carpet which covered the floor. The King called us to come nearer him, and we went before the presents and sat down again, making 3 salaams to His Majesty. The interpreter had been taken ill just before we entered the hall, and Mr. Hunter whom they took as a Siamese officer, was obliged to officiate; the usual questions were put and answered. At the close of the audience, the King said that if I had any thing to say on business, Chow Coon Budeen and the Pra-Kiang would be at his service, and so strong was his friendship for the English, that my wish of the Governor General, should be considered the same as if it were his own. The audience lasted about 1 hour and 40 minutes. The questions which I put in the usual round about way. The King spoke to Phis-rip, the second Pra-Kiang, and he to Radthit, who again communicated with Mr. Hunter, and he with me. The King's title was repeated before and after each of my answers, which I could understand were modified a little to meet the royal ear, though, I believe, no change was made in the meaning of what was said. The hall is about 100 feet by 60, and except a small place in the centre, was crowded with the officers of the Government in their robes of state. The King was seated on his highest gold or gilt throne, raised about 15 feet above us; the lower stories on which he has usually received missions from the neighbouring states, had been removed. In his personal appearance, His Majesty is exceedingly stout, and is said by every one to be perhaps the most intelligent and sensible man in his kingdom. To all business he himself attends, and he often surprises the Government officers by his knowledge of transactions it was not supposed necessary to acquaint him with. After the curtain of heavy cloth of gold, which crosses the Throne before the Hall was drawn, Coon Tait, the Pra-Kiang's brother, who speaks English intelligibly, and whom I had often seen, came over to us and introduced to me the Chow Coon Budeen, who said he would be happy to see me at his house. This chief, who is the first minister, sat on the King's right of the Hall, and the Pra-Kiang on the left, the Princes of the Blood before them near the foot of the Throne; not one of the very numerous assembly, till after the curtain was drawn, ventured to raise his head from close to the ground, where their grovelling position on their elbows and knees placed it. After the audience, we went the usual round of the boats, (some of which are very costly and splendid,) and the white elephant, which is a good deal like the one at Ava, except that this one from view has broken his tusks almost off. From the elephant shed which is on the banks of the river, we returned home at a little past two.—Moslem Chronicle.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR,—In the criminal branch of the service, the abolition of this punishment has been followed by bad effects. The state of society in India is such, that to the lower orders and the ill-disposed, the terrors of a jail are trifling. Convicts are therein well fed, and clothed, and attended to; and their hard labour amounts to just enough of exercise to keep them healthy. I remember an instance of a Dacoit being sentenced to suffer stripes and 14 years imprisonment; and this man asked to be hanged, in preference to undergoing the above sentence of stripes. Numerous instances have occurred to me, in which prisoners having been released, have again committed offences, on purpose to be again imprisoned and taken good care of. Corporal Punishment was summary, and striking, and exemplary; and tended greatly to check crime. Our jails are now over-crowded with convicts, detained in protracted confinement, in lieu of stripes, to the cruel injury of the prisoners families, and the greater expense to the State, without the reformation of the offender.

In cases in which a sentence of six months imprisonment, with stripes, would have been formerly awarded, an offender is now confined for two or three years; during which time he loses all habit and inclination for work: when released, and from the corruption of his jail associates, in most instances he betakes himself to thieving and burglary, as a means of livelihood; and prays upon society, undeterred and indifferent, even though he be again imprisoned. With respect to the Army, our military brethren of all grades and experience, declare the cessation of Corporal Punishment to be highly injudicious, and subversive of strict and necessary discipline. Sepoys obtain the very award they sometimes seek, dismissal from their Regiment, with all arrears of salary paid in full; and afterwards they not unfrequently enlist in some other corps, although disgraced men! Some cases of disobedience, nearly approaching to mutiny, have lately occurred, which lead us to fear, that our Native Army is not under that prompt and due command which it formerly was; and every officer that I have questioned upon this subject, believes the cause to result from Lord W.'s regulations. I cannot speak with certainty as to their effects upon the military branch of the service, but will touch, from experience, for their injurious consequences upon our civil duties.

This measure was not called for; and it is difficult to say why the Ruler enforced it, more especially when we take into consideration his subsequent conduct upon this question. When canvassing the votes of the weavers of Glasgow, in the hopes of becoming their representative, he was expressly asked if he would vote for the abolition of Corporal Punishment in the army? He replied; "You know what I have done in India, and may expect me to act accordingly in England." His Lordship went into the House, and voted against the abolition! Any comments impugning his motives, would be unfair; so I will merely state, that his conduct in this business, to say the least, was dubious and inconsistent. It is constantly affirmed that His Lordship has been assailed, and his character so severely inveighed against, by all parties, on account of the system of retrenchment which he effected, that the head and front of his offences, were his clippings and cuttings. That the severe measures of economy which His Lordship enforced, caused bitter disappointment and discontent, is not to be wondered at; more especially as these retrenchments were chiefly levelled at the junior members of the service, and at those who were the least able to bear them. These unsparing retrenchments, no doubt produced many intemperate attacks upon his name; but I deny that I am influenced by any such reasons of spite or passion. The facts I mention speak for themselves; and the observations I make, are their result.

We, who eat the Company's salt, should not, and do not, grumble at economical curtailments, which the state of affairs may call for; but was the policy of Lord W. entirely his own; or was he the mere tool of the Home Authorities? If the former, his discernment, and the justice of his edicts, may be fairly questioned; if the latter, he was but the ready executioner of commands imposed upon him, some of which we are told he did not approve of, but went doggedly to work "with his hands tied." It is generally believed, that his measures of retrenchment, were, in many instances, neither equitable nor judicious; and in stating this, I express but the opinions of the majority in every branch of the services.

It may be averred with safety, that the order for disbanding the Provincial Battalion was injudicious. It has since been virtually abrogated; and the men are now, I believe, in point of enlistment and content, placed upon the same footing as they were before. Lord W. gave us for our civil guards over treasuries, jails, &c., a nondescript band; half sepoy, half burkundah; without the service of discipline, and "esprit de corps" of the one, or the subordination of the other. The bad effects of this make-shift measure, have become so apparent, that the present Government have seen the necessity of modifying Lord W.'s orders respecting them. They were in no ways trustworthy, either for escorting prisoners, or guarding property; and little better than a burlesque mockery of a Sepoy Corps; disaffected with their situations, and only retaining them, because they could get no other employment. To proceed to minor instances, though they no less illustrate individual character. I will refer to, amongst many other unworthy and petty savings, the destruction of the Great Gun at Agra. This ancient piece of workmanship was ordered to be split into pieces, and sold for the benefit of the Government! I well remember the sensation and excitement which this act caused throughout every class of society in Agra. The destruction of this revered relic, fully accorded with the blunt and utilitarian nature of the Ruler's views; and was regarded by him as a cheap and satisfactory reform. The brass was disposed of piecemeal, to enrich the coffers of the Government, under Lord W. Bentinck's administration; and its stores thereby increased. I question, would the most needy brazier in the Tinker's Bazar at Agra, have accepted this curious and valuable relic of former ages, upon such terms; and would he have broken it in pieces for his private profit? There are other instances of this narrow and pennywise line of policy related of the Ruler; his abolishing the Hospital at Saugor, whereby a monthly expense of Rupees, amounting to 30, was saved to the State; and though an appeal was made in behalf of this useful charity, a most offensive and unbecoming reply was said to have been received, intimating almost, that the parties concerned, had their own interested reasons for pressing the question! Also the Botanical Garden and Messenger at Barrackpore, and the absorption of the Post Masterships; and depleting the duties of these offices to the already overburdened Collector-Magistrates. This last measure gave great dissatisfaction to the medical officers, (many of whom had become incumbents for years,) for the petty saving of 50 Rupees per annum at the different stations. It has since been virtually abrogated. Dr. Sprey, in his Modern India, page 21, vol. 2, asserts that the Ruler put a stop to all works of public utility, in his eagerness to hoard and scrape for the Government Treasury; and in page 84 to 92, some additional strictures upon his mal-administration will be found, expressed by his clear and sensible author, who simply states facts and events; and does not indulge in that severe style of invective against the Ruler's system, which marked the pages of Meerut Magazine and Observer. These publications were conducted with so much vigour, and gave so great offence to the Ruler, that, notwithstanding his expressed opinion, that "he knew no subject which the Press might not discuss freely," he threatened to suppress them. In these acts we can see no fair and comprehensive principle of reform, which the state of public affairs may have demanded; on the contrary, such petty scrapings approach nearer to parsimony than just economy. It is, moreover, somewhat unaccountable, that this unsparing agent of retrenchment, throughout his career in this country, held the office of Clerk of the Pipe in England! It is difficult to say, whether there were any duties connected with this situation, or what their nature may have been; but it is generally asserted, that the Ruler enjoyed his own privileges and immunity from retrenchment, and received 5000*l.* per annum for his Clerkship of the Pipe. "What a lucky man you were, my Lord, to hold so good a thing so long!" His Lordship's inclination to listen to ex-officio reports,—and, in some instances, anonymous information,—led him to adopt conclusions which were by no means just. Suspicious and pre-determined in his judgement, that all Indian affairs were ill managed; that every thing was wrong in the Army and the Medical Service; and that the Civilians were a body of well-paid idlers, insubordinate, and leagued together to promote their own interests, at the expense of the Government they have the honour to serve; few departments appeared to his capacity to be well conducted, excepting Mrs. Havell's Figgery at Deegah! The experience and collected wisdom of his predecessors, and the old residents in this country, was so little heeded or regarded by him, so bent was he upon carrying into execution his own "sic volo sic jubeo" schemes. The unbecoming reprimand which he gave to that able functionary, Mr. Ewer, for opposing his views; the hasty and prejudiced order which he gave, respecting the removal of a zealous and conscientious officer (now a member of the Sabha) from Miraspoor, upon the ex parte statement of an interested individual, without even calling upon this officer for explanation, corroborate my assertions respecting his conduct, as being arbitrary and prejudicial. If we follow the Ruler to England, we shall there also find him acting with his customary inconsistency, to say the least. He was professionally the champion of the Company, and yet he accepted the chair at a meeting assembled in favour of Mr. Buckingham's claims; and to support this man against his employers, towards whom in this country, he had been so "faithful found," and so discerning. Such conduct, in the eyes of most men, rendered him obnoxious, to the suspicion that the Ruler's ulterior objects may have been to ingratiate himself with the weavers of Glasgow, of which town he became the Representative, and in which Mr. B. had much influence. Again, in former years, Lord W. Bentinck was connected with a Committee (Chairman, I believe,) in Cambridgeshire, associated for the purpose of draining the fen ditches; yet even here he blundered on with such resolute pertinacity, that the objects of the association were thwarted and thrown into confusion by this impracticable ditcher and drainer. How is it that His Lordship has failed in every public appointment, of which he has had charge? As a Military man, his career and services in Catalonia were unsuccessful, if not worse; as a Statesman, in Naples, he was outwitted; as Governor of Madras, he gave great dissatisfaction; and in this country, his measures and mismanagement now speak for themselves: if their effects have not been prejudicial, why have many been repealed? He failed, moreover, as a ditcher in the Fens. Since his rule and fermentation in the minds of the Native community, an excitement has risen, which was never felt before. He pushed them on, and they have swollen in their attempts to go ahead, under the influence of his system. Far be it from me to advocate the depression of the people of India; but the progress of mind and civilisation; and, consequently, of virtue, is gradual in its advance, and cannot be attained by sudden impulses. I regard His Lordship's wish to benefit the mass of the people, as one of the meritorious characteristics of his Government; but he commenced with too much precipitation; where there is neither public spirit or public intelligence, and information; and, assuredly, his measures have not tended to exalt the European name or interests in India. I do not urge that the Natives should be kept back for our advantage; but we are entitled by circumstances, education and integrity, to privileges and rank, which the Ruler was too prone to level upon considerations of cheap government. Where he ought to have walked, he galloped. Although we might suppose that the Native community would revere his name, and remember him with gratitude, such is not the case; many have spoken of him as a Ruler, whose chief efforts were directed to the acquirement of pelf and profit; and who gave dissatisfaction to most parties, excepting those to whom he had been the giver of all good things. Amongst the few bright spots in his career, we may include the suppression of Thuggee; the abolition of Suttee; his attention to the importance of good roads; and above all, his earnest and constant support, as an advocate for Steam Communication, both by sea and river. For this last act he is entitled to the gratitude of all; and for this alone, a statue might be erected to commemorate his name. It is unfair and invidious to say, as some do, that the glory of the Suttee abolition is not his; that the way was paved, and the public mind prepared. He had the good inclination to perform the act, and sufficient strength of mind to enforce the abolition, which he did abolish, by issuing a Law in prohibition. "Palman qui meruit ferat." The disclosure and uprooting of those remorseless murderers, the Thugs, is another obligation which India owes to Lord W. Bentinck, in conjunction with his able coadjutors, the late Mr. Halhed, Capt. Sleeman, and Messrs. F. C. Smith and Stookwell. I have named Lord W. Bentinck as the moving principle in the injudicious reforms and rules which were enacted during his administration; and to which, if my information be not incorrect, there was much of opposition offered by all in authority at the time, with the exception of Sir C. Metcalfe. This bepraised gentleman was His Lordship's most obedient devoted servant, and follower of all his steps and public measures.

He is extolled highly, while His Lord and Master is as highly condemned by the majority of our Indian public. Since the proceedings of both were similar, it is difficult to account for this inconsistency, on the part of our judicious public; unless we bear in mind the Freedom of the Press, and interpret the "Public" to mean, the interested conductors of Newspapers; the Lawyers and Attorneys; some European shopkeepers and traders; and other residents of Calcutta; which may, perhaps, in the estimation of some, constitute the Indian public. Assuredly the Freedom of the Press has covered a multitude of sins; or how can we account for the popularity of the follower, and the odium attached to the character of the Chief?

It is necessary to state, that in making the above miscellaneous observations upon His Lordship's public conduct, I have not been influenced by passion, or biased by any ill will towards him. I have commented upon the measures, not the man. That many of those measures were deficient in wisdom, I think must be admitted; else why have they been altogether? If any member of the other branches of our Indian administration will also lay before us the schemes and progress which Lord W. put into execution towards his respective department, I feel assured that they will not bear the scrutiny; nay, more, that they will be found paltry and unworthy. I have heard it argued, that His Lordship acted with the best intentions; but this does not excuse the faults of a public character. It is an palliation for mistakes, and more especially those which were marked by wrong headedness, and an impatience of opposition. That loathsome and torturing bigot, Queen Mary, burnt her victims, with the best of all possible intentions, religious conviction; and in the name of the God of Justice and Mercy!!! It is possible that the ex-Ruler had the fullest confidence in himself, and was fully conscious of his own wisdom and honesty of purpose; but the evil consequences of his measures have since, in part, developed themselves. He has passed away from us; and his favoured few are about to set up a graven image to commemorate his name. If this memorial be erected as a token of esteem and respect for his private character, which we are told was upright, exemplary and amiable; his private advisers, and those who benefited by him, may raise it on high, and bow the knee to it. But if it be intended to commemorate him in his public capacity, and the tendency of his edicts and their working; then I would suggest, that as the Athenians had a statue of brass, without a tongue, in representation of silence, so that of Lord William Bentinck, as best indicative of the tendency of his government, be fixed habe upwards.

Yours truly,

EUROPE.

EXTRACTS FROM MR. GEORGE THOMPSON'S SPEECH AT FAIRLEY, ON THE 20TH NOVEMBER, 1838.

Under the Mahomedan rule it was greatly increased, and led to the abandonment to a considerable extent of the cultivation of the soil, and deep-rooted diffidence in the minds of the natives. Under British sway, however, the tax was only limited by the capacity of the cultivators to pay; and hence the tilling of the soil had become an almost profitless occupation, and thence upon thousands of acres relinquished to the possession of the wild beasts and venomous reptiles of the country. The British conquerors of India had everywhere assumed a right of proprietorship in the soil, and erected on this assumption, a system of taxation more impolitic, oppressive and ruinous, than any other in the world. Instead of a specified and reasonable proportion of the crop, (the mode of collecting the tax under our predecessors) a money payment was demanded, which, owing to fluctuating seasons, ever changing prices, and the minable value of money, often amounted to more than the worth of the entire crop, when brought into the market. This subject had been discussed in a bold and masterly manner by a most faithful and talented friend of India, who had made it his study for thirty years, and had given to the world an invaluable treatise on the ancient and modern history of the land-tax in India. With unfeigned admiration and respect he referred the gentlemen around him to the writings of Major-General Briggs. The Marquis Cornwallis had, forty-five years ago, made an effort to improve upon the land revenue system of India by a PERMANENT SETTLEMENT of the tax in the provinces of Behar, Orissa, and a portion of Bengal. His project was known by the name of the ZEMINDARY system, which, though fraught with much evil and inconvenience in the earlier stages of its trial, had effected great good within the sphere of its operations, and might have been applied with irretrievable benefit to the whole of India. Another system was known by the name of the ROTWARRY SETTLEMENT, made by Government with the Ryots or cultivators individually; under which the government receives its share in the form of a money rent fixed on the land itself, in cultivation, and not being a pecuniary commutation for its share of the produce, varying as the extent of the produce may vary in each year. The practical working of this part of the land tax machinery had been rendered intelligible by the following hypothesis, stated by a member of the Government of Madras, in 1823:—"Imagine the whole landed interest—that is, all the landlords of Great Britain, and even the capital farmers, at once swept away from off the face of the earth; imagine a rent fixed on every field in the kingdom, seldom under, generally above its means of payment; imagine the land so rented, letted out to the villagers, according to the number of their cattle and ploughs, to the extent of forty or fifty acres each. Imagine the revenue raised in this manner, the agency of one hundred thousand as above, leviable through the agency of their discretion, according to their ideas of the occupant's means of paying, whether from the produce of his land or his separate property; and, in order to encourage every man to act as a spy on his neighbour, and report his means of paying, that he may eventually save himself from extra demand; imagine all the cultivators of a village liable at all times to a separate demand, in order to make up for the failure of one or more individuals of the parish. Imagine collectors in every county setting under the orders of a board, on the avowed principle of destroying all temptation for labour, by a general equalization of assessment; seizing and sending back runaway slaves to each other—and, lastly, imagine the collector, the sole magistrate, or justice of the peace of the county, through the medium and instrumentality of whom alone, any criminal complaint of personal grievance suffered by the subject can reach the superior courts. Imagine, at the same time, every subordinate officer, employed in the collection of the land revenue, to be a patrol officer, vested with the power to fine, confine, put in the stocks, and slay any inhabitant within his range, on any charge, without oath of the accuser, or sworn recorded evidence in the case." "This picture (says Mr. Richards) may be thought highly coloured, but it is not exaggerated. It describes the system, with its powers, such as it really is, and, however well administered, it may be in the hands of some extraordinary collector, still it being in a peculiarly open to boundless abuse, is a sufficient warrant of the evils it will always engender under ordinary management." The disastrous effects of such a system it was not difficult to foresee, nor surprising to find the Bombay Gazette of Nov. 10, 1837, communicating the following intelligence:—"Some of our richest provinces are only partially under cultivation. The whole country has been subjected to a system of taxation which has, under its peculiar circumstances, embittered more than anything else to retard its prosperity. The cultivation of fair tracts of country, capable of producing the most valuable of Indian commodities has been prevented." The question of a remedy for these evils came next to be considered. It might be briefly stated to consist of a series of measures founded in justice, and carried out by a wise and beneficent policy. Let us now acknowledge the rights of the cultivators; a diminution in the first place, and ultimately a permanent settlement upon equitable terms, of the land tax; the restoration (tax free) for a limited number of years at least of the village and waste lands; the abolition of the monopoly of salt, accompanied by a reduction of the duty on that article, which, in a rice-fed country like India, must be considered an absolute necessity of life; let a portion of the revenue be appropriated to the construction of roads and other means of artificial irrigation, to the building of bridges, the cutting of canals, and the making of roads; let public granaries be established, sufficient to contain stores adequate to the wants of the people in seasons of scarcity and drought; let the natives enjoy a participation in the affairs of government; let there be a reciprocity in the imposition of duties; a hospital of municipal institutions; the establishment of a uniform currency; let agricultural pursuits be encouraged, by a fixed duty on the importation of Indian wheat into this country, instead of the present fluctuating rate. To these, add the diffusion, by unobjectionable means, of the benefits of education. Suppose these things done, or the work fairly and in sincerity commenced, and what would be the result? What would be the advantages accruing to the government of India, the parent state, the manufacturing and mercantile interests of the kingdom at large? The conciliation and contentment of the native population; confidence in, and attachment to the British sway: the increased security and permanent possession of the vast country we have obtained, and which we now hold no the most precarious and doubtful tenure; the progressive improvement of the condition of a hundred millions of the subjects of the crown; the tranquillity and internal peace of the empire; the augmentation to an indefinite extent, of the revenue derivable from indirect taxation; and, finally, to bring the matter home to the business and bosoms of the merchants and artisans of this busy, ingenious and enterprising country, a largely increased and ever increasing demand for British manufactures. Upon this last consequence of a better system, he (Mr. Thompson) would venture to dwell for a few moments, considering the character and occupations at home before him. Crippled and almost paralysed as was our trade with India, yet what, notwithstanding, was the nature of our exports in regard to their variety? To India we sent cloths of all sorts; gambles; serges; cottons, printed and plain; twist and yarn, iron and steel; copper, lead, and shot, saddlery, &c. The trade in these and other articles might be incalculably increased. He (Mr. T.) must return for an instant to the erroneous doctrine so long and so successfully propagated by the East India Company, that no considerable increase could be reasonably expected in our exports to India. The East India Company, in 1813, expressly stated, "that no large or sudden addition could be made to the amount of British exports to India or China;" the causes, they declared, were to be found in the "nature of the Indian people, their climate, and their wants." A comparison of exports in one article of British manufacture would sufficiently demonstrate the utter fallacy of this position. In 1814, the exports of printed cottons amounted to 614,800 yards; plain cottons, 213,408 yards; declared value, 109,400 pounds sterling.—This, it must be remembered, was the last year of the Company's monopoly of the trade to India. In 1832, under the operation of the free system, the exports were,—in printed cottons, 18,291,530 yards; in plain cottons, 39,374,311 yards; declared value, 1,331,309 pounds sterling—leaving a balance, in favour of free trade, and against the Company's singular announcement of the doctrine already stated, of 36,749,930 yards of British manufactured goods, and 1,221,913 pounds of sterling money. In the article of cotton-wool, the Company's transactions amounted, in 1814, to the astounding and insignificant item of 8 pounds weight; and in 1832, to 4,235,427 pounds, valued at 309,710 pounds sterling. "The principal obstacle," observes Mr. McCulloch, "in the way of extending the commerce with India, does not consist in any insuperable on the part of the natives in purchase our commodities, but in the difficulty under which they are placed of furnishing equivalents for them." A glance at the increased value of the exports of cotton piece goods and yarn to Calcutta from Liverpool and Clyde, would tend to establish the fact (he (Mr. T.) was desirous of pressing upon their attention, viz. the possibility of increasing our commercial transactions with India.

The exports he referred to were as under:

In 1829	.....	£262,790	In 1834	.....	£ 630,207
1830	.....	774,596	1835	.....	818,480
1831	.....	809,543	1836	.....	1,107,167
1832	.....	621,930	1837	.....	1,178,417
1833	.....	615,010	1838	.....	982,127

The cultivation of cotton in India, though a matter of vast importance, had been comparatively neglected. Our trade with India had been uninterrupted for considerably more than two centuries, and in the hands of persons with an unlimited command of British capital, and the means of employing it amongst a population of, say, eighty millions, in a country, too, in which cotton had been grown from time immemorial, and which would be found to be the result of a comparison of the amount of cotton-wool imported into Great Britain and Ireland in 1835 from India, and the amount of the same commodity, imported during the same year from the United States of America, where the cultivation of cotton had only been carried on for 30 years, and where it was altogether the fruit of slave labour. From the East India Company's territories, and the island of Ceylon, we had imported 82,320,863 pounds weight of cotton wool, while from the United States we had received 209,308,073 pounds weight, leaving a balance in favour of a foreign country, slavery and republican task-masters, of 386,987,210 pounds weight of cotton. A wise administration of political and fiscal affairs in India, would rear a platform on which every moral and religious enterprise for the benefit of the degraded millions of India might be carried forward, with far higher hopes of success than we were justified at the present time in entertaining. He would, therefore, with all the emphasis he could employ, exhort the inhabitants of Paisley to come forward in behalf of the natives of the British dependencies, Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Newcastle-upon-Tyne, had already evinced a laudable ardour in the cause, and had committed to him (Mr. Thompson) the trust of representing their wishes and determinations in this matter. He was about to go forth in argue this great question before the people of the United Kingdom, and he called upon those who heard him—by their recollection of the unnumbered wrongs which their country through successive ages had heaped upon innocent and barbarous nations—by every feeling of pity toward the ignorant, the famishing and the oppressed, who from every quarter of the globe and every island of the sea, were turning their hands to us for aid—by every desire to exalt their nation's fame far eminence in a free-trade race—by the wish which could not but animate them to advance the wealth and comfort of themselves, their neighbours, and their friends; and above all, by the pledges he knew they had often given in labour for the spread of that kingdom which is righteousness and peace—by these considerations, drawn from whatever was interesting in human misery, or honourable in social intercourse, or sacred in Christian duty, he invoked their countenance and their aid. One and all, let them, with what influence they could command, associate themselves with him for the protection and defence of injured millions. For the present let "Jeha" be their watchword, and their prayer as they went forth in awe the seeds of a better system be,

O haste your truly emulous, days of gold.
 Where you in bright purity streaks the orient skies,
 Rise Science, Freedom, Peace, Religion rise!
 Till from Tanjore to furthest Soudan
 In one wide stretch back the glowing land,
 And Brahmin from his guilty greatness hurst;
 With Meera's Lord, Mowla rule the world!

—Glasgow Saturday Post.

RELIGIOUS.

THE NEW DEAN OF ECKENH.—The Rev. Lord Wriothesley Russell was gazetted to the deanery on Tuesday. He is brother by half blood to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and eldest son of the Duke of Bedford by his second marriage. His lordship is the youngest dignitary of the established church, being in his thirty-fourth year.—Ed.

RELIGIOUS MOVEMENTS IN GERMANY.—"Some time ago a minister of the Established Church in Dresden, named Stephan, being more zealous than his brethren for the conversion of sinners, holding private meetings at his own residence, in addition to the public ones in his church, was accused by his brethren, in force one of the tribunals of justice, of various crimes and misdemeanors, affecting his moral character. After a long trial it has been agreed, that, if he will leave the country, the law-suit shall be discontinued. About half of his followers have the country with him; and amongst them an evangelical nobleman, Baron Uckermark, who is said to carry with him in each about 80,000 dollars, intending to found a colony in North America. The Bremen paper of 7th November says on this subject—"Pastor Stephan, from Dresden, is already arrived within our walls, and with him about 200 of his countrymen, holding the same old Lutheran faith, intending to embark in the new Bremen ship, Others, Capt. Exter, for New Orleans, where, far from the land of their failures, and free from the efforts of their enemies, they may find a new home on the banks of the Missouri. More than 400 persons out of Saxony are already sailed for New Orleans before them in the Bremen ships, Copernicus, John George, and Republic. Several others will follow. The more we have become acquainted with these well-educated, quiet, and (as regards part of them) accomplished people, the more we are convinced that the reports circulated in some of the newspapers respecting Pastor Stephan and his community, have proceeded from very impure and hateful sources, and are mostly much disfigured, if not thoroughly false. It is much to be regretted that Germany, and especially Saxony, should lose a part of her quiet, laborious, and obedient population, against whom no other complaint can be rightly made, than that they hold strictly to the doctrines of Luther. On the other side, it is a satisfaction to us to see that a colony will shortly rise on the banks of the Missouri, which will prove an honor to the German name; and we wish our departing countrymen the best success in the execution of their design."

STETTGARD, Oct. 22.—A few days ago Mr. Oncken, from Hamburg, an emissary of the American Baptist Missionary Society, was here. He held several meetings, in which he so much displayed his eloquence, in spaces of five hours and a half duration, that immediately several inhabitants of this city (amongst whom were some who had already refused to allow their children to be baptized) felt themselves so much drawn to him, that between twenty and thirty, amongst whom were several ladies, allowed themselves to be baptized, by immersion in the river Neckar. The certificate of baptism and the gravel has been presented to each of the new converts; also each baptized himself, if required, to state publicly the reasons for his accession from the evangelical church. Amongst the converts are people of very different classes. The stranger received notice to depart as early as possible.—Christ. Adv.

REVIVAL AT SANDWICH ISLANDS.—The Cleveland Ohio Observer of Oct. 16, contains the following letter from a Female Missionary:—

Honolulu, March 2, 1838.

DEAR BROTHER AND SISTER TAYLOR.—My husband has reserved a part of this sheet, that I may write you a few lines; and I perceive by his closing sentence that he wishes me to tell you something about the revival. Even since our last general church meeting, the church members at some of the stations on Hawaii have been unusually prayerful; protracted meetings have been held, and thousands, perhaps, have been converted—we cannot, of course, say how many. Over six hundred have been admitted to the communion at Waimea; four hundred at Hilo; and a great number will probably be admitted at both of those places, at the next communion season. The revival has embraced both sexes, of all ages, from ten years old up to the aged grandmother who had spent her earlier years in worshipping idols and stones. Our latest dates from both those stations say that the work is still advancing with unusual fidelity, and numbers are daily converted. The schools have shared largely in the blessing. Eight of the little boys in the boarding school have been admitted to the church, and their teacher hopes that most of the remaining thirty are Christians. Nor has the revival been confined to the island of Hawaii. Almost all the stations have been visited in mercy. Between eighty and ninety are propounded for admission to our church at Honolulu on the next Sabbath, and a thousand profess to be converted. The brethren on Maui and Kauai write very encouragingly from both those islands. The King is still impatient, and attached to his pleasures; but most of the high chiefs are professors of religion. There appears to be a great thirst for knowledge among the people, and the schools are well attended; books in great demand, particularly the New Testament. We rejoice to hear that the Bible Society has made us a grant of dollars 3,000. Our Board feel the pressure of the hard times so much that they cannot send our usual supply of stores and clothing this spring; and but for the above-mentioned grant the press would have been nearly stopped. But we will trust in the Lord, for he has promised we shall want no good thing.

Yours, &c. ANN M. DIMOCK.

POWER OF DIVINE TRUTH UPON THE MIND OF A DEAF AND DUMB BOY.—We have rarely met a more touching illustration of the enlightened power and efficacy of scriptural instruction than the following:—

"A few years ago a clergyman paid a visit to a deaf and dumb institution in London, for the purpose of examining the children in their knowledge of divine truth. A little boy on the occasion was asked in writing, 'Who made the world?' He took up the chalk, and wrote under the question, 'In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth.' The clergyman then inquired in a similar manner, 'Why did Jesus Christ come into the world?' A smile of delight and gratitude rested on the countenance of the little fellow as he wrote, '— This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners.' A third question was then proposed, evidently adapted to call to mind the most precious feeling into exercise; 'Why were you born deaf and dumb, when you can hear and speak?' 'Never, said an eye-witness, 'shall I forget the look of resignation which sat on his countenance as he took up the chalk and wrote, 'Even so, Father, for so it seemeth good in thy sight.'—Christ. Watchman.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ROYAL SOCIETY.—The Anniversary Meeting of the Royal Society took place yesterday, Nov. 20, when the Marquis of Northampton was elected President; John William Lubbock, Esq. M.A., Treasurer; Peter Mark Roget, M.D., and Samuel Hunter Christie, Esq., Secretaries; Win. Henry Smyth, Esq. R.N., Foreign Secretary; H. R. H. the Duke of Sussex, K.G., Francis Baily, Esq., John George Children, Esq., John Frederick Daniell, Esq., C. G. B. Daubigny, M.D., Thomas Gal-Loe, Esq. M.A., Thomas Graham, Esq., Sir John F. W. Herschel, Bart., M.A., Francis Kierulff, Esq., George Bunsen, Esq., John Forbes Royle, M.D., Rev. Adam Sedgwick, M.A., Robert Bently Todd, M.D., Charles Wheatstone, Esq., Rev. Wm. Whewell, M.A., and Rev. Robert Willis, M.A., Members of the Council.—(The gentlemen whose names in the preceding list are printed in Italics, were not members of the last Council.)—The Copley medal was awarded to Mr. Faraday, Esq.; the Rumford medal to Prof. Forbes, and the Gold Medal to H. Fox Talbot, Esq. and Prof. Graham.—Athenaeum.

THE BENTARD.—Last week a female bird was shot on Cobden-common, near Wincobster. There are only three or four instances on record of this bird having been seen in this country. Pat.

IMPORTANT INVENTION IN CLOTH-MAKING.—At length woollen cloth has been produced from the stocking-frame, which has all the appearance of house-woven cloth; but its texture so fine that the threads cannot be discovered by the most powerful microscope. The process of making has caused it to shrink into a mass of conical wool, resembling the felt of a hat; but its elasticity was not destroyed. Many able mechanics speak highly of the invention, which is excellent for trousers, but too thick for coats. It is 8s. 6d. per yard, 10 per cent. cheaper than house-woven cloth of the same quality. We understand a clergyman of this town has had a whole suit made of this new cloth.—Nottingham Review.

WINTER.—A SIGAL OF SPRING visited Graysedon last week, and proved a good harvest to a petrebird of the pier. The hauls have brought 140 to 150 birds of a very superior quality. On Monday and Tuesday week some very fine fish were also taken. This is the first instance within memory that this fish has found its way so far up the river.—Pat.

APPROACH TO PRETEXTUAL MOTION.—It is stated in a recent French paper, (Le Reveu de Havre) that a native medicine has discovered means, and invented an apparatus, by which a lady's watch may be made to go for a whole year; a gentleman's watch for three years; an ordinary timepiece for five years; and a public clock for the period of two hundred and eighty years; all of them only requiring to be wound up once!—Ibid.

EXTENSIVE EXISTENCE OF SUPERSTITION.—In one day the public London journals contain two remarkable instances of the existence of superstition among the people. The one was described in evidence called respecting the suicide of Mrs. Lamb, where it was stated that the poor lady had been found dead by two girls who had come from London "to have their fortunes told." The next instance was given in the case of a child, who, having been severely hurt, was taken by her parents—not to a doctor for cure—but to a person reputed for his power in the healing art, by the aid of sorcery alone!—Ibid.

of the Mandingos, who was in London during the past summer, [Athenaeum, No. 565.] was exhibited, and the resemblance of his features to those of an African, was very striking. In connexion with the Mandingo people, the Secretary mentioned that the Rev. W. Fox, Wesleyan Missionary at McCarthy's Island, [Jan-jan-bur of the natives], the government station for liberated Africans, about 127 miles up the river Gambla, had lately made a journey to Baltimore, capital of the Bonni country, about 300 miles to the north-east of Jan-jan-bur, and had been received with great kindness by the king of the country, who had invited him to settle at his capital.—Athenaeum.

ARRIVAL OF AN AMERICAN DELEGATE.—F. C. Delatun, Esq., a distinguished philanthropist, and warm friend of the temperance cause, has arrived from New York by the Great Western. He is chairman of the New York State Temperance Society, and has, ever since the dawn of temperance in America, been a fearless, uncompromising, and successful advocate of the cause; having distinguished himself no less by his unwearied labours, than by his liberal personal sacrifices in its behalf. A short time ago, when the society with which he stands connected was embarrassed to a very considerable extent, he undertook to collect, and succeeded in obtaining $5000; while, at the same time, he gave, out of his own purse, a sum nearly equal to half that amount. It is the intention of this gentleman, in connexion with R. U. White, Esq., of Dublin, J. Dundon, Esq., of the Glen, near Greenock, Mr. Joseph Liverey, of Preston, and others, to make a six months' tour of England, for the purpose of gathering statistical facts and information connected with this great national question; and at the same time to make a grand effort towards concentrating the influence of all parts of the country into one common focus, for the purpose of bringing the importance and vastness of this subject more prominently before all classes of the community, by disseminating, through the agency of the press, a flood of light upon the mighty evil which afflicts our land.—Leeds of Man Temperance Guardian.

AQUA VITÆ AQUA MORTIS.—Dr. Ure, in his Dictionary of Arts and Manufactures, gives the following definition of aqua vite, the name very absurdly given to alcohol, when used as an intoxicating beverage:—“It has been the aqua mortis to thousands of the human race, and will, probably, ere long, destroy all the native tribes of North America and Australia.”—Christ. Adv.

MR JAMES ANDERSON'S STRAITS-COAST is finished, and will start for Butterworth for this city in a fortnight, travelling at seven miles an hour.—Linrick Paper.

PRISON DISCIPLINE.—We have seen a great many funny suggestions, but the following novel notion, which a daily paper gives as from a “Sussex paper,” and with the heading “Improved Prison Discipline,” does really appear to carry joking rather too far:—“At the quarter sessions for the eastern district of Sussex, last week, a conversation took place relative to a re-arrangement of the previous sessions, that every prisoner should be allowed to wear a linen mask, to be provided by the gaoler. Mr. Doughton opposed the plan, which he thought would take away from punishment one of the greatest stings, and throw over the proceeding an air of ridicule which would turn the whole into burlesque. Mr. Haslewood was in favour of the mask; for many a prisoner who had formed a determination to amend his life, would, if not allowed to cover his face, be liable to be recognised by some of his fellow-prisoners, in consequence of which his resolution of amendment would be rendered nugatory. Finally, it was agreed that application should be made to the Home Secretary, requesting that he would grant permission to use the linen mask in the goal.”—Christ. Adv.

A PRINCELY PRESENT.—We learn from the Courier des Etats Unis, that the Prince de Joinville, in grateful remembrance of the hospitable attentions which he received from Col. de Russy, while at West Point, has sent to the Colonel a costly suit box of gold, encased with diamonds. This handsome present was transmitted to Col. De Russy through the hands of Monsieur de Salgny, Secretary of the French Legation, who has himself received from the Prince a superb dressing case of plate, containing one hundred pieces.—N. Y. Com. Adv.

NICHOLAS BINDER has made a purchase of 50,000 splendid trees of the Morus Mulianalis, or Chinese Mulberry, and intends forming a most extensive establishment, comprising cooperages for the vases, and a manufactory for reeling and weaving silk fabrics.—Christ. Watch.

FAIR PROSPECTS FOR MASSACHUSETTS AND TENNESSEE.—These two States have now, by the free vote of the people, banished from their borders the cure retail of spirituous liquors, as except by the apothecary as a common medicine. This has been done, not by any political party or sectarian bigotry, but by men of all parties and all sects; not by a small majority, but by a large one; and in the former State, by the voice of more than two-thirds of her senators and representatives in general court assembled. In both States it has been done on the ground that the article is neither beneficial nor useful, and that the traffic brings upon the community an amount of pauperism, crime, and wretchedness, not to be borne. There is no reason to suppose, therefore, that it will ever be restored, but that henceforth, these States will move onward without a licensed tavern or dram-shop; and, so far as the laws are executed, without the ordinary sale in any place of spirituous spirits as a beverage. Let us glance at a few of the probable results.

1. A drunkard in those States will hereafter be a rare spectacle.
2. Most of the present race of drunkards will be reformed, and such as continue drunkards, will continue so on wine, beer and cider, and by getting ardent spirits from unprincipled apothecaries and physicians, as a medicine; but the most will retrace into other States.
3. The taverns and public houses will assume a new aspect, be neat, and have comfortable accommodations for travellers, more like private than public houses; no drunkards hanging around them; no filthy bar-rooms filled with obscene, profane rabble; no bloated, swaggering bar-keeper for the host; no noise at midnight disturbing repose.
4. In the seaports of the one, and the river towns of the other, there will be no land-sharks to catch the poor sailors and boatmen. Sailor's boarding-houses and lodging-places will be places of safety, from which the poor seaman may go out unharmed, with all that is his, to his own dear home, or to his path on the mighty waters.
5. With destruction of dram-selling, in ports and harbours, will, in a great measure, cease gambling, debauchery, fighting, robbery, manslaughter, and the like.
6. More than three-fourths of the crimes and pauperism of those States may cease, and more than three-fourths of the taxation occasioned by those evils, be in future dispensed with.
7. The frequency of diseases may be greatly lessened, and future epidemics, like the cholera, may be expected to be far less destructive.
8. The number of insane will be much less than in former years. No slaves will be shipped and murdered, and no children bruised and maimed by fathers, and husbands made fiends by rum.
9. Lunatickness, stages, ships, and all kinds of violent machinery, may be managed with a steadiness and caution that will secure safety to travellers, owners, and all engaged in and about them.
10. The rising generation will come up healthy and vigorous, without bodily, mental, or moral deterioration from strong drink.
11. The war spirit will subside, and military days will be comparatively harmless to the community, while by the prevalence of temperance the public arm will be mightily strengthened.
12. Education will be far more widely diffused. In no town will there be, as formerly, ten or a dozen families made too poor by the tavern and dram-shop to clothe their children and send them to school.
13. Public morals will everywhere be improved; the efficiency of the gospel be augmented; the house of God increasingly honored; and the multitudes of souls who, had the sale of spirituous liquor not been suppressed, might have travelled through woe numberless to the drunkard's grave, may be trained for the endless joys of heaven.—Jour. Am. Tem. Un.

CHINA.—The relations of England and China have reached a crisis which will demand all the wisdom and nerve of the British Cabinet. It will depend upon the decision which may now be formed, whether our future intercourse with China shall be placed upon a secure and equitable footing, or be left at the mercy of a rampant barbarian power. The unexpected proceedings of the Imperial Commissioner may be considered as having erased the Opium trade. No merchant, possessed of ordinary prudence, can justify to himself, or his constituents, the outlay of any further capital in so forlorn an enterprise. So far as the trade itself is concerned, we are much inclined to applaud the decision of character manifested by the Emperor's representative. By a sharp, though unjust, remedy, he has extinguished a demoralizing traffic, and saved the empire from enormous evil. But the means by which this result has been attained, are of a nature which even the barbarian judgment of the Chinese cannot extenuate. At no former period, under all the successive stoppages of our trade, have they afforded us any just cause for the employment of force; and the fact that Opium was smuggled into the empire, under the British flag, without any attempt on the part of "our Nation's Chief," as the Chinese call him, to prevent it, deprived our remonstrances of all moral force. But the recent transactions at Canton have entirely changed the aspect of affairs. That they had a right to confiscate all the contraband Opium found in Chinese waters, and to punish the smugglers, European or Native, according to the laws of the empire, will readily be conceded. But nothing whatever can justify the outrages to which the British Representative has now been subjected. There are some who censure him for the assistance he officially afforded the Chinese authorities, some months since, in the suppression of the trade; and who are ready to attribute the boldness of the Commissioner to his concessions. But there is every reason to believe, that the determination of the Peking Cabinet to root out the trade, at all hazards, was of an earlier date than those concessions, and would have been carried into effect if they had never been made. We think, on the contrary, that the aid he afforded the Chinese, in their legitimate efforts to suppress the trade, is the most happy circumstance which could have happened. It takes away even the shadow of excuse from the Chinese authorities, for their atrocious conduct towards one whose public capacity they had acknowledged, and of whose public authority they had already availed themselves. The previous conduct of Capt. Elliott gives vast strength to our claim for redress. He has been censured, again, for proceeding to Canton. But it was impossible for him to have foreseen the violence which, for the first time during our long intercourse with the Chinese, has been exercised towards our Superintendent. He might naturally judge that, in the difficulties which had arisen, his post was Canton. If he had continued at Amoy, while British subjects were placed under restraint, his absence would not have passed without censure; and it would have been asked, why he did not proceed to the scene of danger, and interpose the sacredness of his person between them and the Chinese authorities.

It is difficult in these circumstances to deny, that a regard for our character, and for our interests, both present and prospective, not only in China but in India, requires that we should demand ample indemnity for the past, and security for the future; and that this demand should be equitably, but firmly enforced, by the means at our command. If, instead of a well supported remonstrance, we submit calmly to this national insult, it will be constantly repeated, and our commercial connections will be exposed to perpetual interruptions. All violence towards our Representative has hitherto been avoided; and the Chinese, notwithstanding the insolence of their proclamations, have treated us with a certain degree of respect, and made up differences by a compromise. They have now put our national power and character to the test, by an act of unjust violence to the acknowledged Superintendent of British affairs in China. By submission, we shall forfeit all esteem in the eyes, both of the people and the Government, and there will be no end to Chinese insolence and aggression. If a single chest of Opium should hereafter be found to have been smuggled, either in a British or foreign bottom, we shall be held answerable for it; our trade will be immediately stopped; our merchants placed in confinement, and our Representative threatened with starvation. It will be impossible to prevent the surreptitious entry of Opium into China, by any power we can exert; and hence the persons and the interests of British subjects will ever be exposed to the wanton excesses of the Chinese. If, however, they are taught, by experience, that injustice to England will expose their maritime cities to destruction, and all the sea-borne trade of the empire to confiscation, we may expect fair and honourable treatment; but we fear, in no other case.

If an ill-timed submission should mark our proceedings, it is not merely the interests of our China trade which will suffer; the consequences will stretch into Hindoostan. The recent events will be reported with exaggeration at the Court of Nepal. Tharravuldee will not long remain ignorant of our degradation. If he was able to obtain a translation of the letter which appeared in the Friend of India from Mr. —; if, through the infidelity of our establishments, he was put in possession of a Minute of Council, he will speedily hear of the unfortunate position we occupy in China. If the rumour of a rupture between the English and Persians has inflated Nepal and Burmah with the desire to break with us, what aggression to our disadvantage will not be produced at those Courts, when the tale is recited of the humiliation to which we have been obliged to submit, from a much more proximate authority, from the Lord Paramount of Eastern Asia, whose supremacy is acknowledged and felt by both these States? The chance of our being able to remain at peace with them, under these circumstances, will be rendered more than ever uncertain.

The vital interests of the British empire in the East, are now in the hands of the British Ministry at home, whose firmness, unhappily, the public has had too much reason to question. It is greatly to be feared, that in the view they may take of this affair, they will be influenced, rather by the domestic, than the imperial interests of England: and that they will rather patch up the matter, and cut a long train of embarrassments on their successors, than put in jeopardy the tea duties for a twelvemonth. If, however, the Ministry could be induced to look at the question in all its bearings; if the revenue arising from tea could be dispensed with for a brief period; if the upper and middling ranks of society could be put on a short allowance of ten for a while, without a revolution, here is a golden opportunity for giving the Chinese a lesson, which will tend to smoothe the intercourse of the European family with them for a quarter of a century to come. The Chinese, like all bullies, are cowards. We need not land a single soldier, or even invest a single clipper with letters of marque. A small naval force will give us at once the command of the China seas, and the interruption of all intercourse between the maritime provinces of the empire; and the detention of all Chinese property found on the high seas, would shake the Tartar throne, and render the Chinese as humble as they are now arrogant. It is possible that in case of a rupture, the Emperor may order two hundred thousand troops to enter Bengal, and drive us into the sea. He has assurance enough for such a step. In the Nepalese war, he did issue such a mandate, and the troops were put in motion; but, unfortunately, it was countermanded before we could meet them in the field. If the attempt should be repeated, Nepal and Burmah would immediately be on our hands; they would follow the footsteps of the Lord Paramount, and we might see the Emperor of China marshalling the forces of the East against us. Such a contingency is not altogether improbable, but the issue of the contest cannot be doubtful.

There remains to be considered the pounds, shillings and pence question. Will the British Government at home consider itself bound, by the promise made by Capt. Elliott, when he had ceased to be a free agent? Will the Ministry venture to ask Parliament for two millions to reimburse the smugglers; and will the people of England submit to pay it? We concur with both our morning contemporaries in thinking not. Considering all the circumstances of the case; the contraband nature of the traffic; the repeated prohibitions of the Chinese Government; the loud warnings which have been given the merchants within the last six months; and the condition to which this contraband trade had reduced our Representative, we think the Ministry will bick a little will not argue to reject the guarantee. As to commanding payment of the Company, the merchants may as well demand it of the Insurance Offices. The sooner those engaged in this trade can make up their minds to pocket the loss occasioned by this catastrophe, the better for their repose.

COOLY EXPORTATION.—The Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons, on Transportation, furnishes some valuable information respecting the introduction of our Hill Coolies into New South Wales. It is such as to authorize the conclusion, that the Colonists generally are averse to the measure, and that the Home Government will certainly prevent it. The opinion of the Committee is contained in a single paragraph: but it is one of great force of argument. "A proposal has been made," say the Committee, "by some of the Colonists of New South Wales, to import Hindoos, as indentured apprentices, who are to be sent back to Hindostan at the expiration of their period of indenture. This scheme has been most justly objected to by the Government, as one of the innumerable descriptions of slavery to which, under various appellations, designed to conceal its nature, Colonists have had recourse when suffering under the pressure of a want of labour. If the Hindoos should return to their native land, this expedient for furnishing labour must be of a most temporary nature, merely providing the Colonists with a few thousand labourers for a few years, and totally inadequate to that extension of industry, of which New South Wales is envious; on the other hand, if the Hindoos remain and multiply in that colony, they will form, at all events, a separate, probably, a slave caste: and your Committee can hardly believe that any statesman, who possesses any knowledge of the social and political difficulties which arise from a slave caste in the southern states of America, would consent to curse Australia with a similar evil."

Australia looks forward to the possession of a representative constitution, and to national independence: and it is easy to foresee the state of degradation and oppression to which a coloured population would, in such circumstances, be reduced by the European majority. Political rights would be denied them from the beginning, or, as in America, be wrested from them after they had been acknowledged. But it is unnecessary to speak of distant and conjectural evils. There are enough to be met at the very outset. In the Appendix to the Report of the Committee, is a Report of a Committee, appointed by the New South Wales Government in the middle of 1837, together with the evidence taken by it, on the importation of Coolies from India. The Colonial Committee were induced to recommend that a bounty of £6 should be given for every Cooly from Bengal, embarked on or before the 31st December, 1838; but they recommend the measure "only as an immediate and temporary relief to the distresses of the settlers;" and the Governor, Sir Richard Bourke, in his despatch on the subject, observes, "the Report does not appear to me such as to encourage any prospect of advantage from the introduction of these persons, sufficient to compensate the expense and inconvenience. The attempt would I fear, prove a sacrifice of permanent advantage to temporary expediency." The witnesses examined by this Committee, were Messrs. J. Mackay, T. P. Biese, J. G. Collins, J. Revell, Daniel Mackellar, Robert Scott, Charles Bury, J. R. Mayo, and J. B. Howard. Of these, Messrs. Mackay and Mayo were the most important, and the most deeply interested in the scheme: under examination; and, generally speaking, their testimony appears to have been given with both ability and candour. They admit that the Hill Coolies are prone to drinking, and easily corrupted. Other witnesses assert, with equal truth, that it is impossible to employ them, in conjunction with European servants, without their being ill used: and these are the persons, then, who are recommended to be sent amongst the convict servants of New South Wales: a set of beings the most vicious and reckless that anywhere pollute the earth. The promoters of the scheme have the humanity to propose, that the Coolies should be accompanied by an equal number of women: but Mr. Berry, a member of the Legislative Council, says he fears, "in the case of married people, that it would be found impossible to prevent improper intercourse between their women and the convict portion of the labourers on the estate." Indeed, it is plain that to send our poor Coolies to Australia, is willy to consign them to the lowest depths of demoralization, and to expose them to cruelty and violence, there is no saying how atrocious. They would quickly become both the victims and the instruments of increasing depravity; which is already sufficiently horrible.

It has been argued, that Coolies taken to New South Wales would be in a far better condition than such as were destined for the Mauritius or the West Indies, because they would not be exposed to the Colonial usages and habits, degrading and merciless, which have been engendered, and become inveterate by the long reign of slavery. But if they would enjoy exemption from these, it is evident there are evils as the constitution and habits of our convict colonies quite as hostile to their well-being. But from what we have stated, there appears to be no probability that we shall continue to be harassed by attempts to maintain a New South Wales branch of the Cooly trade. It is not a scheme that enjoys favour in the colony; and it will not be sanctioned by the Government. Perhaps the West India branch of the trade may likewise be left, without much concern, to the influence of opinion in England, and of the difficulty and expense attending so distant a transportation. From intelligence which we published amongst our extracts from the English papers a few weeks ago, it appears that our Coolies in the West Indies have been subjected to ill treatment, which will secure the interference of England on their behalf, and have exhibited a sturdiness under ill-usage, which is disagreeable to men who have been accustomed to the gentleness of negro submission. The Coolies begin, we imagine, to stand at a discount there.

But we cannot obtain similar comfort respecting the trade to the Mauritius, and Bourbon. There the Coolies have been of the greatest advantage to the Colonists, by enabling them to enlarge their sugar manufacture to an amazing extent. Nothing but an increase of Coolies is wanted, to procure them a still further degree of prosperity; and this only desideratum they will, of course, use all possible means to obtain. And, whether it be from its position, or from its more recent incorporation with the British empire, it is certain, that, somehow, the Mauritius escapes the notice and control of England much more than the West India Islands. The House Government does not seem so easily to lay its hand upon this Island, so as to re-train its offences against humanity; and we have, therefore, less to hope from English interference. At the same time the traffic between India and the Mauritius is so great, and its course so easy, that multiplied facilities are enjoyed for carrying on the Cooly importation.

A correspondent has suggested to us, in a private letter, the expediency of entrusting to the Colonial Governments the task of preventing the importation of Coolies into their respective islands. But on those governments little reliance can be placed for the performance of such a duty. In many cases they find it difficult to contend against the will of the Colonists; and, especially, when, as in the Mauritius, the prosperity of the Colony is manifestly concerned. If they maintain an opposition to the colonial purpose, it is faint and ineffective. In this way, if we recollect right, an importation of slaves into the Mauritius, to the extent of many thousands, was effected, whilst the government of the Island, as a matter of course, was taking part in the general system of England, in prohibiting and repressing the slave trade. We should fear a similar result with the trade in Coolies. Yet, if honestly looked to, a registration of the imported Coolies would be of great importance.

Our correspondent offers another suggestion, which seems to us highly worthy of attention. The people of the Hills, he says, whence the Coolies are drawn, are accustomed to assemble in vast numbers at a few annual fairs, at which all information affecting their interests becomes universally known, and measures are determined on which meet with general concurrence. If, therefore, cases of aggravated oppression and cruelty towards the Coolies, at the Mauritius, or elsewhere, can be ascertained, and a few who have suffered most severely be brought off, and sent to tell their tale at the great assemblies of their tribes, the supply of farther victims will effectually be cut off. We believe it would.

EUROPEAN INTELLIGENCE.—The intelligence which the Mail has unexpectedly brought us to the close of March, though important, is not decisive. The great question of domestic policy, the Corn Laws, has been thrown overboard by the Lords, with contempt; in the Commons, it was honoured with a debate of five nights, and then dismissed, by an overwhelming majority of a hundred and forty. This is not the way in which the cry for bread, on the part of the working classes, can be safely treated by those who enjoy the cream of their labour. The question, however, can be viewed only as having been postponed. A re-action must be expected, if not in the present session, certainly at no distant period. Of all civilized countries, England presents the example of the most fearful extremes of wealth and poverty; and when those extremes shall meet in hostile collision, the result will be such as no lover of his country can allow himself to contemplate. The immediate cause of this demand for cheap corn, is the deficiency of the last harvest; and it is possible that a full crop in the present season may abate the popular cry. But there are causes of a more permanent character in operation, which must sooner or later constrain the landlords to come down in their rents. Our manufacturing superiority is annually becoming more precarious. The nations of Europe are transplanting our machinery, and workmen, and skill to their own soils, and are preparing to compete with us in every market in the world. It will be impossible for us to maintain our position, unless the scale of living can be reduced at home. If the Corn Laws be maintained in all their present severity, it is easy to foresee that our manufactures must gradually decay, and that a large population must be exposed to the miseries of want, and be prepared to attempt the most violent changes. Already has this effect been partially visible. The manufacturers of Manchester have been obliged to put their people upon short work, and Government has been obliged to send down troops to anticipate disturbances. When John Bull has little to do, and little to eat, it is not surprising that he should turn to manufacturing pickers. The unwise policy of the landlords, who are paramount in both Houses, must eventually recoil upon their own heads. Their opposition to the wishes of the people; their determination not to slacken the screw, even by a single turn, must tend to foster a spirit of discontent, the outbreak of which will shake the social system of England to its centre. It is much to be doubted, whether the reduction of the price of corn one-fourth, and the consequent reduction of rents in the same ratio, would be any real loss to the landlords; whether the lowering of the standard of corn would not produce a general reduction in all other articles; and whether the reduced incomes of the gentry would not go as far in the purchase of comforts, and even luxuries, as their enormous revenues now do.

The affairs of Canada appear to be in a quiescent state. The Ministry continue to assure the Commons, that the work of the gibbet is at an end; and yet every fresh arrival from America brings accounts of fresh executions. Lord Durham, and his opponent, Lord Brougham, have shaken hands, it is said, through a mutual dread of each other. Of the amusement which the people of England had promised themselves, from the mutual collision of these hungry spirits, they have been grievously disappointed; and the debates in the Lords have hitherto been tame, and without interest. The Ministry is manufacturing a new constitution for Canada, which is to attach that colony, by the bond of an eternal obligation, to England. While our family disputes with Canada are thus in a train of accommodation, we are threatened with a war with America. The boundary question, which has been kept open for half a century, and which the mediation of Holland was unable to settle, has begun to assume a serious aspect. The Governor of Maine very recently sent an agent, with a military force, to take possession of the disputed territory; and the Governor of New Brunswick, opposing force to force, has captured the agent. The Auverniens repaid the compliment, by seizing upon one of our functionaries; and, unless there be great wisdom and moderation on both sides, the two countries, which, of all others, are most necessary to each other, will be involved in a bloody contest. The people of Maine breathe nothing but war; and even the American Senate has passed a vote of credit to raise supplies for the contingency of a rupture. The disputed territory is scarcely worth the ten-thousandth part of the sum which a war will cost both countries. America has more undisturbed land than she can people in two centuries. In New Holland, England has as much unoccupied ground, as will require three centuries to colonize; and yet these two countries are on the eve of a war about a strip of land of the smallest comparative value; and, strange to say, they still claim to be considered as the most civilized people on earth.

Indian affairs continue to occupy the attention of the Parliament, more especially of the Upper House; which, having thrown out the people's petitions for food, has more leisure to attend to affairs at a distance. As usual, the debates indicate too plainly, that the interest which has been excited in Indian matters, arises from the violence of party malignity, and from no anxiety for the welfare of this poor country. And Lord Auckland been a Conservative, he might have made conquests up to the Caspian, and the Lords would have passed a vote of thanks. We rejoice, however, to find, that the Ministry are fully alive to the dangers which threaten the empire, and are hastening the embarkment and embarkation of European troops. Of the designs of Russia, in reference to the East, nothing farther has been developed; but the arrival of Dr. McNeill in England, and the consequent suspension of all friendly relations with the Shah of Persia, must lead to an early determination of the question, whether we are at peace or at war with that power. It is impossible that matters can rest in their present anomalous position. We have taken possession of Karak; our Minister has quitted the Court of Persia; and the Envoy, who was accredited to St. James's, lingers at Vienna; yet it would be difficult to pronounce that we are actually at war with Persia.

The dispute between Holland and Belgium, which the five great powers in Europe have now been employed for nine years in composing, and which has been distinguished by a greater number of protocols than any transaction of twenty times its importance, appears at length to be on the eve of a final termination. Both parties have accepted the terms dictated by the "powers."

France appears to be in a very unsettled state. Louis Phillip is determined, not only to reign, but to govern; and the French Ministry are determined to have a more distinct voice than has hitherto been granted to them, in the direction of public measures. The new Chamber of Deputies is more refractory than the last; and at the date of the latest accounts, the King was not only without a Ministry, but with less prospect than ever of being able to form one. M. Thiers, who was to have taken the lead in the new Ministry, discovered, just before accepting office, that the conditions which the King intended to impose, were such as he could not act upon. The report of Louis Phillip's assassination, which was current before the arrival of the Mail, is, of course, incorrect.

ENGLAND: GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF ACTION.—"Ah! said Coleridge, "I look in vain for some wise and vigorous man to sound the word DEITY in the ears of this generation."

And the complaint was worthy of so profound an observer of human conduct. Our countrymen of the present day cannot be accused of tameness or inactivity. They are every where in a ferment and agitation on all subjects, whether secular or spiritual; and are prompt in action as well as keen in discussion. But a wear observation of their proceedings is far from raising one's good opinion either of the state of a nation, or of the great human family of which they are so advanced a portion. On the contrary, it is easy to conceive of a man like Coleridge, retiring from their society, to ply cool down by the reflection, that their manifestations of public virtue and piety are so equivocal, that it may be questioned whether they are not the produce of selfishness and vice; not that, notwithstanding, there is nothing in the world better. Deduct from all the good attempted in England, what is tainted by selfishness, ostentation and passion; and a lamentably small remainder will be left behind, as the fruit of considerations and benevolent principles.

The influence of selfishness is as old as the world; and its modern peculiarities are scarcely worthy of remark. Nor have we been much surprised by the prevalence of ostentation. It is one of the most singular, but, perhaps, least mischievous displays of it we now frequently see, that by a sort of auction bidding in pecuniary contributions, four or five thousand pounds may be collected for charitable or religious purposes, through vain glorious rivalry, where it would have been difficult to raise as many hundred, or it may be even tens, by the simple influence of principle. The most magnificent show off yet attempted in this line, has just occurred amongst the Wesleyan Methodists; was, having devoted to observance of a Centenary festival, commemorative of the origin of their body, have stimulated each other on to a collection, which, in a few weeks, rose to the sum of £150,000. It is considered as the greatest of true and honest piety; but we confess to a prejudice in favour of the piety that waits after a different fashion.

But, utter as it is, passion that speaks to be the master motive of our countrymen, in all their great efforts for the advancement of what is good. Nothing induces the English people better than a warfare of good fights. Show them an enemy to hate, and slave, and buffer, and they will rally about you with their whole heart, and go any length in maintaining your cause. Something there must be, to be in a passion about; and this is the secret of the admitted axiom, that abstract reasoning goes for nothing with an English audience. It was in this way, the overwhelming power of the masses of the English population was brought to bear upon slavery, so as to accomplish the entire emancipation of the negroes. The planters were a set of men who had supplied their opponents with every thing that could be wanted for vituperation and abhorrence; and good use was made of the materials. All England was in a rage, and would listen to no apology or palliation. They would have the negroes freed from the debt,—at least to a considerable measure,—that they might see his master brought down to it. Hence scornful repunctures and withering denunciations were the most powerful, and best used weapons of emancipation eloquence; and often they told with fearful effect. Good was done; justice was obtained for the oppressed and wronged; and prospects of endless blessing were opened up to the African race; but it was with a large admixture of weakness and evil.

So in the various operations of religious philanthropy, people take sides, and make their choice of certain objects, or kinds of instrumentality, to which there are antagonists or rivals; and the zeal they show for the object of their choice will be very much regulated by the degree of contempt, or spite, or alarm which its opponent can be made to arouse in their minds. In this way, the different religious denominations seek each the advancement of their own polity, according to the intensity of their antipathy to the others. The Churchman abominates the voluntary principle, as the very essence of change and commotion; and to prove its inefficiency for good, and the superiority of the compulsory system, he makes a voluntary of himself, profusely bestowing his wealth and influence, in order to infuse vigour into the church, and power to effect what dissent dares not attempt. And in like manner the Dissenter, to show the mischiefs and the worldliness of the system which is his detestation, apparently in distrust of that very power of truth, reliance on which should be the great distinction of his profession, sets about schemes of secular combination, and the army of numbers, wealth and political influence, and so creates a sort of voluntary popular establishment with many of the vicious influences and tendencies of the Parliamentary one. On either side, zeal is too often propertioned to the prejudice and ill will that can be evoked. The least amiable, and worst principle, make the best partisans.

The various religious societies are in this way of great help to each other. Who can estimate how much the Bible Society and the Tract Society owe to the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge; or how much it owes to them? For their obligations are doubtless reciprocal. The Church Missionary Society stands in the same beneficial relation to the Incorporated Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. The National Schools, and the British and Foreign Schools, are mutually helpful by the same law of sympathies; and now the Central Society of Education has come in to give farther assistance to them both. Similar parallelisms, or rather concurrences, might be traced throughout the remaining host of religious and philanthropic Societies. Education is pitted against eragation; Home Missions against Foreign; and the missions and institutions of one denomination, against those of another, in a boundless world of angry, envious, malignant charity and benevolence!

This discreditable state of things is no peculiarity of the religious part of society. They have borrowed it from the sphere of political contention and ambition. And the scientific portion of the people have been guilty of the same folly. It is a characteristic of the nation in all its divisions. Its infection is universal.

It would be a great mistake, however, to conclude, that in England there is no genuine goodness, or that there is but little of it. It may often be discovered, even where its contaminations are the most remarkable. There are extensive regions in society, too, where there are but occasionally intrusions, and but occasionally derange the usual flow of piety and benevolence: and there are many individuals, and even many families and congregations, in which there is no little disturbance of the pure and holy reign of the law of God and man, as can well be expected in this unhappy world. Nothing can be sweeter than to find one's self lighting on these delicious spots, after being disappointed and fretted in the hurley burley of what may be called public or professional piety. We are inclined to think that these are not only a sort of sacred ark preserving the spirit of true religion for better times; but that even now their influence is working a happy change on the general mass. The evils at present to be deplored have nearly come to a height which cannot well be exceeded; and their overthrow is the natural change next to be expected. It cannot come ten years.

THE SUFFERINGS OF THE ARMY.—The Agra Ukbar taunts us with indifference to the sufferings of the brave men now employed beyond the Indus, because we offered a few strictures a month ago, on the tone of complaint which the letters from the Army breathed. We are anxious to set ourselves right with the public. The Ukbar appears to have forgotten, that at the period when our remarks were written, intelligence had not reached Calcutta of the extraordinary privations to which the ARMY OF THE INDUS had been exposed. It had not, at the date to which our advice extended, experienced any thing beyond the ordinary difficulties of a march; and though grumbling in, in all circumstances, a national privilege, yet the groans of the officers which were breathed forth from time to time in the public journals, appeared in that early stage of the march to be so much louder than the accession called for, that our observations could in no sense have been considered ungenerous. The subsequent difficulties to which the troops have been exposed, have our deepest sympathy. We trust they will not be allowed to sink into obduracy, without a searching enquiry into their cause. We have it on the authority of a Simlah Correspondent, that Lord Auckland is deeply affected with the sufferings of the troops; and that if money could procure them relief, no sum would be grudged. We have every reason to believe, that no precaution against distress, which the Governor General could have adopted has been omitted; and we believe the community generally, excepts the Civil Head of the Empire from all censure. Yet it is a fact, that the Army is in the field in a state of the most deplorable debilitation; that it has suffered infinitely more from the neglect of its friends than it could have done from the attacks of its enemies. When the Court of Directors solicited Sir Henry Fane to continue in the command of the Army, they expected that the expedition would have enjoyed the continual benefit of his directing mind, and his controlling authority. They never could have foreseen, that the divisions of the Army would have fallen into such dire confusion, and have been reduced, as it regarded the common necessities of life, to a state of the most heart-rending distress. Great blame attaches itself to some part or other; and it well becomes those who have taken the affairs of India under their protection at home, to move for an enquiry into the causes of these disasters. Let Lord Aberdeen and Lord Brougham suspend, for a while, their attacks on Lord Auckland's policy, and turn to the sufferings of the army. In common with the rest of the community, we have heard that a difference between the Civil and Military authorities has led the Commander-in-Chief to take up his residence at the Mubalsh-bur Hills; and that the starvation of our Indian Army is to be ascribed to embarrassments arising from the want of a supreme directing mind, and must, therefore, be ascribed to those differences. These reports may be true, or they may be false; the distress of the Army is but too true. We affirm, therefore, that there is the strongest ground for a Parliamentary enquiry into the cause of those differences; and we hope the Indian patriots in both Houses, will not allow party politics to interfere with the duty of bringing this subject prominently forward.

CONVICT RATIONS.—Since our observations on this subject were published last week, we have had an opportunity of seeing the recent order of the Bengal Government respecting it; and it seems but fair we should lay its principal paragraphs before our readers, that they may judge whether our remarks were unduly severe or not. After some preliminary matter, the order states that the Deputy Governor may on reason why the plan of rations, the advantages of which are indisputable, should not be followed out in all the jails under the Bengal Presidency. It then proceeds thus:

"It is proper, therefore, in the first place, that year—" of quantity should be fixed, for regulating the daily supply of food which is necessary for keeping prisoners in a healthy state; and after a careful revision and examination of the returns which have been submitted, and recourse to other means of information, the Deputy Governor is pleased to determine, that one seer of rice, (the seer being 80 sica weight), one-and-a-half seer of wheat and one kacha of bullock, be the standard of the quantity of food to be given daily to each convict in the jails under this Government.

"In addition to this, one pie per work should, in the opinion of the Deputy Governor, be allowed to each man for shaving and washing. This allowance is granted to the prisoners in the jails of the North Western Provinces.

"It is not intended by this Resolution, that the rations of prisoners should invariably be confined to the abovementioned quantity and quality. On the contrary, it is desirable that a general discretion of considerable latitude should be accorded to the prisoners to take, in lieu of an entire seer of rice, such quantity of any other of the usual condiments, which may, without increase of expense, be procurable at any particular season, as they may see fit. The contract system for providing the food at a fixed rate all the year round, should be had recourse to, where it is found practicable. The contractor should engage to have a proportion of the usual condiments always at hand, which the prisoners may take, at the Bazar rate, or under local rules, instead of the whole or a portion of their allowance of rice; but due precaution must always be taken, that no money is carried into the jail.

"The inducing the prisoners to form into messes, appointing one man to cook for them, with any arrangements for employing such man within the jail, and the like, are measures of local detail, which must be left to the discretion of the district authorities.

"The Magistrate of Sylhet appears to have taken considerable pains with this subject; and it may be well to quote in this place, from a recent letter from that functionary, dated 7th February, 1859.

"At first two Brahmins and two Mussulman cooks were entertained to cook for the whole number of labouring convicts; but in consideration of the difficulty experienced in suiting the varying tastes of so many, with such limited agency, (to have increased it, would have been too expensive a measure,) I was induced to permit such convicts to divide themselves into gangs, and to select for themselves a cook from each."

"At the same time, in order to obviate inequality of punishment among this class of convicts, the cooks are formed into two working gangs, who return from labour only just so much earlier than their fellows, as is absolutely necessary for the preparation of the food, against the arrival of the latter. Thus, whereas the labour of those terminates at 5 P. M. daily, the cooking gangs are relieved from work at 3 P. M. and 4 P. M. respectively, according to the number of the party for which the cooks of each gang have to prepare food. The several parties assigned to those cooks, of the gang which return at 3 P. M. comprise, on an average, 250 convicts; those of the four o'clock gang, averaging only ten: that the duty of cooking is not, under this arrangement, considered to be any alleviation of the usual jail labour, is clear, from there being no competition for the office, but the contrary."

"It is not to be supposed, that the new system will be introduced into the different jails under this Presidency, without considerable obstacles being opposed by the prisoners themselves. His Honour the Deputy Governor trusts, however, that the cordial support and co-operation, which it is expected the local authorities will, in all cases, afford, will speedily put a stop to any resistance or discontent which may, in the first instance, show itself."

Now, according to our understanding of the case, this order establishes no system of rations at all. We conceive rations to mean certain fixed quantities of certain specified articles of consumption. But, by the order of His Honour, the convicts are to have what quantities of what articles they choose, to the extent of the value of a seer of rice a day. That is, they are to have a seer of rice to eat in part, and to barter with in part, according to their own fancy. There is not a trace here of the rigid discipline recommended by the Prison Discipline Committee. And can any one be so simple as to believe, that, because it is ordered that "due precaution must always be taken, that no money is carried into the Jail," therefore, no part of the seer of rice will be bartered for cash? Our prison guards are not of a temper, to be severe in preventing the convicts having the means of crowding their palms with ruin. They are more likely to volunteer their services, as the medium of communication in cash transactions, between the prisoners and the contractors. We are sorry to say our opinion of the order continues just the same as it was before. We do not think it chargeable with nigardliness; but it effects little reform of the old system.

HOSTILE DEMONSTRATION OF THE FRENCH IN THE SOUTH SEAS.—We are happy to observe the successful progress of the Colontha Christian Advocate; every number of which has presented some articles of real interest and importance. From the last number, we could have borrowed several papers with much satisfaction, had our space admitted. But we have been obliged to limit our selection to a single piece—a communication from Mr. Threlkeld, relating a singular act of warlike demonstration, on the part of the French Government. The paper will explain itself. We consider the transaction it relates, to be one of the most singular occurrences of the present day. The task of recounting the conduct of the Queen of Tahiti, and her advisers, with the principles of religious liberty, we leave to those who like it; but her right to exclude any foreigner she chose from her little kingdom, is indisputable. And if they resisted her officers, in enforcing that right, they had themselves to thank for any inconvenience or ignominy to which they thereby exposed themselves. On what ground an indemnity of 2,000 dollars could be claimed for them, we cannot receive. Much less can we understand, how any emissaries of the Catholic faith, usually so politic and wary, could fancy it would recommend their cause amongst the poor Islanders, to show them they had ships at war at their call, and the disposition to make them thunder, too, in the service of the gospel. They have far forgotten themselves; and it will be some time before their calling for fire,—not from heaven, it is true,—will pass from the recollection of the Tahitians. Did the King of the French calculate the consequences, before he resolved on affording the alternative of peace or war to the mighty Queen of Tahiti? Was he sure he could measure strength with her subtle Majesty? The truth, we suppose, must be, that favour is yet to be had at Rouen; and that Louis Philippe is very anxious to secure it.

THE PILGRIM TAX.—The last Mail has brought us a copy of the Despatch of the Court of Directors, ordering the final dissolution of the alliance between Government and the shrines of Idolatry, and the restoration of the various Temples in India to their legitimate guardians, the Native priesthood. The directions are too precise and peremptory to admit of any mistake; and this connection may now be considered as at an end. We congratulate the community, European and Native, on this fresh triumph of sound principle in the administration of this Empire.

We learn from the Englishman, that the Dharma Sabha of Calcutta, at its last sitting, determined to petition Government to entrust all Hindoo Temples, and the collection of the Pilgrim Tax, to its management; in fact, to erect that body into a sort of Ecclesiastical Commission. If this step were entrusted to an irresponsible body of Natives, it would be forthwith abused; and the embarrassments of Government would be indefinitely augmented. The idea is so absurd, that we need not waste a moment in combating it.

We have been favoured, by the Secretary of the Agricultural and Horticultural Society, with the Sixth Volume of its Transactions; but we have not been able to command leisure sufficient for that careful perusal of its contents, which their importance requires. We hope to be able to go fully into the subject next week.

We beg to assure a "Mafussil Missionary," that we will embrace the earliest opportunity of offering a few comments on the inaccuracies into which Mr. Thompson, with the most benevolent intentions imaginable, has been led, by his dependence on the assertions of others.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, MAY 16.

The Bombay papers just received, state that the conversion and baptism of a Parsee follower of Zoroaster, had occasioned an unusual sensation at that Presidency. The Darpon published there, while it deprecates the event, deprecates also the insolent tone in which the other Native papers have treated it; and remarks with much candour, that the Misalliances are not to blame, as they do not go to the honours of the Natives, but the Natives themselves in their Institutions. The circum-tance has led, as usual, to the withdrawal of some youths from the Secretary of the General Assembly. Such innovations must, for the present, be expected; but they are transient.—We are happy to learn, that C. Buttiger has been so greatly restored to health, as to be able to resume his political functions in Senegal.—A Correspondent of the Agnes Ekhar has brought to public notice, the abuses of the system of clerk travelling; and they certainly demand enquiry. A deposit, equal to half the charge, is required to be made, to meet any demerage. If this demerage be occasioned by the bearers themselves, or the public officers, the traveller is obliged to pay it. Nay, we know an occasion, in which a friend started from Calcutta, at the appointed moment, and reached Calcutta promptly at the hour; and was congratulated by the Post Master on his speedy arrival; when, in and about a month after, he was called on to pay twenty Rupees for demerage, which he was said to have incurred en route on the road.—The Control of the Stationary Department is conferred, by an order, in last evening's Gaz., on the Military Board; and the gentleman in immediate charge, who was designated by the unclassical title of Clerk, is henceforth to be addressed as Superintendent of Stationery. We are happy to find that the office, vacant by the death of Mr. Marriage, has been referred, by Lord Auckland, on Mr. Aubert, who had held the acting appointment for more than a year.—Mr. Ewart, of the house of Gillanders and Co., a gentleman universally esteemed, was killed by a fall from his horse yesterday. He was the brother of Mr. Ewart, late M. P. for Liverpool.—The paid-up subscriptions of the Steam Company, in Calcutta, amount to 2,40,000 rupees; this is the first instalment.

FRIDAY, MAY 17.

It is stated in letters received by the late opportunity, that several Clippers, laden with 4 or 5,000 chests of Opium, had slipped their cables, when it was surmised that His Excellency Lieut. Commissioner Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary, was about to exert his power in a very extraordinary style, and nearly the best of their way to Manila.—The Huckles states, that the arrival of the 21st Fusiliers, the junior officers of which are Second Lieutenants, may at some future time lead to a misunderstanding, on the question of rank, with the Second Lieutenants of the Company's Artillery and Engineers; and suggests that the question be brought to an early issue. All questions of rank are grave questions; and the Huckles's advice is sound. The adjustment of the rank of ambassadors was for two centuries a source of constant embarrassment at the civilized Courts in Europe, and the claims for precedence were sometimes carried to the verge of an open rupture between two states, till Lord Castlereagh, we believe, adopted the common sense principle, that the ambassador who had resided the longest time at any Court, should be presented first.—Capt. Benz has been appointed Political Agent at Kretsch, the first stage on emerging from the Bolan Pass, and has been instructed to raise an escort of 200 men.—The Sadrans has been put out of Commission, by an order of the Bombay Government.—The intelligence regarding the death of Rungjee Singh is premature. He is dying, as he has been, for several years, but is not dead. The Englishman has happily been misled by his correspondent; but we are confident that the report was very general. Our own correspondents in the West, speak of it as the same date as an event that had taken place.—The last accounts from the Army or the India are said to be favourable; but as no particulars are given, we receive the intelligence with mistrust, though nothing could be more gratifying than to hear that our gallant troops had obtained an ample supply of provisions.—Letters from Arracan of the 5th instant state, that Cholera, of a fatal description, had broken out in the north. Regiment, N. 1, in Arracan. Six or seven Europeans and the Native Doctor had fallen victims to it. On the morning of the 4th, at day break, a gale commenced in Akyah road, and three of the five vessels which were there, were driven on shore.—Rahm Noolahy Day, who died recently, has left substantial proofs of his non-remiss disposition. He has bequeathed two houses, valued at 16,000 Rs., the rents of which are to be distributed by the Colonial Society, among the poor in general. He has bequeathed a thousand Rupees each to the Widow's Fund and to the Orphan Fund. He has left a thousand Rupees to be scattered among the poor at each of the six most celebrated shrines, and the five thousand Rupees bequeathed to his wife, and on her death, to go to the poor of Brindaban, for the benefit of her soul.

SATURDAY, MAY 18.

To the agreeable surprise of the community, the March Mail, with intelligence from London to the 25th of that month, came yesterday. This is the quickest communication which has ever been witnessed between England and India. London news has been received in thirty-six days at Bombay, and in fifty-one in Calcutta. We regret, however, to learn, that the High Land, with the April Mails from Bombay, has been made to stem the S. W. Monsoon, which has set in unusually early, and has returned to Bombay. Our intercourse with England is thereby, therefore, to be interrupted for a longer period this year than in any previous year.—Our daily communications have given a bulletin in the Edinburgh, and succeeded all but one, which is a richly the last compliment they can pay to the English Mail. The only interesting item of domestic news, is that Mr. A. C. Kierman, an assistant in the office of Superintendent of Police, has been committing a series of breaches of the peace, by challenging some persons to a duel and has been twice daily bound down in heavy irons, to keep the peace.

SUNDAY, MAY 23.

The Western journals contradict the report, that Man Singh, the ferocious ruler of Jodhpore, has yielded to the remonstrances of Col. Sutcliffe.—The Colonel had intimated him, that unless he kept his word with the British Government, he would be deposed, and his son fixed in his place. Within three days after this event, the son was a corpse. It is believed, that after the rains, there will be some work for our soldiers in that direction.—The late intelligence from all quarters has depressed the money market. Four Per Cents. are down at a discount of six per cent., with a disposition to fall lower. Banks, both Bengal and Union, have been failing. It is supposed that, in consequence of the failure of the Opium revenue, Government will be obliged to open a loan; but surely the place to open it, both in a financial and a political point of view, is London, not Calcutta. Leadenhall Street should borrow, instead of drawing on an exhausted treasury.—The almost incredible fact is stated in the papers, that the Banks in Calcutta are still advancing on Opium, though at a very low price.—The Dehra Ganges states, that one of the sons of Dost Mohamed Khan, is in command of an army of 10,000 chosen troops at Delhi, and waiting the arrival of the Sikh troops, under Nour Nihal Singh, who is moving on Calcutta with a force of 15,000 men. The Khylar Pass has been already fortified, and defended by determined troops. Col. Wade accompanies the Sikh troops.—Sir John Ross, who pledged himself to come out in a steamer to India, by the Cape, has accepted the office of Consul at Stockholm.—A Mail is to be made up this day to be conveyed up the Persian Gulf to Bagdad, and thence to England.—Some important communications between Government and the Louisville's Society are published in this day's Englishman, to which we shall at some future day revert.

MONDAY, MAY 21.

A meeting has been held at Agra, on Steam Matters, when the Comprehensive Scheme was met with support only from one individual. Agra goes cordially with Bombay, in the plan of confining Steam Navigation to that port.—Letters from Delhi state, that treasure for the army is pouring in from all quarters; forty or fifty lakhs were in the treasury before the arrival of the last steamer at Allahabad.—The earthquake which was felt by some in Calcutta, extended, it appears, over many parts of the country. It was felt at Sylhet.—Letters from the Army or the India state, that a great change had been experienced since the army crossed the frontier, and entered the Candahar territories. The Candahar Chiefs are in despair; and there are rumours that intelligence has been received, that the troops had entered the city of Candahar. The members of the Civil Service, says a correspondent of the Englewood, are considerably surprised, and sadly disgusted at the appointment of Mr. Bignol, one of the Unconvenanted, to act as Secretary to the Revenue Board, during the absence of Mr. Currie. He threatens the Board with the loss of a month's pay.

LATEST EUROPEAN INTELLIGENCE.

We were unexpectedly gratified, on Friday last, by the reception of London intelligence to the 25th of March. On no occasion has news been received from our native land in so short a period. We regret to learn, however, that the High Lighthouse, after having expended nearly all her coal, without reaching Macaulay, has been obliged to put back to Bombay.

Nothing clearly indicative of a change of Ministry is announced in the papers now received. A vote of censure, on the Irish policy of the Ministers, was carried in the House of Lords, on the 18th of March, by a majority of sixty-four to fifty-eight. Lord John Russell, upon this, gave notice that the same question would be brought forward in the Commons, on the 11th April; intimating that the Ministry would resign, if they were beaten. On that day, therefore, we may expect to see the grand struggle of the Session for the ministerial seignior. Happily, the Indian Mail of April is to be made up on the 13th; and we may, therefore, expect, in the near opportunity, to obtain some idea of the probable issue of the trial.

Lord Esheridge has been created a Peer, and constituted Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. The appointment has given offence to the Conservatives; and a speech of His Lordship of last year, hostile to the Protestant establishment, was quoted to show his disqualification; but Lord Melbourne said he was perfectly satisfied with his principles.

The report of the Corn Laws, after a debate of five nights, has been negatived by a majority of 424 to 195. The delegates now consider that there is no remedy, but in an appeal to the people; an Anti-Corn Law League has, therefore, been set up, and extensively supported. Most of Her Majesty's Ministers in the Lower House supported a reformation of the duty. Lord Melbourne, in the Lords, supported the present system.

Many of the minor manufacturers, finding themselves unable to bear up against the existing pressure, have been estranged to their men upon short work. This calamity, resting as it does upon a short harvest, has filled the manufacturing districts with dissatisfaction. Troops and guns have been sent down to act upon an emergency.

Lady Flora Hastings, Lady of Honour to the Duchess of Devon, has been subjected to the most cruel treatment, on the part of some of the ladies attending on the Duchess. She was treated with a degree, which brought on an inflammation of the stomach. It was confidently reported to the Queen that she was pregnant; and she was to be delivered the royal progeny. Her brother instantly came up to town, and demanded an explanation. Lady Flora, for ever to extinguish the slander, allowed herself to be subjected to medical examination; and the effluence of two physicians gave the flattest contradiction to the reports.

The Thames Tunnel was rapidly advancing to its completion, only a few feet remaining to finish this noble undertaking.

After a discussion of fourteen days in the Belgian Chambers, the twenty-four articles have been accepted, and the differences between Holland and Belgium, which threatened the peace of Europe, have been settled.

In America, the Governor of Maine sent an armed force to occupy the disputed territory, and to drive away the British interlopers. Sir John Harvey, on this, captured the American Agent; and the Americans captured the English Agent; and the Americans prepared for a war. The President of the United States has at length ordered, that until this territory be adjudged to either party, Her Majesty's authorities will not seek to expel the troops of the State of Maine; and the State of Maine will voluntarily withdraw its troops; so there will be another reference.

In the debate on the Army Estimates, the subject of the Indian Army was brought on by Sir Henry Halliday, who proved, by a reference to figures, that our Army was less by seventy thousand men than in the Boer wars; and the natural inference was, that we were not in a state to meet the various warlike contingencies which appear to be impending. Sir John Lubbock declared, that the Army had been augmented; but he was unable to show that the troops we have are equal to the crisis.

The King of France is still without a Ministry; and the opposition in his Government is the new Chamber, is much stronger than in the last. He has been negotiating with South Africa, and the Doerflumines; but their terms, more especially with regard to a more direct and efficient intervention in favour of the Queen of Spain, are disagreeable to him; and his difficulties are greater than at any former period of his career. He must yield to their measures at length, for he has no longer the means of carrying on the Government with a Ministry of mere straws.

Lord Glenelg has obtained a pension of 2,000*l.* a year. A young man of the name of Melhurst, who is heir to about a year, has murdered a fellow student of the name of Allen, at the school of the Reverend Mr. Sturmer. The jury brought in a verdict of Wilful Murder.

The papers now received, contain copies of the Treaty entered into between Lord Auckland, Humeet Singh and Shah Sooraj; also a variety of papers, relative to the claim of the Nabab to the throne of Oude.

The papers renew the rumour, that Mr. Macaulay was likely to join the Ministry; but the intelligence which is headed by the Standard in Paris, is given by the London correspondent of the Times in such intelligible jargon, that it is difficult to say whether the rumor is in earnest.

Capt. Sir John Ross, who had pledged himself to establish a line of steamers, by way of the Cape, has accepted the office of Consul at Stockholm.

In addition to the Steamers now building in Valencia, and 22 Boubay, the Court have ordered two of 800 tons to be built in England; but, unfortunately, they are to be worked, as usual, by native engines.

The Earl of Seaford has been apprehended at Egham, on the charge of being witness to the forgery of certain documents.

The prospectus of an Agent Company, with a capital of £1,000,000, has been published in London. It is signed by the most respectable signatures; and, if well managed, may prove of incalculable benefit to that country.

The Inland Steam Navigation Company appears to be already defunct.

Mr. C. Hammond, who accumulated a fortune of 150,000*l.* as a chess-player, and afterwards as a ship-owner, has just died, at the age of 85, and bequeathed the whole of it to insurance societies.

The total number of Petitions presented to the House of Commons, in favour of the Corn Laws, was 1234, with 19,067 signatures; the number for the repeal, was 214, with 409,824 signatures.

Mr. Sergeant Talfourd's Amended Copy Right Bill was read a second time, on the 25th February, and passed, with a considerable majority. It gladdens the hearts of the London book-sellers, in as much as it prevents the republishing of their works in any of the Colonial possessions of England.

In Spain, there is the same dread of the state as even before. A Carlist force, amounting to four thousand men, of his own army, and consisted of three to be shot. This force was eventually approved of by his master.

Government are on the point of sending out an expedition to the Antarctic Circle, for the purpose of making magnetic observations in the Southern Hemisphere.

We beg to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of the following note for the Friend of India:

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

FRENCH SUPPORT OF BELGIUM BY FORCE OF ARMS.

Tribune, Sept. 13, 1859.
 "The Roman Catholics have been trying to get footing at Tahiti. Two priests came in a small vessel from Gambier Island in 1856. They came on shore and wished to remain. The Queen and Chiefs ordered them to leave Tahiti. They would not, and took shelter in a house belonging to the American consul, not considered as belonging to the consulate. The Tahitians took them out of the house by force, and carried them to a canoe, and put them again on board the little vessel in which they came. For this crime the French Government has sent the present ship of war, called France, with a commodore on board. As soon as he arrived he sent a letter to the Queen, stating these things without any explanation—

"First—To pay 2,000 dollars in twenty-four hours!
 "Secondly—To hoist the French flag on shore, and the natives to fire twenty-one guns under it. The Tahitian flag to be hoisted on board, and the French to fire under it.
 "Thirdly—The Queen to write a letter to the French King, acknowledging that she had done wrong in sending away the Frenchmen in the manner she did.

"If these three things were not complied with in twenty-four hours, they were to make war upon the natives!

The French Catholic priests came at present to be making a bold push to get possession of all the islands in this sea where Christianity has been introduced. We have heard that two priests have been left at the Marquesas, where Mr. Stidworthy, our missionary, is labouring. They have made several attempts at the Sandwich Islands; and we hear that two French ships of war are gone to call the Sandwich Islanders to an account for their conduct by Frenchmen, something in the same way that they have done here.

(LETTER TO THE KING OF THE FRENCH.)

To His Most Christian Majesty Louis Philip, King of the French, &c. &c.

St. Peter, Luke Mission, near South Wharfedale, Dec. 8, 1838.
SIR,—The recent visit of your Majesty's frigate, the Traque, throwing war against the Queen of Tahiti, is the occasion of my respectfully addressing your Majesty on the subject.

The last years of my life have been spent in those islands, and there parts, far from my native land, "testifying repentance towards God and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ." The Holy Spirit of God blessed our labors, and changed the hearts of the Tahitians; they cast their idols to the flames, and became followers of the Lamb.

Such being the relationship in which I stand towards the Queen of Tahiti, it becomes my duty to state on her behalf the character of that war which the French nation threatened to declare against Tahiti.

Your Majesty's flag had received no insult; your Majesty's rights as sovereign subjects had received no personal injury; maintained in acquisition of property; and, to ensure that national prejudice did not exist against the French as a nation, a Frenchman, M. Tressier, a missionary, lived for many years without molestation, and died at Tahiti!

The Roman Catholic priests, on whose account the hostilities were threatened, cannot be said, not as civil subjects of your Majesty, the King of the French, or as representatives of your Majesty; they came as priests of the Pope of Rome, subject to him alone as emissaries of the Romish Pontiff; not to promulgate your Majesty's commands, but those of the Pope; not to subjugate the Queen of Tahiti, and her subjects, to the throne of France, but to that of a foreign despotic Prince of the Court of Rome! This insolent attempt at subjugation the Queen rejected, and in commanding the departure of the Priests, exercised that right which, according to the law of nations, all "the Powers that be" exercise in their own territories towards aliens. A British subject, M. Gilez, was prevented, through the influence of an American captain on the mind of Fouare, the King of Tahiti, from disembarking on the island, and was necessitated to return to England, although sent out by the Lord of Misery, St. Peter, to the purpose of "a little of the King's" His Majesty received his own legitimate right, nor did Great Britain attempt its invasion. Had Mr. Gilez resisted the intimation to return to the island to leave Tahiti, and subjected himself to be forced out of the island, no human, no human, no divine law, would have sanctioned his expulsion other than the deserts of his own temper! History records a similar line of conduct in the Queen of England, who suffered no Prætorian, with his contemptuous letters from the Pope, to land in England; and in the following year the Pope's munia received a similar refusal when a second attempt to the conversion of England was made.

To compel the re-establishment of these aliens, the priests,—the emissaries of a foreign Pontiff,—the French nation, has been solicited, and has given its strength and power to make war in behalf of the Romish Pontiff! and a liberal King has compelled a Queen who had not twenty-one guns to comply with the entreaties of your Most Christian Majesty's dog; and 2,000 dollars were demanded of a Sovereign who had no revenue, and whose Exchequer was empty! Your Most Christian Majesty has received the 2,000 dollars from a Queen who is the just conqueror from her own strength and military to the protection of her people of peace! and, for her British Christians, who instantly supplied the sum to prevent bloodshed, the pages of history would be filled with the record of a victory to the dishonor of your Most Christian Majesty's fame.

America sent her fleet to liberate her missionaries when held captive by the Burmese; nor did England unfurl her flag, and despatch a ship of war, when the British missionaries were driven from Tahiti, and some of our number were martyred, in the attempt to instruct Christianity amongst the heathen; nor, more recently, when New Zealand forcibly drove English missionaries from their settled residences, plundered their habitations, and spoiled them of all their goods, no Christian missionary ever thought of soliciting for the canon of England to thunder against their then persecutors, to enforce re-entrance. They knew that their Master's kingdom was not of this world, the world his servants fight they asked for the blood of the heathen, nor do they present a show them to solicit the fire from earthly Kings! No, your Majesty, England and her Christian missionaries have not so learned Christ.

When the Blessed Saviour, our Divine Lord and Master, sent forth his disciples to preach his gospel of peace, his precepts were, "Go forth as lambs amongst wolves." "When they persecute you in one city, flee ye into another." "Into whatsoever city ye enter, and they receive you not, go your ways out into the streets of the same, and say, 'Even the very dust of your city which cleaveth on us we do wipe off against you.' And faithful ministers of Christ believe in and dread the domination of our Lord Jesus Christ to the Apostle Peter, that "They that take to the sword shall perish by the sword!" But when Mahomed with his missionaries went forth to convert the East, "The sword was the key of heaven, and war or the Mahomed faith the alternative!"

Your Majesty is aware that the Roman Catholic Priests, the emissaries of the Pope of Rome, went to the South Sea Islands, not to convert to the gospel of Christ, for that had been already received in truth, and idolatry overthrown; it was known that their object was not to represent your Majesty, but to reside as civil subjects of the French nation, but avowedly to subjugate the Tahitian nation, as well as every other nation to which they could gain access, to the assumed despotic power of the Pope of Rome! The Queen, therefore, prohibited their entrance, not as foreigners, your Majesty's civil subjects, but as Romish Catholic missionaries, from the Pope! and to exercising that right on Christian principles, and according to the law of nations, doing no personal violence, your Most Christian Majesty will, it is hoped, be induced to consider that the subject is purely a question of religion, and not a matter of state, and to perceive the justice of returning the money levied on the Queen of Tahiti, and executed at the point of the sword.

Perceiving that your Majesty may be provoked, blessed, and directed by Him through whom "Kings reign and Princes decree justice,"

I remain, Sir,

Your faithful servant in the gospel of Christ,

LANCELOT EDWARD THREKELD.

—Cal. Christ. Adv. May 18.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

THE POLICE.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR,—You will, I feel assured, give insertion in your pages to any remarks on so important and interesting a subject, as that of the Police of India. I have given much consideration to the valuable suggestions of your various correspondents; and especially to the opinion offered by one, some weeks since, that possibly a meeting between the plan of the Commissioner and that of Mr. Halliday, might be best adapted to the state of this country.

There are, I imagine, many strong objections to the plan proposed by the Commission, of making the landed proprietors Heads of Police; some of which I will state. This class of persons, from their indolent and prodigal habits, are never to be depended upon; they are frequently, it is to be feared, driven to repair their shattered fortunes, by organizing schemes of robbery; and they have none of that public spirit which characterizes the unpaid Magistrates of England. Again, it is notorious, that, from their avarice, they are very ignorant of all that is going on in their estates; they are surrounded by a host of idle retainers, whose inclination and interest it is to keep them in ignorance. Again, the proprietors are often leagued together, and a horde of thieves may take refuge in a neighbouring estate, without fear of being molested by the friendly proprietor.

Mr. Halliday's plan, I think, well adapted to a state of society like that of Europe, but I must express my belief, that a detached stipendiary Police would only be a scourge to this country; and, instead of preventing crime, would foster and encourage it. It was from considerations of this kind, that the Madras Government, if I am rightly informed, were induced to abolish the Darogah system, and place the Police in the hands of the Village Authorities.

Sir Thomas Munro well observed of the system of a separate Police establishment; "No system of local administration is ever so odious and oppressive, as that where the Police holds the first rank. Police Officers have no sympathy with the people, nor any interest in the prosperity of the country. Where they have no duties, but those of Police, they can have no wish to see tranquility and good order established, because they know that they have less chance of employment in tranquil, than in disturbed times. They exaggerate every report of robbery, in order to keep up alarm; they seek for thieves, where they know that, in reality, there are none; they harass the people by unfounded accusations, and extort money from them by threats of bringing forward publicly their domestic irregularities, real or pretended. Such a Police has much more injury, than all the thieves and robbers in the country; the people would suffer much less if they were left to the thieves

"than to it. They could protect themselves against the thieves, but there is no defence against an uncontrollable Police."

Surely we must adapt our system to the state of society in which we find ourselves placed: throughout India the village community exists; and this community always has been, and should still be, the Police of the country. All that is required, is to give encouragement to the village officers from the Pottal to the Talukdar; they should be liberally remunerated, by remissions of the Government tax; and these officers, again, should be vigilantly watched by the European Magistrate.

I have not before me the Report of the Commissioners, or Mr. Halliday's separate Minute, so that I am unprepared to go into the question in all its bearings, or to offer any observations upon the arguments which have been advanced by these authorities in support of their respective opinions; but I have, perhaps, said sufficient to induce those whose province it is to legislate for India, to pause before they set aside a system which, to work well, only requires to be placed on a more efficient and liberal scale.

I am,
Your obedient servant,
ZASAS.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIRs,—In the last two numbers of your excellent periodical, you have given us the chief part of a speech, made some time ago, by Mr. Thompson, at Glasgow. I presume the same person who was lately in America, advocating the cause of the oppressed slaves. I wish he was now equally well employed, instead of troubling himself about Indian affairs, with which he seems to be but very imperfectly acquainted. He appears to me to be labouring under a false impression, as to the state of things in this country. He is mistaken in some of his assumptions; and especially in the remarks which he has put forth on the tax levied by Government on the cultivated lands of India. He has greatly misrepresented the Government; and his speech is, I think, calculated to do serious injury, by conveying a false impression on this subject to the public mind at home. I should have felt regret at seeing such sentiments put forth by any man in my father land; but I am particularly pained to see a man, whom I believe to be a follower of Christ, and a friend of Missions, appearing before the religious public, and endeavouring, by incorrect statements, to inflame their minds, and excite their attention to subjects, which (with their means of information,) they can know little or nothing about; and Mr. Thompson's goal is both ill-timed and misplaced, and also calculated to injure the cause he evidently intends to serve. I trust that you, Mr. Editor, will take up the subject, and show yourself "The Friend of India," by endeavouring to ward off from the Government the injury which his efforts may have a tendency to produce. Were you also to print an extra 500 of your article on this subject, and transmit them to your numerous friends in Scotland, I think it might do good.

The Government have sufficient just now on their hands in this part of the world; and surely need not be embroiled by the interference of mistaken philanthropists at home. Mr. T. has much to say about the oppression from which the Natives of this country are suffering. I really cannot see that they are oppressed by the Government, although I have been nearly 20 years in the country. I say nothing about the manner in which, whenever they can, they oppress one another; in this respect they are like the fishes of the sea, where the greater devour the less; but with this, the Government have nothing to do. Mr. T. evidently does not understand the Native character. If ever the British Government lose India, it will be through an over lenient policy, mismanaged by the Natives, to weakness and fear; and from which they will take every kind of unprincipled advantage. I would not have them oppressed, on any account; but they must be ruled, and made to know who is master, if they are to be kept in order. The man who thinks to rule them by the principle of gratitude is mistaken—he does not know them. They have no gratitude—no patriotism—no philanthropy. There may be exceptions, but as a body, they are devoid of moral principles—each man is looking out for his gain from his quarter; and if he secures this, he does not care one iota of what becomes of the public weal. I deem this subject to be one of some importance, and I trust the Christian Advocate will join to assist me, as I take it for granted, that you are good friends. The Government Revenues seem to be cut up in every direction. Mr. T. would have them still further reduced; but if things are to go on thus; will he, and the opponents of the Redemption tenure, tell us how the expenses of our large army are to be met; and by what means the numerous eunuchs, who surround us on every hand, are to be kept from eating down and plundering the country? Mr. T. (as well as some others, whose property is protected by the Government,) seems to have overlooked this part of the subject.

Honourable John has, no doubt, in former days been guilty of oppression. I think, however, that he is now suffering a little from the attempts of others to oppress him. Mr. T. refers to the manner in which some of the measures he proposes would affect the commercial interests of England. This subject has always had too much weight in the scale, whenever Indian affairs have been on the tapis at home. Mr. T. undoubtedly means well to the Natives of India; but I fear that the mercantile interests of England are paramount even in his estimation. People in England are not competent to legislate for India, unless they have visited and resided some years in the country. I consider no man, who endeavours to weaken the authority of the British Government here, a friend to the Natives, although his intentions in this respect may be unimpeachable.

I am, Sirs, yours truly,
A MORTIMER MISHKINAR.

May 17, 1839.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

MR DEAR SIRs,—After having been frequently in situations where the Cholera Morbus raged with great violence, I some years ago came to the conclusion, that the disease arose from an evanescent insect, generated at particular times and places, like the Aphides, but much more diminutive.

Since I came to this conclusion, I have never had an opportunity of putting it to the test—should you think it worth offering to the consideration of those who may have such opportunities, you will, perhaps, do me the favour to give this note a place in your excellent paper.

Yours very truly,
HONESTUS.

GENE FOR CHRISTIAN MINISTERS.—Nothing is so disagreeable as a discourse of the formal, starched air, which speaks, acts, walks, and moves by exact measure.—Gilbert.

If the good of souls be not before thy heart, thou canst not expect God's blessing.—Combie.

The office of "fellow worker" with God would have been no mean honour to have been conferred upon the angelic host near the everlasting throne.—Bridges.

The minister purchases his happiness at a dear rate, who suffers his people to sleep in their sins.—C. Winter's Letters.

When once an idea is clearly expressed, every additional stroke will only confuse the mind and diminish the effect.—Kirk White.

We should be jealous of the praise and honour which come from men, and seek only the honour and approbation of God.—A. Reed.

I love the ministrations of those who are the most searching.—Br. Ryland.

Brethren, it is easier to declaim, like an orator, against a thousand sins in others, than to mortify one sin in ourselves, to be more industrious in our closets, to preach twenty sermons to our people, than one to our own hearts.—Flood.

Our churches will forgive almost any fault in a minister, rather than dullness.—Hughes.

He that will do good in the ministry, must be careful so the flatter to do nothing to secure souls away from him, but allure and invite, that they may be called within the compass of the net.—Gurnel.

CHURCHMAN.—The Bishop of Chester, in a recent charge to his clergy, stated—"During the last three years, in this important district which lies between the Ribble and the Mersey, the erection of more than fifty churches has been undertaken, of which thirty-two have already received their ministrations and their congregations, and the rest are fast advancing towards their completion. The neighbouring county of Cheshire is actuated by the same spirit. In the parish of Macclesfield, where till lately there has been but one church, there will soon be four. Four others have been commenced in the same populous district; whilst in the agricultural parts of Cheshire situation has been whilst in the smaller, but not less neglected, hamlets, and driven chapels already attend the anxiety of the incumbents and the land proprietors to supply those spiritual wants which had been formerly remembered only to be deplored.—British Magazine.

GLOUCESTERSHIRE.—The Rev. John Campbell, M. A., has been appointed, under the sanction of the Bishop of Bath and Wells, as a missionary chaplain among the unitarian emigrants on the Bristol and Exeter railway.—Cambridge Chronicle.

MINISTERS.—The total number of ministers of all the Christian religious denominations in the United States, as far as could be ascertained, not including the local preachers of the Methodists, nor the ministers of the Friends, may be about 18,000. A large part of these, however, are uneducated, and but poorly qualified for their work. The numbers of the different churches are estimated at 1,500,000. The number of communicants belonging to the Baptist denomination in the United States and the British provinces, as stated in the Baptist Triennial Register for 1856, is 517,533; the number in England and Wales, 140,000; in the world, 1,018,302. The Methodist Preachers of the United States have near 100,000 communicants; the Congregationalists, 140,000; the Presbyterians, 100,000; the members of the General Assembly, 20,000. The number of communicants in several of the smaller denominations, is not known.—Am. Bib. Repository.

PERALS.—Extracts were given in a former number from the journal of Mr. Glen, narrating the causes of his detection in Astrachan. During his residence there (about six months) he translated into Persian the Books of Joshua, Judges, Ruth, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Esther. Having failed to obtain a passage across the Caspian, he determined to make the journey to Tabreez by land. The following is an extract of a letter from him, dated Tabreez, 26th July, 1858.

We left Astrachan on the morning of Tuesday, the 12th of June, and entered Tabreez, on the forenoon of Monday, the 26th instant, consequently we were just forty-one days on the road. We enjoyed good health during the whole of the journey, and are now comparatively well. In Astrachan we were courteously allotted to us by the British Consul, Mr. Bonham, all arrangements are made for securing permanent lodgings. Nothing remarkable occurred during the journey. It is true a very petty difficulties presented themselves in our progress, and these or false inconveniences of a more serious nature threatened us; but, from the unimpeded facilities of all these embarrassments, it pleased our heavenly Father to deliver us. Friends were often found, where we most needed, and least expected them; so that we may say that goodness and mercy have followed us during the whole of this year, as they did throughout the whole of last year's journeys and voyages. In the journal I transmitted last November, from Astrachan, I alluded to the kind attention, and the efficient assistance afforded us, when need required, by the Russian authorities; and I have now the pleasure of reporting, that the attention we have received this season is equalled, and in some cases, surpassed those of its predecessor, though nothing occurred to require that vigorous assistance from the police, which was so promptly furnished last August, at Astrachan.

Yesterday we called on the Russian Consul, by whom we were most kindly received. He returned our visit this morning; and, in the evening, we are to dine with him. I say evening, for the dinner hour here is about eight o'clock. Mr. Nisbet, Dr. Bosch, and other English friends, had long been expecting us, and gave us a cordial welcome on our arrival. We have also had the pleasure of being welcomed to the country by no less than three of the American missionaries resident pro tempore at Ormuz, who came hither for some professional arrangements, the very day after we at their mansions are Parkers, Mulloy, and Merrick; Dr. Grant, a fourth missionary, remaining at Ormuz, till this return. Their mission in the deserts of the ancient Nebatians, in the Gordian Mountains. By the permission of the Persian Government, they are opening schools for the instruction of that interesting people, and hitherto every thing is promising. May the Lord prosper them in their labours of love: they are excellent men; and, from the blessing of God on their efforts, much may be anticipated. We are these the only missionaries with whom it pleased the Lord providentially to bring us in contact. At Karun, for example, we had the pleasure of seeing only Mr. Galloway's son-in-law, Mr. Lang, (whom I had applied of the probability of our paying him a visit), but the Rev. Mr. Ferriar, then on his way from Shiraz to Basle. At the time of our arrival, he had been there about three weeks, till an absence, which he derived from visiting his wife, was so far from being so enable him to proceed, which, from the appearance of the healing sore, it was supposed might be in the course of eight or ten days. But for this, I should not have had the pleasure of seeing him, and of hearing from his lips some interesting and highly promising notices bearing upon missionary labours, which had come to his knowledge in proceeding through Georgia, &c. to Caras. No less providential was an interview I had with the Rev. Mr. Huterich, at Tiflis, who, without knowing that I was there, came to town the morning after our arrival; to which might be added, the arrival there of the Rev. Mr. Holsenaker, in the course of a day or two, with whom, as he continued in town till our departure, we had various conversations on the past and present prospects of the friends of missions south of the Caucasus. I say friends of missions, for now the Basle Society has not a single missionary in that quarter, having withdrawn their missionaries from Shiraz and its dependencies, to labour in other parts of the world.

Messrs. D. and H. were making arrangements for crossing the Caucasus, when we met them. The statement of these gentlemen confirmed all I heard from Messrs. Ferriar and Lang, respecting the prospects likely to open upon us. Both particulars since forbids me to enter, as I write this off-hand simply to inform you of our safe arrival, hearty welcome, and (in as far as my own department is concerned) encouraging prospect; but, in general, I may remark, that by a process which none of us would have anticipated, the Head of the Church seems to be preparing the way for reuniting the distribution of his own word, and thus enlightening one large quarter of the world which a few months since was in darkness, with their friends, the German missionaries, forced might, for years to come, have been consigned to that darkness in which they were compelled to leave it. In regard to this result (should it be realized) we may adopt the language of an apostle in reference to a subject in which as a Jew, he felt as deeply as we can possibly do, in the conversion of our Gentile brethren in Turkey, Caucasus, and Persia. 'O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out.' Rom. xi. 33.—United Secession Magazine.

EDUCATION.

COLLEGES IN THE UNITED STATES.—The number of organized colleges in the United States, is between 80 and 90. About seven or eight are under the direction of Baptists; seven of the Episcopallians; seven of the Methodists; six of the Roman Catholics; and one of the Universalists.—The remainder, about sixty, of the Congregationalists and Presbyterians, 13; containing 2,000 students, in the Southern and South-Western States and the District of Columbia; and 20, with about 2,000 students, in the remaining States. Yale College has the largest number of students. Amherst and Union are about equal in point of numbers; and Harvard University is the fourth. The students mentioned in some of the Southern and Western Colleges, include those in the preparatory departments. The number of Law Schools in the United States is eight, with 214 students; Medical Schools, 23; with 122 professors and 2100 students; the Theological Seminaries about 32, with 80 professors, and 1400 students.—Christian Watchman.

DISCOVERY.

DISCOVERY.—The Recherche bus, we perceive, returned to Brest, from her voyage to the North Polar Sea. She was twelve days in harbour in Spitzbergen, where the cold experienced by the expedition was intense: but our contemporaries erroneously magnified — 300 of Reaumur's thermometer unit — 67½ Fahr., when it is in reality only — 42½. Capt. Ross while in Boothia, had for days together a temperature of 34; and in Kakutuk, he said of — 70 as an unusual cold. We cannot suppose, therefore, that the progress of the Recherche was stopped by a temperature of — 42½ Fahr. From Spitzbergen she proceeded to Hammerfest, in Norway, where several of the ascans have remained, in order that, with the assistance of Lieut. De, (who accompanied Hansen in his Siberian tour), and Prof. Boeck, they may study the natural history of the Scandinavian peninsula, and connect it with that of the Polar regions. M. Gaimard, however, the ancient leader of the expedition, has returned to France, during the season of inactivity.—Albion.

GEOLOGY.—A bold stroke has just been attempted by the celebrated French academicians M. Blainville, in support of the doctrine (founded on geological evidence) of a gradual and uniform advance towards perfection in the scientific development of animal organization. According to this distinguished savant, the supposed fossil organism which so prematurely pitched its quarters in the neighbourhood of Stonedfield, many ages before warm-blooded animals ought to have appeared on this planet, thereby so very perplexing the upholders of the "progressive" theory, may have belonged to a genus of the lizard tribe; or, if not referable to a member of the reptile kingdom, should at any rate be regarded as more closely related to the scale than to the family of terrestrial mammals, in which it has been placed by Cuvier, Broderip, and others profoundly versed in the science of paleontology. M. de Blainville follows up the exposition of his "Antes que la pretendu Didache fossile de Stonedfield," by proposing that the generic name amphithorax he adopted for the fossil remains hitherto improperly placed in the genus Diplolepis. M. de Blainville has, however, already met with an opponent in M. Valenciennes, who communicated a memoir to the French Academy, on the 10th of September last, in which he states that the original Stromboides jaw, now in the Ashmolean Museum, was examined by him and compared with the corresponding portion of the skeletons of amphithorax and xyphoides in the extensive museum of the Jardin des Plantes, and that by this comparison he is enabled fully to confirm the correctness of Cuvier's determination. He thinks, however, that the Stromboides remains are sufficiently distinct from existing forms to be entitled to generic separation, and he therefore proposes to place them in a new genus, Phlegodactylon. Surely, as some half-dozen jaws of this Bothriodon-thei genus, we must call it, to avoid making an injudicious selection of the different claimants to the right of christening, have been at various times discovered in the Stonesfield quarries; a little research on the part of the friends of science in that neighbourhood might be rewarded with the detection of some other portions of the skeleton, and thus determine a question which must otherwise, from the important deductions connected with it, be a frequent cause of philosophical contention.—Ibid.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ANNUAL REPORTS OF THE PRISON DISCIPLINE SOCIETY. U. S.—The influence of this punishment (solitary) upon the subversive disposition is so powerful, that many persons are solitary for their employment in its fullest rigour, as an instrument of discipline; while others, shrinking from its cruelty, would wholly exclude it. Wherever the influence of the Society is felt, solitary confinement is restricted to the night season; and the beneficial influence, both positive, and through the negation of evil, is immediate; while, thus modified, it is divested of all that unspeakable hardship which the following extract exhibits:—

"In the Maine Prison, which has been in operation about three years, a large number of the convicts have been sentenced to six months solitary confinement day and night, and to a period of time afterwards of solitary confinement at night, and hard labour by day. A considerable number more have been sentenced to solitary confinement day and night, for the whole term of their imprisonment. The judges and the executive, when the prison was built, were strongly in favour of solitary confinement day and night, and they wished to make a fair experiment. What, then, is the testimony of the superintendent of this prison, on this vastly important and interesting subject? And what is the testimony of the records of the prison? The following statement is collected from the records and the superintendent. It exhibits the names of several convicts; the length of time they were sentenced to solitary confinement; the length of time they were able to endure it before they were removed to the hospital; the length of time they remained in the hospital before they returned to the cells; the alternation between the cells and the hospital to fulfil the whole term of solitary confinement; and the suicide of two convicts in the cells. These are the only convicts who have died after the prison was organized.

"In this case it was necessary to remove the man to the hospital four times, to enable him to endure fifty-six days solitary. The Secretary saw him when he was removed from the cell the last time. He shivered like an aspen leaf; his pulse was very feeble; his articulation scarcely to be heard from his bed to the grate of his cell, eight feet; and when he was taken out, he could with difficulty stand alone.

Edmond Eastman, 4 months solitary.	Sept. 11	Jan. 9	4 months.

"This man endured the whole period without leaving the cell.

"Isaac Ditha was sentenced to six months solitary, and two years, three months and fourteen days hard labour. He went immediately into solitary, and remained seventy-four days without interruption. At the end of this period he came out in good health, and performed a good day's labour in the quarry. Dr. Ross expresses the opinion, that this man would live in solitary confinement about as well and as long as any where else. He has been a solitary, and has been accustomed to the hardships of a convict. He has been a wanderer in the world, without a home. It is his material to him where he is. The keeper thinks that six months solitary to this man would not be a greater punishment than fifteen days to a convict who had been accustomed to the ease of life; also, that he would rather endure six months solitary confinement than ten stripes.

"John Shearer and John Cuth have entered the prison at the same time, under sentence of three months solitary, and both endured the whole period, without interruption, having received nothing except the usual allowance of bread and water, and a little comfort to rub on their heads.

"Benjamin Williams also endured three months solitary, without interruption.

"But, in general, the superintendent states, that nearly as much is necessary in the hospital to fulfil long solitary sentences, as in the cells. He also expresses an opinion, in his report to the Legislature, that long periods of solitary imprisonment inflicted on convicts, is worse than useless as a means of reformation. The character of the superintendent of this prison is such, that the opinions expressed by him on this subject, will be the result of his experience, will be thought worthy of particular consideration. He says, "the great diversity of character, the various habits and temperament of body and mind, render solitary imprisonment a very unequal punishment. Some persons can endure solitary confinement with apparent little or no effect, either in body or mind, while others sink to the very bottom, if the punishment were unintermittently continued, so that it would become ineffectually humane."

"However, persons of strong minds, who suffer in what they deem a righteous cause, may be able to endure solitary confinement, and retain their bodily and mental vigour, yet it is not to be expected of criminals, with minds discouraged by conviction and disgrace.

"As far as the experience in our State Prison proves against respecting the efficacy of solitary imprisonment in preventing crimes by reforming convicts, it will induce us to believe that it is not more effectual than confinement to hard labour. Six of the convicts now in the State Prison are committed a second time, for crimes perpetrated after having been discharged from this prison; three of these had been punished by solitary imprisonment and confinement to hard labour.

"The keeper of the Auburn State Prison, in the report

New York, very justly observes, "that a degree of mental distress and anguish may be necessary to humiliate and reform an offender; but carry it too far, and he will become a savage in his temper and feelings, or he will sink in despair. There is no doubt, that uninterrupted solitude tends to sour the feelings, destroy the affections, harden the heart, and induce men to entertain a spirit of revenge, or drive them to despair."

"I would not wish to be understood to express an opinion, that solitary imprisonment, ought not, in any case, to be inflicted. On the contrary, there can be no doubt that it is a proper punishment for prison discipline in many cases; but for the purpose, short periods only will be necessary; seldom, if ever, to exceed ten days. In the case of juvenile offenders, it may be very useful and proper, for periods of twenty or thirty days, but never to exceed six days. If repentance and amendment are not effected by thirty days of strict solitary confinement, it can rarely be expected to be obtained by a longer period."

Ibid.

SOMETHING WORTHY OF NOTICE.—When I was in Bethel I went into the public prison, and visited every part of the establishment. At last I was introduced to a very large hall, where were full of children, with their heads in the windows, and having the appearance of a Prussian school-room. "What," said I, "is it possible that all these children are imprisoned here for crime?" "O no," said my conductor, smiling at my simplicity, "but if a parent is imprisoned for crime, and that account his children are left destitute of the means of education, and are liable to grow up in ignorance and crime, the government has them taken here, and maintained and educated for useful employment." This was a new idea to me. I know not that it has ever been suggested in the United States; but surely it is the duty of Government, as well as its highest interest, when a man is paying the penalties of his crime in a public prison, to see that his misbehaving children are not left to suffer and inherit their father's vice. Surely it would be better for the child, and cheaper as well as better for the State. Let it not be supposed that a man will go to prison for the sake of having his children taken care of, for those who go to prison usually have little regard for their children; and if they had, discipline like that of the Berlin prison would soon sicken them of such a bargain.—Prof. Shaw's Report.

ON THE FIRST OF AUGUST, 1853, a meeting of the Mass. Anti-Slavery Society was held at the Marlboro' Chapel, at 1 o'clock, P. M., to celebrate the day upon which the shackles of bondage fell from the hands of the slaves in the British West India Islands. The Rev. J. W. Himes read portions of scripture, and prayer was addressed to the throne of grace by Rev. J. C. Roman, of Hartford, Conn. Messrs. A. A. Phelps, Amasa Walker, and H. B. Stanton, addressed the meeting.

The following letter from the Hon. J. Q. Adams was read to a large audience, who heard it with great delight.

EDWARD LEITCH, Esq. Boston. Quincy, 28th July, 1853.
Dear Sir,—I have received your kind invitation in behalf of the Committee of Arrangements of the Mass. Anti-Slavery Society, to attend their celebration of the Anniversary of the day upon which Slavery was abolished in the Colonial Possessions of Great Britain.

I could give you pleasure to comply with the invitation; but my time is not very free; and my voice has been affected by the season of the year, in a multiplicity of appearances before the public, political and literary, to attend and address their meetings, have imposed upon me the necessity of passing the privilege of my presence and deciding them all.

I perceive that the defence of the cause of human freedom is falling into younger and more vigorous hands. That in three or four years from the day of the Declaration of Independence, its efficient truths should be yet struggling for existence against the encumbrance of an age pampered with prosperity and languishing in servitude, is a melancholy truth from which I should not attempt to shut my eyes. But the common sense has gone to sleep. The yinful obstructions of the rights of human nature are locked and are huddled in their armour, and the scourge is never, and the lynching lawyer, and the scribbler, and the faithless scribe, and the priestly parasite, will vanquish them like steam touched with the spear of lightning. I live in the faith and hope of the progressive advancement of Christian liberty, and expect to abide by the same in death. You were a glorious and arduous career before you, and it is among the consolations of my last days, that I am able to cheer you in the pursuit and exert you to be steadfast and immovable in the cause. You shall you not fail, whatever may befall, to reap a rich reward, in the blessing of him that is ready to perish upon your side.

I am, dear Sir, faithfully,

Your friend and servant,

J. Q. ADAMS.

In the morning, at 11 o'clock, the people of colour, head a meeting in the Belknap Street Church, on this occasion. John F. Wilson was called to preside; by Rev. J. C. Roman, of Hartford, read scriptures, and Rev. S. Jewell, prayed. Messrs. Phelps, Cole, Nell, Himes, Russell, and Worcester made interesting addresses.—Christianity Watchman.

THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.—Having obtained information of the present situation of this interesting portion of Polynesia, from one who has observed it in person, we have set down some brief and detached memoranda of our gleanings.

Your hundred children usually assemble in the Sunday-school at Wailuku. About 250 of these read very well, and are capable of comprehending almost any subject in morals or religion which is plainly exhibited.

Discuses introduced by Europeans during the visits of Cook, and others, have devastated the islands, and still exert a fatal influence on the population.

Books cannot be prepared in sufficient variety to meet the wants of the people, as they learn to read. This want is particularly felt in the schools.

One of the pupils of the High School executes very correct maps by copper-plate engraving.

The Sandwich Islands are chiefly mountains. The summits of the two highest are covered with snow. The population live near the shores. The mountains are entirely of volcanic origin, and the surface even now is almost covered with lava. Not a twentieth part of the surface has been cultivated.

Four square feet of well watered land will produce taro enough to sustain one person for a year.

The productions of the islands are taro, potatoes, yams, onions, sugar-cane, corn, beans, cabbage, melons, tomatoes, bananas, bread-fruit, grapes, a species of apple, guavas, figs, oranges, lemons, pine-apples, mulberries, &c.

The Americans have obtained a lease of a large tract of land for the cultivation of silk.

Cotton may be raised with a very little labour. The body and mind of the Sandwich Islander are in strong contrast: the former being large and strong, the latter dwarfish and feeble. Education and religion have improved this native indolence of intellect, but it is still one of the greatest obstacles in the way of their elevation. The minds of children, however, are found to be susceptible and ready as those of any nation, and the progress at school is very encouraging. The islanders are often astonished at the industry in study they evince, compared with the indolence and stupidity of the nation in general. Some of them are successfully taught the higher branches of mathematics.

The native temper is docile and pliant, but capable of deep malice and cruelty. The people are naturally improvident and idle.

Notwithstanding the existence of many vices which badly have rendered national, it may be said that the islanders are now a moral people. With a small exception they have become temperate, and with the excessive use of ardent spirits that once prevailed, have passed away the impure and violent amusements which attended it. The Sabbath is virtually observed as a day of rest, and in the schools and places of worship are not attended, they remain at home. The characteristic crimes of the nation are leucismos and theft.

They are ready to conform to the outward duties of religion. Hence arises a great difficulty in judging of the sincerity of professed converts, and the great liability of their yielding to some system of religion that will be satisfied with nominal adherence. The conscience is weak; there is little strength of purpose or perseverance. There are many bright exceptions to this remark in the churches that have been founded on the island; but this is one of the difficulties of their evangelization.

There are between twenty and thirty thousand who can read the New Testament intelligently. Multitudes have committed to memory a short catechism, containing a summary of Christian truths, and many of these have learned it from each other, without being able to read.

In the immediate vicinity of the stations the majority of adults, probably, know what is right and wrong according to the Bible, and what they must do to be saved; but owing to their habitual want of thought and reflection, their ideas are often very crude and confused.

The most successful way of proceeding to them is by reducing every statement to the simplest possible terms. They do not understand general principles. Every item of instruction and of inference must be brought down to their apprehension by the plainest illustrations. They understand the Saviour's parables better than any other part of the Scripture; and are interested by the personal history of Christ. The boys in the high school are making fine progress in learning, and this source is looked to for supplying good teachers for the nation, and eventually preachers.

A few men are now employed in giving public instruction to the people under the direction of the missionaries. One of these is named Barthelemy, a middle-aged man, and nearly blind; a devoted Christian and an eloquent speaker. His acquaintance with the Bible is remarkable, and his sermons are very valuable. David Ma'a, another native, is superior in learning in education and intellect, but not so powerful a speaker, or so strong in his influence, though always a very useful assistant in the mission.

The civilization of the islands is advancing. In dress, dwellings, and domestic habits, there is a gradual though slow progress of improvement.—N. S. American.

THE MUSEUM LIBRARY ASSOCIATION, one of the best institutions in the city of Boston, and one which should be fostered by our men of intelligence and wealth, has engaged Mr. J. S. Buckingham, the celebrated traveller, to deliver a course of six lectures, descriptive of Egypt. The lectures will be delivered at the Odeon, commencing on Monday evening, September 21. As no other opportunity will be afforded our citizens to listen to the highly interesting and interesting lectures of Mr. Buckingham, there will doubtless be a scramble for the tickets.—and the sooner they are secured, the better.—Christianity Watchman.

CHRISTIANITY OF SILKWEAVING.—A letter from M. Favand, a missionary in China, states, that during his long residence in that country, he has often seen the Christians of silkweaving used as food. He has himself partaken of them, and found them to have strengthening and cooling, and particularly good food for delicate persons. After having woven the silk of the cocoons, they are dried in the frying-pan, in order to get rid of the aqueous matter. The envelope will then come off of itself, and they look like little yellow masses resembling the eggs of carp. They are fried in butter, lard, or oil, and mixed with broth, of which, that of chicken gives the best flavour. When they have been boiled in this for five minutes, they are crushed with a wooden spoon, and well stirred up from the bottom. The Mandarins and rich people add the yolk of eggs, in a proportion of one yolk to ten silk-masses, and when this is poured over it, it becomes a golden-colored cream, and is of an exquisite flavour. The poorer people are contented with salt, pepper, and vinegar, or, after stripping them, cooking them with oil.—Athenaeum.

THE ENGLISHMAN AND THE DHURMU SUBHA.—The Englishman of Monday last, supports the views of the Dhurmu Subha, in its anxiety to be entrusted with the collection of the Pilgrim Tax, and the management of those Temples which are about to be made independent of Government, and the Editor calls on us for a full explanation of our views; with this request we cheerfully comply.

We must previously set our contemporary right, regarding the subject of toleration. He says, towards the close of his article, "It is easy for the Friend of India, or any other enemy to the toleration of Hindoo worship, to aggravate the troubles of Government, &c. &c." We put it to his candour, whether, after we have on every occasion on which the subject has been discussed, advocated a full, free and unrestrained toleration of every creed in India, it is fair and courteous to represent us as enemies to toleration. We may have differed from some of our opponents as to the precise meaning to be affixed to the word toleration, which we find to depend, in a great measure, on existing partialities and prejudices. Truth, it has been said on one side the Pyrenees is falsehood on the other; and so it appears to be in the case of toleration. In India it has been interpreted to include the fullest support and encouragement of the State; in England, in the case of Dissenters, it was heretofore taken in the sense in which vermin is said to be tolerated, because it cannot be annihilated. But we have never swerved from the advocacy of toleration, as understood, not by political partizans, but by the great interpreter of our language, himself a rigid Tory: "To allow, as not to hinder."

The Englishman says, that "to suppose, that by requiring Government to wash its hands of the Pilgrim Tax, a blow has thereby been levelled at idolatrous worship and pilgrimages, is to mistake the Native character." What effect the withdrawal of the direct countenance of Government from the shrines may produce on their popularity, it is not easy to predict. Perhaps the abolition of the Tax may swell the number of pilgrims; perhaps the conduct of the officiating priests, when there is no check on their measures, but that which the virtues of Hindooism afford, may diminish the resort of devotees. We have little experience to guide our judgement. Mr. Place, who established the alliance between Government and the Temples at Madras, affirmed, that they had fallen to decay for want of that public support. Such may or may not be the result in the present instance; but whether it be or not, the merits of the question are not altered. No Christian Government can conscientiously continue openly to support and encourage a system of pilgrimage, which annually inflicts such an amount of secular misery on the country.

The Englishman has adduced a long list of names, of "some of the wisest and best of our Indian statesmen," whose opinions have been recorded against the withdrawal of official support from the temples of idolatry. But if we had attended to the voice of "some of the wisest and best of our Indian statesmen," the inhuman rite of Suttie never would have been abolished; and the Freedom of the Press never would have been granted to the country. We are fully prepared to admit the claims of many statesmen of the old school to public gratitude; yet we cannot forget, that the leading principles of that school were diametrically opposed to the liberal views of the present age.

Our contemporary appears to labour under an impression, that the determination which the Directors have now adopted, affects the general system of idolatry throughout India, which is far from being the case. Our political connection with the idolatrous shrines in this part of India is extremely limited. In a country which embraces a population of seventy millions, it is confined to two shrines. Our political connection with them grew out of our fiscal alliance. The State drew revenue on the one hand, and granted support on the other. The relinquishment of our connection with Gya and Juggurnath, cau, therefore, make little or no difference in the general economy of the various Hindoo establishments of this Presidency; and the dread of "embarrassment to Government," from which the Durma Subha so generously steps forward to relieve it, is altogether gratuitous.

The Editor also says—"Of course, the authorities will scarcely carry out the principle of non-interference so far as to issue orders for the complete withdrawal of all connexion with the Tax, without nominating some adequate substitutes or successors in the business of controul. The effect of so sudden and total a cessation of all share in the due regulation of the toll and the appropriation of its proceeds, would be to open the door to intrigues and cabals without number, dangerous to the peace of the country, and prejudicial to the safety of the thousand of pilgrims." But we have understood it to be the intention of Government altogether to abolish the Tax which was collected by the State, not to transfer the collection of it from one agency to another. We can see no cause for anxiety in this. At Brindaban and at Benares, which are places of equal, if not of superior sanctity to Gya and Juggurnath, no Tax has ever been levied; and no interference has ever been exercised by the public authorities. Why, then, should there be such dread "of intrigues and cabals without number, dangerous to the peace of the country," by putting Gya and Juggurnath upon the same footing with Brindaban and Benares? In the shrines about to be liberated from our guardianship, as in those which have never enjoyed it, the pilgrim will make his offering at the shrine, and retire. There can be no necessity for any body of "inheritors" to be constituted, as the successors of Government. The Rajah of Khondia is the ancient and hereditary guardian of Juggurnath; into his hands will the management of the Temple naturally lapse; and we are certain that he is competent to the superintendence of its affairs, without the aid of a society of Calcutta Baboos. The same course will be adopted with ease, in respect to the Temple at Gya, to the management of which the hereditary priesthood have, of course, the first claim, both as a matter of right and of expedience.

To the delegation of the charge of these Temples to any body of men, except to their legitimate guardians, there is the same objection as to the management of the Temples by the Officers of the State. If such a plan were pursued, Government would, in fact, create a new executive body, a kind of Ecclesiastical Commission, whose powers would be derived from the State, with which it would be closely identified in the opinion of the people; it would be amenable to the Executive, and not to the legal Officers of Government. This would only be to perpetuate the old connection, and to exercise the same controul through a more exceptionable agency. We have seen, in the case of the Catholic community in Calcutta, that the disputes which arose regarding the administration of ecclesiastical property, were left to be decided by the Courts of Law. We have seen that at the two renowned pilgrimages of Brindaban and Benares, whatever differences may have risen, since we acquired the country, have been invariably referred to the ordinary tribunals. This is the footing on which the Temples of Gaya and Juggurnauth will now be placed; and any arrangement which should have the effect of bringing their management under the cognizance of the Executive Government, would entirely defeat the object of the Court of Directors.

The Englishman has been totally misinformed,—and we have the source of his error now in our eye,—when he states "that the Daurua Sa'his enjoys a popularity throughout the orthodox portion of the Hindoo population in Bengal, and as far westerly as Allahabad." The little esteem which that body once enjoyed in its own limited sphere, which was confined to the Casteita Baboos, and their relatives and connections in the country, it has been gradually losing. When it was originally established ten years ago, to restore the rite of Suttee, and to prop up Hindooism, it enjoyed a temporary popularity, which has subsided with the enthusiasm out of which it grew. Its pertinacious refusal to publish any accounts of the sums entrusted to it, shook its influence with the Native community. How far this circumstance may recommend it to Government, as a fit agency for the collection of the Pilgrim Tax, we leave others to decide. When, moreover, the people found that the support which it professed to give to Hindooism, consisted simply in punishing the poor Brahmans who ventured to receive gifts from the orthodox, who were guilty of having supported Government in the abolition of the rite of Suttee, its popularity was still farther circumscribed. So far from enjoying credit, as far west as Allahabad, it does not number among its members or adherents any of the rich orthodox families in this town of Serampore.

We have watched the proceedings of this Society with close attention for ten years; and the objection which we feel to its employment in the way the Englishman recommends, is founded on long experience. It has been the instrument of oppression to the full extent of its powers. It has fomented discord; it has ruled the few Natives who were brought by circumstances within the range of its influence, with a rod of iron. Even the orthodox have, one by one, broken off from its communion. Its conduct is matter of general notoriety; it is deeply imprinted on the memory of Natives of the highest respectability in Calcutta, whom it would be easy to name. Its deeds, its disputes, its partial decisions are recorded in the public journals. We judge, therefore, from its past conduct, that it is about the last agency which Government could desire to select for the management of Temples beyond the limits of Bengal; the officiating priests of which have no other affection for the Natives of this province, than what may arise from the magnitude of their gifts. The bare idea that Government intended to entrust the collection of the Pilgrim Tax, and the intimate superintendence of the Temples to this body, would bring an instant remonstrance from Gaya and Juggurnauth. But after all we are, perhaps, combating a shadow. We are fully persuaded that, as nothing could be more wise than for Government to erect the Dhurua Sabha into an Ecclesiastical Commission, so there is nothing farther from its intentions.

TRANSACTIONS OF THE AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY.—We have perused with much attention the Sixth Volume of these valuable records; and the impression left on the mind, on viewing the progress of the past year, is that though the efforts of the Society have been attended with as much success as could have been anticipated in arousing public attention, and in the introduction of seeds, yet, comparatively speaking, little has been effected in the improvement of the staple productions throughout the country. In the important article of Cotton, superior seed has, it is true, been introduced, and in some places acclimated; and samples of superior Cotton, the growth of the country, have been presented to the Society; but after four or five years of effort, we have not yet succeeded in raising a single ship load of superior Cotton for the home market; and Col. Skinner, who has made exertions on the largest scale in this department, has been so completely disheartened by the pecuniary return for the improved Cotton which he sent for sale to Calcutta, as almost to consider the project a forlorn one. The Society's Committee of the Society very justly remark, that until our improved Cotton has attained a character in the home market, it cannot be expected to command a remunerating price in Calcutta. To this, Col. Skinner replies, that the growers must dispose of their crops in this country to obtain resources for subsequent cultivation. There can be no doubt that the merchants in Calcutta would cheerfully purchase up any quantity that might be imported, if they were confident regarding its reception at home; and our disappointment may be traced to the non-production of a sufficient quantity to give it an established character in the home markets. Till this has been effected, the labours of the Society cannot be said to have produced any tangible good, as it relates to this article. Should another year pass over without producing, not samples, but cargoes of Cotton, which may sustain a competition with the American Cotton, it will become the duty of the Society to appoint a Committee to examine whether this country is capable of raising mercantile supplies of superior Cotton at all; and if so, what are the causes which operate against success.

The same may be said regarding the Sugar-cane, of which the superior or Otahite kind has been so successfully introduced into this country, through the agency of Major Bleeman, and of the Society. It has been acclimated, and appears to be preferred by the Natives wherever it can be obtained; and yet we have not been able as yet to freight a single ship with sugar of so superior a character, as to stand a competition in the English market with the West Indian Sugar. The Natives are said to be very partial to the Cane as fruit, and to purchase it with avidity; but the introduction of this superior Cane has not yet had the effect of giving any improvement to the Sugar we export. At the period which had been fixed for awarding the prize for the sugars sent in for competition, only one specimen was exhibited, and this was not found to come within the meaning of the Society's intentions. The 1st of May of the present year was then fixed for the show of samples, but this period appears to have gone over without any exhibition.

On the subject of Silk, we find that four parcels were submitted to the Committee, who awarded the Gold Medal to Mr. W. G. Rose, for the first best sample; and the Silver Medal to Mr. G. Lay, for the second best. The prize specimens of Silk were sent to Mr. W. Prinsep for his opinion on the price of such samples in the market; and the opinion offered by him does not appear to have coincided with that of the Committee; as they state in an addendum, that after the receipt of it, they submitted the skins to a more careful scrutiny, and had no occasion to alter their opinion. This volume of the Transactions also contains a communication from Seigr. Mutti, who has been so successful in introducing the cultivation of silk worms into the Deccan, in which he points out the defects of the system pursued in Bengal.

Relative to the progress made in raising superior Tobacco in this country, the Transactions contain no additional information.

It appears, therefore, that little progress has as yet been made in improving, for mercantile purposes, the four great staple articles to which the attention of the Society has been directed; and that efforts of a character different from those which have been employed, are necessary to give to the products of the East a pre-eminence in foreign markets. We do not make this observation from any wish to disparage the exertions of the Society; they have been conducted with great zeal and perseverance, and deserve the highest praise of the community; but still we consider that the object of an Agricultural Society cannot be said to be attained, until such a decisive progress has been made in Agricultural improvements, as shall command the attention of those who are engaged in conducting the exchange of commodities between country and country. We think that a comparison of the labour and time which have been employed, with the substantial success which has been experienced, cannot but be beneficial to the Society; and that so far from dumping the arduous of its members, it is likely to stimulate to greater exertions. We have watched the progress of this Society from year to year with great interest. We have witnessed the increase of its members with pleasure; we have remarked the efforts made to introduce superior Cotton, Sugar-cane and Tobacco, with no little satisfaction; and it is with an earnest desire for its increasing utility, that we ask its members to enquire what national results have yet been visible from its labours; and, in short, if necessary, larger and more comprehensive plans to secure them.

A large portion of the present volume is occupied with papers, relative to the Cochineal Insect, which the Society is so anxious to introduce into this country. We regret deeply that, in the death of Mr. G. A. Prinsep, the Society has been deprived of one of its most efficient members, and of one who had for many years devoted his attention in an especial manner to the culture of this valuable insect.

The Society has lost in its Secretary, Mr. John Bell, a most active and useful coadjutor. He identified the progress of the Society with his own existence, and with the pleasures and views of his life. That the flourishing condition to which it has attained, was owing to his untiring diligence, there are few who will question; and it is matter of deep regret that he was removed in the midst of those prospects of usefulness, which are now unfolded to its view. He wanted nothing but a more enlarged acquaintance with Botany to complete his qualifications.

We are happy to perceive that the Society has obtained a large accession of members within the last twelvemonth. Its present strength is four hundred and seventy, a larger number than has yet been associated in any single enterprise in this land of parties and prejudices. In this number is comprized, we believe, all those who, from philanthropic or commercial purposes, take an interest in the culture of the soil, and the improvement of its produce; and we hope that this large and combined agency will be able, at no distant period, to show an increase in the mercantile exports of our improved produce.

THE WESLEYAN CENTENARY.—This singular exhibition we briefly referred to last week, as exemplifying the mixed and unworthy motives which are now so extensively applied in England for the furtherance of great and holy objects. The example, it may be of some use to place more distinctly before our readers. The primary object of this festival appears to have been both natural and praiseworthy. It is becoming in the Methodists to express their feelings of gratitude for the benefits they have derived from the zeal and piety of their great founder; and to avail themselves of such an opportunity of doing so, with special effect, as the completion of the first century of their existence as a body. A magnificent act of liberality, for the propagation of the gospel, seems also to be the most suitable form, in which they could testify regard for the memory of a man, who was so disinterested and devoted a spiritual benefactor of his race as John Wesley. And, on such an occasion, it is not only excusable, but very becoming, that the attachment of the Wesleyans to each other, and to the economy by which they are united, should be warmly expressed, and by the expression be strengthened. But the misfortune is, that proper things are now done in so improper a way, that all the propriety of them disappears in their execution. The Wesleyans are exulting in their Centenary, as the greatest and happiest event of their history; but we very much fear that hereafter, from this very event, will be traced their decline and fall in every thing truly good that belongs to them. They are at present beside themselves with an intoxication, from which it will not be easy to recover. The Christian Church should pray for their return to sobriety.

The great business of the Centenary is to raise an extraordinary sum of money to be spent on the great objects of the Methodist Conference, such as the education of their Preachers, the support of their Missions, the erection of Churches, and so forth; after having provided a magnificent establishment in the Metropolis, as the Head Quarters of the body, and the monument of the Wesleyans. For the accomplishment of this business, a rapid succession of public meetings has been held in every part of the kingdom. These have been opened devotionally; and then the President of the Conference, or some other leading preacher, has commenced the requisite excitement, by an animated review of the general History of Methodism, or of the particular circumstances which may have attended its introduction or triumphs in the place where the meeting may be convened. So far the meetings have a Christian-like appearance. But then succeeds a scene of such mingled seriousness and buffoonery, piety and vanity, sensibility and vulgarity, as baffles all description; whilst the universal cry becomes, money, money, more money! Subscriptions are called for: which are proclaimed with the names of the donors, and the various sentiments with which they are accompanied. After the first effusion of liberality has begun to subside, then comes an interlude of speechification. Again the collectors go round; and alternations of speaking and collecting follow each other till the whole company are exhausted. The former part of the day having been thus spent, the people are again brought together with excited minds and replenished pockets; and the evening is generally much more productive than the morning. "It is considered essential," it is said, "that the mode of contribution should not be by public collection, (that having been resolved upon as the best method of terminating the connexional effort at the time, when the religious celebration of the Centenary shall take place,) but by the simple announcement, from the chair or otherwise, of the names of the individuals subscribing, and the amounts of their subscriptions." Of the operation of this simple plan we shall afford our readers a sample. It shall be from London.

The President, the Rev. Mr. Jackson, commenced by giving out a hymn, and reading 1 Chron. xxiv. on the liberal offerings of the Jewish people to the temple. He then prayed, and afterwards delivered a lengthened address; in the course of which he reminded the meeting that London shared, principally shared, in the labours of the Rev. John and Charles Wesley. It was in London that both found peace with God—Charles, 100 years since, last Whitsunday, in a private house near Temple-bar; and John, on the Wednesday evening following, in a private house in Aldersgate-street. In London, too, the first Methodist Chapel was opened. The first Methodist Chapel was certainly built in Bristol; but the first opened was in London, in what was called the Old Foundry. It was situated within a few hundred yards of the place where they were met. It was a large unsightly brick building, formerly in the occupation of Government, and used for the casting of cannon for the army. It remained a sort of Cathedral of Methodism till 1788, when the beautiful and commodious Chapel in which they were then assembled, was erected. It was in London, too, that the first lay preacher began to exercise his ministry—the first man not episcopally ordained—Thomas Maxfield. London was the principal scene of the labours of the two brothers; and it was in London they both ended their lives—Charles in Marylebone, in 1787 or 1788. Three years afterwards, his honoured brother was called also to go the way of all the earth; and it was in a house a few yards from that Chapel. It was in that Chapel that his honoured remains were brought before interment, and placed within the door of the Chapel in his coffin; and it was in that Chapel that his funeral sermon was preached to the listening multitudes. It was in the burying-ground behind that Chapel that the honoured remains of their father slept. Many other incidents connected with this outline were related by Mr. Jackson, who concluded with a powerful exhortation.

The Rev. F. A. West then gave some details respecting what had been already done in various parts of the country, on the present occasion, and read a select list from the subscriptions which had been received in the London District, amounting to £5,831. A number of new donations were immediately tendered, and proclaimed aloud. It was then moved that J. S. Elliott, Esq., be requested to accept the office of treasurer for the London District; and having been called to take a seat on the platform, this gentleman addressed the assembly, blessing God from his inmost soul that he was ever led to join the Methodist connexion. It was only about twelve years since, but they had proved the happiest years of his life. He had, for many years previously, been a Calvinist, but, by God's infinite mercy, at a critical period of his religious experience, was rescued, through the instrumentality of one of the dear ministers of the connexion now before the throne, from the vortex of Antinomianism. After expressing in general terms, his great admiration of Methodism, he said that itinerant preaching was the palladium of Methodism; and this brought to his mind a memorable expression of the late excellent Dr. Bogue, that God so stamped itinerant preaching with the fiat of his divine sanction, that, when He had but one son, He constituted him an itinerant preacher.

Donations were now announced in rapid succession.

"Sir W. Ellis stated that he had been a member nearly 50 years, and had never passed a quarter without receiving his ticket. He presented 100 guineas for himself and Lady Ellis, and 10 guineas for his son. Then came 50 guineas from Mr. Morris, and 100 from Mr. Boora.

Richard Mathews, Esq., a barrister, in presenting some family donations, avowed, in a few words, his attachment to Methodism; and Dr. Baunting stated that Mr. Mathews had drawn a bill on the subject of Negro Marriages, which the Government had adopted nearly word for word, as the basis of their Order in Council, on the subject.

Mr. J. Cordery, of Lambeth, stated, that he was the son, grandson, and great-grandson of a Methodist, and read a list of family donations, the total amount of which was £254-7.

Mr. A. Elliott begged to present a guinea for every year of his Methodist life—25 guineas. Mr. Bennett said his parents were General Baptists; but convinced that Methodism was more likely to extend religion, he embraced it. Of their seven children, five were local preachers, the sixth a class leader, and the seventh a preacher's wife. The Rev. W. Naylor said he could number in his family five generations of Methodists.

Dr. Baunting having announced a donation of thirty guineas from Dr. Beaumont, and one guinea from his son,

Dr. Beaumont made a speech, in which he characterised Mr. Wesley as a man who, though he had not a very fervent imagination—and he, for one, was very glad he had not—it was the only thing in which he may be said to have been at all defective; as if he did consider it an especial favour on the part of Almighty God, that, amid the other lofty endowments of that master mind, he was not overdone with this. He had no eccentricities—no oblique propensities of intellect. There was a singular balance of faculties. As to Methodism itself, he said he did not know what to say about it. He must be a very bold man that should undertake to define it exactly. Dr. Beaumont said that he had felt jealous about this Manchester movement. They had put one of the feet of Wesleyan magnificence at Manchester: God let them keep the other in London. As to the appropriation upon the whole he was very well satisfied with the slicing of the loaf. But in the cutting up of a large loaf, certain crumbs fall; and though determined to agree with every body, he did not like that the Chapel Fund—the Chapel Fund—should come in for a tolerable slice.

J. Heath, Esq., then denied that the Methodists praised themselves. "We have not been in the habit of praising ourselves. I don't know that I ever said anything in public, in mixed company, in praise of Methodism in my life. But I feel this is so purely a Wesleyan occasion, that we have a right for once to take the full advantage of our system. I shall go away from this opportunity with a firmer confidence in the principles of Wesleyan Methodism; and with this assurance, that however much duties to us the right that belongs to us,—that all the world should pour upon us something of the contempt through which we have passed for the last few years at least,—yet I feel under all this an assurance, that God has taken up our cause,—that he is to Wesleyan Methodism giving a direct sanction of his blessing,—and I mistake if even the most selfish will not be led, from such portents as these, to own that God is in the midst of his people, and that, whoever dares to step forward and cast a stain upon our reputation and our principles, or the purity of our discipline, that at least he is to-day opening us to his people, and we will afresh gratefully acknowledge him to be our God. I never knew, during the period to which I have referred, any thing contrary either to the soundest integrity, or the utmost simplicity of purpose, or the purity of the character of our body,—I never knew any thing that could justify what has been so freely said to the disadvantage of Wesleyan Methodism, during the three or four years which have so recently passed.

The meeting was then adjourned to half an hour.

In the afternoon, Mr. Killick, of Dover, said he had had the pleasure of being associated with Methodism thirty years, and with many others he could say, he owed his all to Methodism.

The Rev. J. P. Russell said Dr. Clarke once spent a whole day in the General Assembly in Scotland, but he was heard replying to himself, "Methodism for ever." Had he lived to see this day, he would have exclaimed, "Methodism for ever."

The Rev. J. Mason announced, as a tribute of respect to Wesleyan Methodist, from the house of J. and E. Spicer and Sons, Disenters, 25l.

Mr. Farmer presented a list from Mr. Gabriel and family (363 guineas).

J. Hunter, Esq., of Islington, was of the third generation of Methodists, his forefathers were benighted members of the Established Church of Scotland.

The Rev. W. Jenkins said Dr. Beaumont had described Mr. Wesley as being very calm, — as having no fire, no imagination. Now, he had seen him manifest as much fire, though not so much rant, (laughter) as any man living. He never preached without fire.

Dr. Beaumont said the only mistake made that day was the one made by his venerated friend, Mr. Jenkins, in reference to what he (Dr. B.) said about Mr. Wesley. John Wesley have no fire! Why his words were fire. His ministry like a sevenfold peal of thunder, the reverberations of which had not ceased yet, and never would cease until they were wrapped up in the blast of the archangel's trumpet. He did not retract what he did say, but corrected Mr. Jenkins.

The Rev. W. Adcock — You did say that imagination was the least faculty of his mind.

Dr. Banting — He said he was not overdone with it, his faculties were nicely balanced.

Dr. Beaumont — That is the true version.

Dr. Banting — And we are also agreed, that there are his sons in the Gospel who quite make up for him. (Cheers and laughter.)

Mr. Hudd, to show the estimation in which the Theological Institution was held, stated that he had a donation of 500l. from a gentleman not a member of the Methodist Society. (Cheers, especially from the students, who were in a body under the pulpit gallery.)

Mr. Farmer here contributed 100 guineas, as an expression of respect for Mr. Hattersworth.

J. Wood, Esq., of Manchester, here asked who of them would say, who of them could say, with even the shadow of truth, that the former days were better than these? Who after this, would ever believe all that fell from the lips of his respected and rev. friend, Dr. Banting? "Why, my reverend friend told us, quies came to the metropolis, the metropolis would do but little. 'Oh,' said he, 'you must come to London, and if you kindle the fire there as you have kindled it here, we shall see blessed days; but you really must come to kindle the fire.' Let me tell my Manchester friends, some of whom are here, I believe we are going to lose the glory."

Mr. Chappell — I rejoice at it.

Mr. Wood — But I don't, I hope we shall have another list sent round among our Lancashire friends rather than be exceeded. Now, one word to my friend Dr. Beaumont: is he here?

Dr. Beaumont — Are you going to break a lance with me? (Loud laughter.)

Mr. Wood — Oh no, I am not going to break a lance with you, I know better than to attempt it; (laughter.) but the Reverend Doctor adverted to this peculiarity, why was the first meeting held at Manchester? I greatly rejoice that the first meeting was held there; not because it is my town; not because it happened to be the native town of my reverend friend (Dr. Banting); though it would have been well to mark it on that account, if for no other motive; (cheers.) but I ask very seriously and solemnly, was there not something providential in that appointment? A little more than three short years ago, a faction, as contemptible in point of strength, as wicked in point of principle — a faction was raised up there, the grand object of which was to destroy, virtually destroy, our blessed and glorious economy. What was the object of that? To deprive you, sir, and my reverend friend — to deprive the pastorate of that which the great Head of the Church had bestowed upon them. To complete the whole of that mad scheme, a worse than Jewish yell was raised of "stopping the supplies." Stop the supplies! Why, can you stop the river Thames? Can you stop the sun in his career? Why, my Christian friends, are we to suppose, and do those individuals to whom I have adverted imagine, that wisdom was to live and die with them? We will not give up our judgments either to

Dr. Warren or any of his associates. Sir, I will venture to declare, before this respectable assembly, that if you are found guilty of not discharging your duty, or of mal-administration in its discharge as Christian ministers, a moral force will be brought to bear against you, and carry you down, and sink you, of itself, in everlasting shame and reproach. I ask you whether you cannot rely upon the laymen by whom you are surrounded? (Cheers.) One word, as far as his treasurer'ship was concerned, "Drive us freely as you please, and your calls will be answered. I, for one, will not be content, unless there be in the credulity of the Institution or Institutions, an admirable status of both John and Charles Wesley. ("Or in the mission premises.") With all my heart. Two good things are better than one. As to Methodism, was there any thing like it in the world? No, no. It is the glory of our country; it is the glory of the land in which we live."

A suggestion was made from different parts of the chapel, that, by an extra effort, the round sum of 10,000l. should be made up before the proceedings close.

Dr. Banting deprecated the making-up system. He would not seek to eke out the present amount by any artificial and elaborate methods.

The majority of the meeting were decidedly of this opinion.

The Rev. W. M. Banting said, adopting the principle first suggested by his father, he gave 50l. as one that mourneth for a mother, and 25l. each in remembrance of the Rev. Richard Watson and Mrs. Balmer.

At the close of the meeting, the officers and members of the Centenary Committee, with a number of other friends who had been invited to attend the meeting, dined together at the London Coffee-house, Ludgate-hill, when other contributions were announced, raising the total amount of the subscriptions for the day to about a thousand pounds.

This is a very favourable specimen of these assemblies; and we shall leave our readers to their own thoughts about it. A singular peculiarity of the contributions at these meetings is the fondness for giving in commemoration of the dead. It is a dangerous indulgence of affection; and sometimes it is rather indelicate, as when we find a man stringing together his dead wives and his living one in equal testimonials of regard; at other times it is really touching, as when a worthy missionary records the dropping of one beloved child after another, by sea and by land, in all the four quarters of the globe. The whole is a curious medley of what is grand and sad. The Methodist Connection, and the Christian Church at large, will have much cause to regret it ever occurred.

CONVERSION OF PARSEES AT BOMBAY. — In another part of our paper, we have inserted three very interesting notices, two from the Bombay Gazette, and the other from the Bombay Times, by which our readers will be in possession of the facts respecting the conversion and baptism of two Parsee youths, by the Rev. Dr. Wilson, and the enumeration which has thereby been excited at the Western Presidency. On the 10th instant, fifteen of the chief Native gentlemen of Bombay, of whom three were Hindoos, two Mahomedans, and the remainder, Parsees, addressed a letter to the Chief Secretary of Government, complaining indignantly of the charges contained in the newspapers respecting foul intentions on the part of the Parsee community, and declaring that every measure of precaution had been taken by them, to preserve the public peace, and to soothe down the irritated feelings of the people. At the same time they published a Notice to the Parsee community, requiring them to absent themselves from the Supreme Court when the case was again to be brought forward there, and leave the matter to the care of the Panchayat, "who will have no stone unturned to procure real justice" respecting it. The letter to Government received a courteous reply on the 11th. The further hearing of the case in the Supreme Court had been postponed to the 16th, to allow more time for the preparation of affidavits; and on that day, it will be seen from our last extract from the Bombay Gazette, a final decision was given in favour of the young converts.

Dr. Wilson and his spiritual children are sure to enjoy the sympathy of every true Christian; and many prayers, we trust, will be offered to God on their behalf. Their position is one of equal danger and honour. And in proportion to the greatness of both, is their need of wisdom and grace from above. To understand the case, it is necessary to remember, that Dr. Wilson has for years been learnedly and zealously assailing the Parsee faith, in public lectures, and by the press; and the Parsee people have been deeply mortified by his power, and their own weakness in argument. The present conversions they must feel to be less the fruit of the educational system of the Assembly's Seminary, than the commencement of the learned Missionary's success in combating their faith. They are, therefore, naturally alarmed; and some intemperance of language on the occasion may very well be excused. That individuals amongst them would willingly pursue a conduct as violent as any language that could be used, we have no more doubt, than we have, that men of all other communities have done the same in similar circumstances. Persecution is the course natural to such as are enemies to truth and piety, and has not always been avoided by the lovers of both. That not a few of the Parsees, therefore, are ready enough to become persecutors of their countrymen who embrace the gospel, there can be no reason to question. Happily their irritation and their power are not alike. The British Government is sufficiently strong to afford protection to all who are under its shelter.

But how strange a religious confederation has this occurrence produced! Parsees, Hindoos and Mohammedans are here uniting for mutual defence against the proselytism of Christians. There is something peculiarly in character, in the Mohammedan deprecating interference with the religious faith of Heathens, and simplicity beyond measure in their countering his advocacy. May we expect a holy alliance of the same kind in Bengal? Of the thirty millions inhabiting this province, no less than fifteen have the Mohammedans turned to their own creed, and that by no very scrupulous means. And, to this day, for one Hindu who is induced to embrace the gospel, ten, if not hundreds, are, or thousands, are taken from caste to follow the faith of Mahomet. And yet will the Mohammedans have the effrontery to object to Christian conversion, or Hindoos the folly to ask for such defenders? Besides, before Hindoos complain of Christians seeking to turn their countrymen from the national faith, they should be able to show that they do nothing of the kind themselves. It is a historical fact, that Hinduism acquired its predominance in India by the proselytism of conquest; and it is equally fact, that it is still stretching its dominion over new tribes, although no longer by arms. In Assam, there are large Missionary establishments for the propagation of Hinduism amongst the Ahoms, and the various mountain tribes. Will the Hindoos of Bengal avow, that the Gossains of Assam are pursuing a course of injustice, in worshipping themselves into the favour and belief of the mistreated tribes upon one eastern frontier? If not, let them be silent about the proselytizing efforts of Christians. For ought we know, the Parsees may be a perfectly non-proselytizing people; and may, therefore, be consistent in desiring that nobody should attempt to convert them. But if they be, one of two things must be certain: either they do not consider that their religion can confer any benefit to their fellow men,—in which case it can be no true religion at all,—or they have not benevolence enough to seek the communication of its benefits to others; and then they must be a set of selfish, ungovernable beings with whom one can have no sympathy.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, MAY 28.

Great fears are entertained respecting the safety of the Cypria Castle, which left Calcutta in August last, and had not arrived in England in March. She was spoken off Cape L'Agulles, on the 8th or 9th of December, and has not since been heard of. A large fire was seen at sea on the 15th of that month, in the track in which she was likely to have been, and it is surmised that the fire proceeded from that vessel.—The Wellfleet, 74, with the Admiral on board, has arrived at Bombay. Further particulars have been received of the cause of the rupture with the Persian authorities. It appears that the demand for the stores of the Wellfleet to pass through the Custom House, was unprecedented, and arose from the insolence of the Persian Officers; and that when the boats from the ship of war approached the shore, an attempt was made by the Persians to shoot Captain Malhal; and that a rush was made by the Persian sailors and soldiers, on the Marston. The quarrel did not originate, as one of the Bombay papers would represent it, in the pride and pique of the Admiral.—A new Company has been formed in London, on Mr. Hornum's report, for the construction of a rail-road between Diamond Harbour and Calcutta. The Court of Directors have given their sanction to the measure, and the rails have been already ordered from the Carron Company, and engines at Liverpool.—The demand for tonnage by the vessel now about to proceed to Malhal having fallen short of the supply, no action of it has taken place.—The Herfordshire, which has just made one of the quickest passages in England on record, viz. in ninety days, is to be commended on her next voyage by Capt. Alfred Chapman.—We are happy to learn, that the Company which is now about to engage in the cultivation of Tea in Assam, has secured the services of Mr. Masters, who was expelled from the Botanical Garden for the share he took in the Griffith controversy. This one of the boldest men of its success.—The Good Success, which brought the recent melancholy intelligence from China to Singapore, proceeded on to Malacca; and it is, therefore, probable, that the intelligence will be conveyed to England by the Freeland Mail, which was to have Malacca immediately after.—The Court of Directors have determined to form the Bengal Engineers into three corps, a step which will absorb all the supernumeraries, and give large promotion to this arm of the service.—We regret to learn that Mr. James Prinsep, who proceeded to England for the benefit of his health in the Herfordshire, has experienced no improvement; and we fear that the scientific world will continue to be deprived of his services.

FRIDAY, MAY 29.

Mr. Page, residing in the district of Malabar, has sent the Englishman a record of the exactions which are made by the constabulary force in that district. He states that he made his complaint to Mr. Dmelly, who issued the strictest orders for these malpractices to cease, but the Police Officers considered them as so much waste paper, and neglected to obey them.—The Englishman of this day publishes the Circular Order of the 14th July, 1857. This was the important document to which we referred to some time ago, when we alluded to the injustice of Government in neglecting to circulate translations of Orders in the Native languages, in which the Natives are so vitally interested.—Letters from England announce the death of Major General Harrier, of the Bengal establishment.—A letter, it is said, has been received from the Upper Provinces via Calcutta, stating that the miscegenary had reached CASIMIRAB.—The Rajah of Malabar has appointed one of the successful students of the Calcutta Medical College, Nubin Chund Mitter, to be his family medical attendant, on a salary of 100 Rupees a month. We are happy to learn that Messrs. Cockerell and Co. have generously allowed a Medical Student, to order ample supplies of druggists' stores at a reduced price, to enable him to set up as an apothecary in Calcutta.—The Advertiser of yesterday states, that a military gentleman at Dum-Dum had been assaulted by five of his own servants, a fact which will doubtless be adduced to prove the decay of that dignity in which the European character was once enwrapped.—The passengers of the High Lynsey, the steamer which was obliged to return, chiefly because she was overladen with military stores for Aden, have applied to the Bombay Government for leave to proceed on the Berenice, without any further payment; but the request, though supported by the practice of steamers at home, has not been complied with.—Letters from Basle describe, in deplorable terms, the distress to which all Christian merchants had been reduced by the departure of the British Resident.

SATURDAY, MAY 29.

Yesterday our beloved Queen attained the age of Twenty. This anniversary event was not celebrated in the metropolis of British India by any of those public demonstrations, which the public authorities in all other parts of the world are so eager to offer. At Barrackpore, even the ordinary compliment of hoisting the British Ensign was withheld.—Letters from Singapore state, that the Chinese are in great terror, lest the Government should sacrifice thirty-six of their countrymen, in the consecration of the new Church; the report, however absurd, was not only circulated among them, but obtained credit.—Mr Welby Jackson, the Commissioner at Moorshedabad, has been ordered to remove his Cutcherry to Calcutta, pending certain charges of corruption against a high civil functionary, which he is conducting—A gang of one hundred convicted Thugs, on their way to Calcutta, to be sent into transportation, passed last week through Moorshedabad.—A meeting has been held at Moorshedabad of the most wealthy Natives, at the house of Rajah Konwar Kistnah Roy, at which the young Rajah explained to them the nature and the objects of the plan which had been set on foot for a steam communication between England and India.—A very well written and amusing account of an extraordinary Debate in the House of Lords, appears in this day's Herkura, in which the ignorance which their Lordships so constantly exhibit on Indian affairs, is well hit off.

MONDAY, MAY 27.

Information has just been received by way of Peshawar, of the FALL OF CAKANAHAR. We are without any particulars, but it is understood that the place was sold to the British Envoy for a sum of money, between four and nine lakhs of Rupees.—A meeting has been held at Madras, on the subject of steam communication. Sir Robert Cunyn took the chair, and stated that the object of the assembly was to declare, that the Resolutions of the Calcutta Steam Meeting, held on the 11th April, were applicable to this Presidency. Subscriptions to the amount of one lakh of Rupees were entered on the list before the meeting broke up.—Letters have been received from Herat, from Lieut. Pottinger, dated the 18th March. All was quiet; the Shah, firm in his attachment to the English; and it was even said, that he would proceed to Candahar in person, to recover the guns which the British Government had destined him.—Col. Stoddart, who has been a political mission to Bokhara, has, it is affirmed, been received by the Chirko—A young Ismailin in estate of the most illustrious confusion. The misadventure of the son of the late Minister, who had been appointed his successor, had given much dissatisfaction. Col. Netherland has endeavoured to remedy this state of things, by appointing a gunelayer of five Thakours to manage affairs, over whom Major Ross, the British Resident, is to preside. It is much to be feared, that this arrangement will fail to cure the evil with which the state is distracted, through the pride and discord of the various chiefs.—A meeting was held at the Chamber of Commerce, on Saturday, for the purpose of petitioning Government to postpone the Opium sale, which had been fixed for Monday. It was determined that the Chamber, as a body, should not petition, but that those firms which felt an interest in the postponement, should individually address the public authorities.—In addition to the intelligence received from China direct, information has been conveyed to Madras, that Mr. Johnston, the Second Superintendent, was a prisoner on board the Government yacht at Mouan.—Letters, written previously to the FALL of CAKANAHAR, state that the number of persons forming the camp of the British army at Queita, did not fall far short of eighty thousand souls.

TUESDAY, MAY 28.

A trial has been referred by Capt. Jenkins, the Commissioner in Assam, to the Nizamut Adawlat, of a very atrocious murder. The wife of one of the Garoah Chieftains, who had adopted Jugget as her son, died about a year ago, and her funeral rites could not be performed for want of a human scalp to bury with her corpse. Jugget accordingly came down to the plains, slew the first youth he met, cut off his head, and made off with it. He has been tried and found guilty, and Capt. Jenkins has recommended that he should be transported for life.—It is stated that Capt. Lawrence's troop of Horse Brigade, now stationed at Nilow, is under orders to proceed to Bombay after the rain, to form part of the force which is destined against Persia.—A sale of two thousand four hundred chests of Opium took place yesterday, at the Exchange, upon an average of 235 Rs. a chest for Bhatia, and 190 Rs. for Benares. Such a sale never was known before. The highest price ever obtained for Opium was in 1824, when four thousand Rupees a chest was paid for a large quantity.

We beg to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of the following for the Friend of India:—

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

LIEUT. PUTTINGER.

The history of the affair is this. The Minister sent his brother to Lieut. Pottinger, requesting an advance of money to his (the Minister's) quota of troops. This he refused, unless some decided change was made in the system of extortion and tyranny pursued toward the people of the city. High words ensued, which ended in imposing upon Lieut. Pottinger the necessity of turning the Minister's brother out of doors. The house was soon surrounded by soldiery, and one man (we believe a servant or retainer of our gallant countryman) was seized and his right hand cut off, but, whether in an affray, or, by order, does not clearly appear. The people and Synds unanimously took up the part of Lieut. Pottinger; and after various messages and visits, the Shah was made to comprehend the true nature of the case; he promised to pardon the mutilated man; to punish the persons who had wounded him; and to send the Minister to apologize in the public Adawlat, whither Lieut. Pottinger was to proceed, escorted by all the ministers of Government. He agreed, also, to order those changes in the system which had been demanded. Lieut. Pottinger declares that both King and people are ready to throw themselves into our arms, and that we can establish our rule, or, our influence, as it may seem best to us, from the Oxus to the Sea Indus Temples.—Bansley Times, May 8.

IDOLATROUS TEMPLES.

The future management, repair, and support of the temples and pagodas in which Native paganism has become, and the recent orders of the Court of Directors for the abolition of the Government Tax, a nice and somewhat difficult question. We mentioned lately that the Dairama Sabha had held a meeting, and determined to solicit the Government to transfer the management to their hands, and we confess, looking at the origin and constitution of that body,—the popularity it enjoys throughout the orthodox portion of the Hindoo peninsula in Bengal, and the previous as far Westward as Allahabad,—we thought that a better choice could scarcely have been made. The Friend of India, however, takes upon himself (most gratuitously and uncharitably in our humble opinion,) to declare that in the hands of the Dairama Sabha, the collection and appropriation of the offerings would be sure to be abused, but he does not point out a remedy for this imaginary violation of trust; he neither suggests a better mode of regulating the necessary levy, nor mentions a more honest body of stewards. To suppose that by requiring the Government to wash its hands of the Pilgrim Tax, a blow has thereby been levelled at idolatrous worship and pilgrimages, is altogether to suppose the Native a very differently constituted being in respect to the passions to what experience has taught us to believe him. It is also supposing a crude theory to the digested opinion of some of our best and wisest statesmen. Mr. James Mill, Mr. Fleming, Holt Mackenzie, Mr. David Mill, Sir John Malcolm, Mr. Chaplin, and others, have deliberately recorded their opinion, that the abolition of the tax, would tend directly to increase the number of pilgrims and augment the mischief, the tumult and bloodshed, probably consequent upon their assembly in large bodies when in a high state of religious excitement. The same men have also protested (and in this they have been joined by Mr. Mountstuart Elphinstone,) against the supposition that the levy of the tax, identifies the Government with idolatry—and they have moreover unhesitatingly declared their conviction, that the effect of the abolition of the tax, would be to throw the poor devotees into the hands of the offending Brahmins, whose grasping extortion would inevitably convert the whole revenue and all its horrible results. Now, we do not desire to revive the question of the Government connection with idolatry as supposed to be involved in its collection of the Pilgrim Tax, for that may be regarded as settled by the voluntary relinquishment announced in the despatch we published the other day. But since it is quite obvious that the abandonment of the impost is utterly inefficient as a means of putting a stop to idolatrous worship, and has rather a tendency to increase it, we confess to a little anxiety that such measures should be taken as shall secure to the future pilgrims the smallest possible amount of exaction, and the amplest protection consistently with the new position taken up by Government. Of course, the authorities will scarcely carry out the principle of non-interference so far as to issue orders for the complete withdrawal of all connexion with the temples, without enacting some adequate substitutes or successors in the business of control. The effect of so sudden and total a cessation of all share in the due regulation of the toll and the appropriation of its proceeds, would be to open the door to intrigues and cabals without number, dangerous to the peace of the country, and prejudicial to the safety of the thousands of pilgrims. They,—the Government,—will naturally look about for such a body of inheritors as offer the best assurance that the duty which, under present circumstances, must unavoidably devolve on some body, will be performed with integrity and prudence. Then comes the question, where is such a body to be found? If the Dharmra Subba,—composed, as we understand it to be, of wealthy and upright Hindoos, devoted to the observances of their faith, and above the temptation to extortion and peculation,—if they be unfit for the slow and laborious superintending the management of the temple, at least as far as their influence over a proportion of the Hindoo community is known to extend, to whom can it with safety be confided? We have said that the question of future management is one of difficulty;—we repeat it, and we confess that no better solution of the difficulty presents itself than the consilium of the duty to the institution we have named. It is easy for the Friend of India, or any other enemy to the toleration of Hindoo worship, to aggravate the troubles of the Government under the new order of things, by casting a slur on the probity of the first parties named, as competent trustees; but we opine that it is not quite so simple to suggest a better set of stewards, or to point out an easier remedy for the inconvenience now arising. We shall look to our contemporary for a full exposition of his views on this matter, for, with all our respect for him, we cannot accept his ipse dixit. In the meantime, should he notice these observations, we would beg of him to bear in mind, that we offer no opinion upon the virtue of religious pilgrimages and offerings, whatever we may think of the effect of the former upon the cause of civilization:—We merely advance that the pilgrimages as well, in all probability, suggest,—that the reports and propagation of the legends, consequently, be attended to,—and that, therefore, some steps should be taken for entrusting in matters of persons of sanctity, in whose integrity and purity reliance can be placed.—*Eng. #### BOMBAY: BAPTISM OF A PARSEE CONVERT.

On Wednesday evening (1st May) the sacred rite of baptism was administered to a Jew, Dhanuboy Nowrojee, by the Rev. Doctor Wilson, at the Scottish Mission House. The church was crowded with Europeans and Native, many of the latter belonging to the tribe of the convert, and deep was their sensation to behold the faith of Zoroaster openly renounced by one of their number, who, in their presence, adjured the errors of his ancestors, and was received into the communion of the Christian Church. After being interrogated by Doctor Wilson of the renunciation of his former creed, and his belief in the Gospel of Christ, the young man drew forth a paper, from which he read a minute detail of all the circumstances, which eventually led him to his present effecting position. It appeared from this, that he is a student in the General Assembly's Institution in this place, and that he was one of the first scholars on its foundation, which took place about four years ago. For these two last years, he has been able to read and understand correctly the Bible in the English language. As he pursued it, its doctrines became the subject of anxious study and reflection; and his enquiries were aided by the instructions of his teachers, and by converse with his Christian friends. More than a year has now elapsed, since he has rejected the Parsee religion, and ceased to pay respect to the ceremonies of the Parsee. Eight months ago, he became a candidate for baptism; and the sincerity of his faith has been rigidly scrutinized and tested by the long and trying probation of that period. He had, some months ago, warned his uncle, one of his nearest relations alive, of his change of faith, and his determination to embrace the cause of Christianity; but little belief was given to his assertion, until other circumstances conspired to show that his intentions were not to be doubted. Two other students of the same estate also became candidates for baptism. Their resolutions were also communicated to their relatives. The flame of this defection from a faith, which their exclusive customs had taught the Zoroastrians to consider as impregnable to all the efforts of proselytism, filled the whole estate with amazement; and after some time had been spent in wonder, and astonishment, and deep consultation, the two last mentioned youths were put under forcible restraint. One of them, named Hormusjee Pestonjee, a member, we believe, of the Sussanah family, made his escape from the hands of his relations, who were about to remove him from the island, and fled away to Doctor Wilson's house, where he is now sheltered, and from whence he deliberately refuses to depart. On Monday last, an attempt was made to carry him away by violence, from Doctor Wilson's house; but it was defeated by the assistance of his domestic and some Madrassah teachers, who, alarmed by the rumor, came running to his rescue. Being failed in the endeavour, the parties then went away, and shortly after returned with a policeman, and tried to have the young man removed on a charge of his having carried away some of the family jewels; but this scheme, we are informed, was found wholly impracticable, and has been abandoned. Meanwhile Dhanuboy, who had been crying for some time at Dr. Wilson's bungalow at Malabar Hill, in order to assist the studies of a holy learning Gujaratee, was made acquainted with what had transpired, and being afraid that violence would be used towards him, were he to return home, also claimed the asylum of the Mission House. His friends came there in quest of him, attended by a member of the Panchayat, but neither their tears nor entreaties, nor their most affecting lamentations, could shake him from the prosecution of a design, which had been for months determined. These things being the whole of these trying scenes, Doctor Wilson maintained the greatest equanimity and forbearance, and, though variously assailed by the fiercest reproaches and incentives, and the most moving appeals to his sympathy, he failed not to observe that consistency of mind and behaviour which became his holy vocation, and we have no doubt that he was greatly supported by the counsel and countenance of his numerous friends.

The duties of the evening commenced a little after seven o'clock, and the sacred ordinance was administered to Dhanuboy at an early part of the service. During the performance of the ceremony, we were gratified to observe, that the utmost decorum prevailed throughout the thronged assemblage; and while the convert, in a clear, unfeigned voice, proclaimed his faith, and besought his countrymen to follow his example; and while he held down the Koster or sacred thread of the Parsee cross upon the table, not a murmur, indicating either rage or sorrow or contempt, was heard to interrupt the solemnity of the occasion. The other student, Hormusjee Pestonjee, also decidedly renounced the faith of Zoroaster, and laid down the Koster. Doctor Wilson declared that he was satisfied with his sincerity, and pronounced that he would speedily baptize him. We have not heard what has ensued to the student, who is a young man, whose language, his relation to the Gospel, forthwith want a report speaks of his being a young Surat. After delivering some affecting counsel to the two youths, relative to the trials and dangers that awaited them, and the difficulties they would have to encounter, Doctor Wilson then preached a sermon fitted to the occasion, taking for his text, the address of Jehovah to the Parsee Almonarch Cyrus, as found in Isaiah xlv. 1-7 &c. The sermon was replete with information, and the learned research and studious investigation, and, if printed, which we hope it may be, it cannot fail to be a most valuable and illustrative acquisition to literature and history. The learned Doctor commenced by giving a succinct statement, formed from a diligent comparison of the testimony afforded by the Greek and Roman Fathers and Historians, with that of the Armenians, as to the early propagation of Christianity among the followers of Zoroaster. His early collection of the fragments of the Magi, the persecution which it endured from the hands of Saur and Artabanus, &c., were held forth with the consummate skill and authority of one thoroughly versed in the history of these days; and the evidence derived from the Armenian writers, furnishing as they are for original illustration and comment on the former progress and strength of Christianity in Persia, was brought forward in the most strong and convincing form by the learned Doctor. In the consideration of each clause of the text, the Doctor then resounded the Parsee notions of the Divine nature, their different objects of worship, and of their system of providence, as stated in their own sacred books, which were contrasted with the revelations on these subjects, as they appear in the page of the Bible. The learned Doctor was too extensive to complete his discourse, and the service was concluded with prayer by Doctor Stevenson. We bear that much agitation prevails throughout the Parsee community, and that they have some notions of trying the issue of a legal procedure. We have also heard that Nowrojee Dhanuboy, the Editor of the Chabook, was stoned while on his way to the Mission House, and obliged to turn back.

We understand; moreover, that many of the Parsees have withdrawn their children from the Institution, and that many of the students have left it with the deepest reluctance. An indication, on the principles on which it is conducted, must, however, expect many reverses of this nature, until conversions are so common as to pass without note. We hear also, that the Parsees are going to subscribe, and erect another school in opposition; but who will teach it? The Parsees have shown great weakness of sense, when they fly from an institution, as it begins to develop its energies. But they cannot say that any deception, or even the shadow of a deception has been used. From the beginning, they have been told that their conversion was the sole end pursued in giving them education.

The last of May, 1839, may be henceforth reckoned as great an epoch in the annals of the Parsees as the day of Cadesai.—Bombay Gazette.

SECOND PARSEE YOUTH BAPTIZED: AND APPEARANCE OF THE PARTIES IN THE FOREMAN COURT.

Since our last, the case of the Parsee youths who have abandoned the religion of Zoroaster, and embraced Christianity, has continued to grow in importance and serious interest. (A second youth, Hormusjee Pestonjee, aged 18, was baptized on Sunday, (3rd May) in the Scotch Church. There were few Parsees present, but this was not the consequence of apathy; for, on the 1st of May, we understood, a meeting of the members of the Panchayat, and some of the leaders of the Hindoo community, was held, at the house of Franchise Cowasjee, for the purpose of deliberating upon the extraordinary crisis which they consider as impending on their respective creeds, and concerting measures to avert it. We understand that the following to be the result of this and previous meetings. In the first place, all the Parsee boys have been withdrawn from the General Assembly's and all other Missionary schools, and a decree has been passed, by the Panchayat, forbidding any parent or guardian, under pain of utter outlawry from the Parsee religion and society, ever to send a child to any educational establishment with which Missionaries are connected, or where the Bible is used. Secondly, a fund is to be raised to establish, in the Fort, an opposition school where religion is to be excluded—thirdly, a petition is in course of preparation, to the British Parliament, praying that no more Missionaries may be permitted to come out to India, or, if permitted, that they be strictly prohibited from any attempts at proselytism, and a sum has been appropriated for the purpose of sending one or two European boys Hindoos of the place have been prevailed on to join this league against the Missionaries, and negotiations have been opened with the Mahomedans for the same purpose. A writ of Habeas Corpus, issued last week, to Dr. Wilson, to produce the person of Dhanjeebhoy Nowrojee, one of the youths recently baptised, alleged to be a minor, was returnable on Monday morning, at 11 o'clock, and the Court was crowded by Europeans and Parsees. The Advocate General, the Chief Justice sat in Chambers. The Advocate General and Mr. Montrose appeared, on behalf of the youth's uncle, to claim custody of his person, and at their side were ranged the members of the Panchayat, and all the principal Parsees and Hindoos of the island, most anxious for the success of his application. Mr. Campbell appeared for Dr. Wilson, who brought into Court the young man, Dhanjeebhoy Nowrojee, and the Court was informed, and stated, in his return to the writ, that he exercised no restraint over them, but, that they, of their own accord, sought protection in his house, not deeming their persons or lives safe among their own relatives and countrymen. After some discussion among the professional gentlemen, Mr. Campbell was allowed to put in and read affidavits from Dr. Wilson, Dr. Stevenson, the baptised youth Dhanjeebhoy Nowrojee, and others, the substance of which was as follows:—That the General Assembly's School had been established with the avowed object of inculcating the religion of the Bible; that the parents were warned of this and sent their children there with a full knowledge of the risk incurred;—that Dhanjeebhoy Nowrojee had been three or four years in the School, and distinguished for his capacity and industrious disposition;—that several months ago he had claimed his religious observance from the Parsees, which fact was well known to his relatives;—that he had on one occasion refused to carry an offering of sandal to the fire-temple when ordered by his uncle;—that he had told his uncle he intended to embrace Christianity;—that after this his uncle had permitted him still to attend the School, to live and sleep at Dr. Wilson's house, and to accompany him on his missionary tours through the temple;—that Dr. Wilson on being asked, by Dhanjeebhoy, to administer baptism to him some months ago, declined doing so till a longer probation had tried the sincerity of his motives and firmness of his resolves;—that so far from holding out any worldly inducements or promises to him, he had warned him that, if he became a Christian, he must make up his mind to suffer privation and persecution;—that, on asking him for his reasons for wishing to be baptised, Dhanjeebhoy had drawn out, unaided, a paper which was annexed and read, containing those reasons;—that it was not till after a long and satisfactory probation, and full information had been given his relatives, that the rite had been administered;—that the youth was believed to be 16 years and 6 months old, and, therefore, of full age according to Parsee and Hindoo usage;—that the maternal uncle who now claimed his custody did so, not of his own motion, but at the instance of the Parsee community;—that, though long a kind friend to him, he was not (if he were decided to be a minor) his legal guardian, as he had a paternal uncle living near Surat;—that two Parsees had lately forced themselves upstairs into Dr. Wilson's house, and, after reviling and assaulting him and Dhanjeebhoy, attempted to remove the latter by violence;—that Dhanjeebhoy was under no restraint, but, of his own motion, Dr. Wilson's house from the violence which he dreaded from the Parsees, and that his life would not be safe if he were forced to return to his uncle, as the latter had no means of protecting him from the fury of the other Parsees. The Advocate General requested time to prepare counter affidavits to disprove the assertions regarding the danger to which Dhanjeebhoy would be exposed, if returned to his uncle's custody, and other matters contained in those now read. The Chief Justice granted till Friday, or, in case that were not sufficient, till Monday next, and ordered that, in the meantime, Dhanjeebhoy should be at liberty to go where he chose; any attempt to interfere with his liberty would be punishable, not only by the ordinary process before a jury, but, if circumstances rendered it necessary, summarily as a contempt of Court. Dhanjeebhoy on this came forward, and, in the face of all that was said, wealthy and powerful, and dangerous among his own countrymen arrayed against him; the dignitaries of the Panchayat expressing a calm condemnation of his conduct, and a thousand other Parsees betraying scorn or hostility in their looks, he modestly and firmly declared his determination to remain with Dr. Wilson. The appearance of this youth is singularly interesting: a more ingenuous or happy countenance we have never seen; and while we fully appreciate and allow for the natural feelings of anger which his countrymen must feel at his renunciation of their ancient faith, and the still livelier regrets which his relations must suffer from a step which in their eyes estranges, for ever, a once beloved youth from their family, we would exclaim, in the words of the poet, "How much more noble than to behold his conduct in this trying crisis without being strongly impressed with the moral elevation which distinguished his position. In proof of the strong feelings entertained among the Parsees, regarding this affair, we might refer to the articles which have recently appeared in the Darbida and Samachar, some of which are in a tone of great excitement. But, of this fact, there was, unfortunately, too abundant evidence on Monday. As soon as the Court rose, Dr. Wilson walked down with the two Parsee youths in his carriage. The crowd made a rush upon them, but, as several European gentlemen were present, they were allowed to enter the carriage. As soon as the door was closed, a Parsee put his head in and said, "Dhanjeebhoy! your mother will come and dash out her brains at your feet, and then you and these Missionaries will fill her grave with her murder." As soon as the carriage attempted to drive off, several of the Parsees caught hold of the wheels and endeavored to stop it—on its moving on, the whole Parsee mob followed shouting out—"cease, kill it! a few called out to the others, "stop, don't pursue the carriage, don't set like fools!"—but, many declared loudly they would willingly sacrifice their own lives in order to take Dhanjeebhoy's. In these violent proceedings, however, none of the respectable Parsees joined. In noticing this fact, so creditable to these latter gentlemen, we take the opportunity to express a hope that they will use their influence to calm the excitement of their poorer countrymen, and suppress them with the dangerous consequence of breaking the law or attempting anything against the persons of the converts. They have a perfect right to withdraw their children from the Mission School;—to establish other schools, or to petition Parliament, if they choose. These are perfectly legitimate means, and, while they confine themselves to such, no one can blame them;—but any attempt at violence to the persons of the converts or the Missionaries, without promising the slightest good, will only lead to a violation of the law, and a collision with the authorities whose duty it is to punish such violation. For our own part we would respectfully suggest that the wisest and best plan, in regard to these youths, is to remove them to their own village, and consider them as no longer belonging to the community. What are three youths among almost 200,000 Parsees, for their sake, the peace of the whole should be endangered? we repeat it, let them follow their heart's quietude, and the present excitement will soon be forgotten.—Hon. Times, May 8.

DECISION OF THE CASE IN THE SUPREME COURT.

Yesterday, the case of Dhanjeebhoy Nowrojee, the convert from the faith of Zoroaster, was decided. Five affidavits were put in by the Counsel for the Plaintiff or Plaintiffs, for we really cannot say which, and these were completely overthrown by a number of affidavits on the other side. One of the affidavits, on the part of the prosecution, was the conjoint production of the most influential Parsees of this place, who are all either Justices of the Peace, or members of the Parsee Panchayat. This affidavit held forth the monstrous doctrine that no Parsee is ever master of himself while a superior relation is alive over him, and that to the will of this superior he is bound in every action, in which conscience or principles have a part. The sway of the poter punitiva extends over the actions of the man; and he is the whole slave of his superior authority, to which resistance is accounted a most heinous and heinous crime, and a mad delusion. We never heard of a more degrading dogma of faith or domestic slavery openly avowed; we never heard, and never—never—expect to hear again such a tenet of moral doctrine defended by all the art and sophistry of British eloquence. Mr. Campbell, the counsel for the defendant, in a speech of the most splendid eloquence, laid open the base and heinous nature of the case, in the most lucid and convincing manner. He fully demonstrated, that the Parsees had no internal law of caste—that they were completely subject to the law of England. He refuted, in the fullest manner, the employment plea that the Parsees were ignorant of Christianity being taught in the Assembly's School, with a view to the conversion of the Natives. He rent to pieces the affidavits of the members of the Panchayat; laid bare its numerous shifts and evasions; and asked them how they dared to proffer an affidavit full of such enormous assertions. Deeply must many have felt the hot and burning search of his angry eloquence, when throughout all the affidavits, statement after statement, and assertion after assertion, were branded as the artifices of those, who are ready to sacrifice truth, and conscience, and integrity, and honour—all for the attainment of their object. We do regret that the eloquence of Mr. Campbell has not been, at least to our knowledge, fully reported.

It would be useless to advert to the arguments, on the Plaintiff side, in a case too powerfully grounded on the principles of natural justice, reason and intuition, to be galled by any effort of forensic skill and ingenuity. The task of opposing the exercise of civil and religious liberty, must always, to a Briton, be a laborious one—one which cannot but weigh with a damping and oppressive weight upon every sentiment of his heart—one which repels every gush of innate feeling; and which, like the bead of Medusa hardens all the sympathies of the soul, and all the imagery of the mind, into cold and motionless stone. We did pity the Plaintiff's Counsel; we were pained for them, when we heard them endeavouring, in the most dreary manner, to argue the fact of the Parsee being ignorant of the principles of Christianity being taught in the Assembly's school, with a view to their conversion,—a fact, which we really think, every cooley in Bombay is well aware of.

A number of affidavits, from most respectable individuals, testified plainly, that the converts had every thing to fear from the Parsees; and when we consider, that they are now repudied by the Parsees as aliens from their caste, we really cannot see their object far getting them back again. They cannot re-convert them; and what, in the world, can they want with them? The Panchayat of every caste in Bombay must be aware, that its authority can only extend as far as the individuals of each caste or tribe choose to submit to it; but the moment any one chooses to reject its authority, its power, over this one, is completely gone, and any exertion, on its part, to meddle, would be tantamount to the sacred inheritance of Englishmen, and the bright symbol of their sovereignty. The keeping of this sacred charge is committed to the Courts, the Governors, the Magistrates, which England has appointed to administer, and watch over the unsullied purity of her laws. Her liberty has been won amidst the tempest of hostile factions, and the shock of revolutions. It is the seal with which she seals her conquests; the mark with which she marks the nations of her dominion. The liberty she confers is common to all, nor is it destined to be subverted by the terrors of superstition, or the prejudices of caste, or the wrath of a Panchayat.

Numerous cases were adduced and cited, in which the decision of English Courts permitted youngsters of fourteen to choose their guardians; and the whole of the law of precedent which bore upon the case, was shewn forth in a most satisfactory manner.

His Lordship, after briefly advertent to the principles which bore upon the matter, rejected the motion which had been made, and decided that Dupleebay might go where he pleased.

We were glad to see, that nothing but peace, and good order, prevailed among the numbers, which collected round Duror Wilson and the two youths, on their way to their carriage. The only excitement in the crowd, which was composed principally of Hindoos and Mussulmen, seemed to be that of curiosity.

We also observed that the military and police were on the alert. We hear that the rule niat granted on account of the other Parsee convert, Hurnoojee Peshoojee, is withdrawn.—Bombay Gazette, May 17.

LOTTERIES AND GAMING.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR,—The love of money may be termed the master-passion of the world. The pursuits of the greatest portion of mankind, lead to the conclusion, that the possession of wealth is accounted the grand secret of happiness. From our earliest infancy, we are taught to look to gold as one of the most desirable objects in existence. Every thing around us shews a marked respect to riches, and tends to foster a desire for independence; while education too often points to it, as an object of generous ambition. The preceptive lesson is of less force than the example of our friends. Man, in ten thousand ways, continues to "run greedily after the error of Balaam;" and still supposes that gain is godliness!

But the most prevailing and objectionable form the love of money takes in our day, is that of Gambling. This, in whatever flimsy disguise it may attempt to hide itself, from Public Lotteries down to the vulgar "thimble rig," originates from the desire and expectancy of increasing one's own property, in reality at the expense of others.

1. Public Gaming by Lotteries.—This, as most of your readers are aware, has been prohibited in England, by Act of Parliament, in consequence of the great injury Lotteries inflicted on the public, in a moral, religious and political point of view. The late attempt of a member of Parliament (Mr. Bish, the great Lottery bolder), to re-establish Lotteries, met with little encouragement, and deserved great contempt, as emanating from an interested individual, who had already made a fortune, at the expense of that public, he there pretended to serve and represent. In rising to oppose this motion, an honourable member (by no means distinguished as a religious character,) expressed the readiness of Her Majesty's Ministers, on the contrary, to co-operate in expelling the Lottery nuisance from the Colonies!

Some of the evils resulting from this gambling by communities, will be found not inapplicable to India, and have been thus described:—

"Public gaming by Lotteries, so far from being less criminal than other species of this vice, is the worst of them all; for it abets, and sometimes, as far as example and concurrence can do it, a practice which opens the door to every species of fraud and villany; which is pregnant with the most extensive evils to the community and to individuals; which seldom fails to bring several to an untimely end by suicide, or the sentence of the law; which unsettles an immense multitude from the honest employment of their station, to run in quest of imaginary wealth; and which exposes them to manifold temptations; unites them from returning to their usual mode of life; and often materially injures their circumstances, breaks their spirits, sours their tempers, and excites the worst passions of which they are susceptible."

Our "Government Lotteries" are peculiarly injurious to the Native part of the community; but to trace the several stages of this increasing evil, would take up longer space than you may be inclined to allow any reformer of the public morals.

The results of this gambling by wholesale, as a matter of course are unsatisfactory in general, Government being the only caro guiner in the transaction; but the foul spirit of gambling is becoming so effectually transfused among all ranks of the Natives, that there are, probably, few of the lower classes at the Presidency, who do not dabble in these matters, to the extent of their ability. Head mistresses and labourers, allured by the prospect of becoming rich, take tickets between them. Managers and writers in the public offices, tempted by Government's grand bait, the lakh, unite to do the same; and thus throughout all orders of society, the Natives have imbibed the spirit of gambling to an incredible extent.

1. Of my personal knowledge, a blind man who supports himself and family by begging, is in the habit of taking a ticket in the Lottery!

2. I was informed by a distributor of these tickets, that a few months ago, the Lottery-mania was so great, and the supply so unequal to the demand, (though he had received his full share,) that before the doors were opened, individuals of all classes were crowding round the Pay Office, from the Divisional General in full plume, down to the mean public servant of five Rupees a month! The tickets were sold in a very few minutes, when this poor man contrived the Paymaster to let him have a ticket; and with a face full of anxiety, mentioned that he had only 3 Rupees a month—that he had been for two years saving the price of a ticket from his pittance, and now he had come to buy out, they were all sold!

Europeans do not, nor can they fully know, the agitation, uncertainty and discontent occasioned by Lottery speculation among the Natives; but it is certain, that the cause of virtue, morality, and the public good, demands an immediate cessation of these mischievous "Schemes." I have no Indian "Schemes" to refer to, but in England each person who took a share, staked three to two on an even chance of getting a prize!

These may be thought unfair arguments against Lotteries, as each purchaser is a voluntary contributor to the general stock; but it must not be forgotten, he is only so, in the hope of getting his neighbour's money! Selfishness is essentially the object of purchasing, and not the realisation of wealth for mutual benefit. No one cares who may be the sufferer; whether the "General," or the "man on 5 Rupees a month;" nor does any enquire how the purchase-money was obtained by the rest of the fraternity, whether by contracting debts or open robbery. If I greatly mistake not, the late Post Office robbery at Bangalore, was occasioned by this spirit of gambling seeking means for the purchase of tickets on a more extensive plan. It may be questioned, indeed, whether Government has not tempted its own servants to dishonesty, in more cases than I feel myself at liberty to record.

I take the liberty, however, of asking LORD ELPHINSTONE and the members of the Madras Government, why, with the example of England before them, and some knowledge of the miseries Lotteries have produced in France, they continue to allow those corrupters of the public morals to spring from the Madras Government? Are Lotteries less detrimental to the poor deluded Natives of India, than to the people of England? Or, are these seductive speculations more fitted to improve the Native character? Certainly not. The evils are aggravated three-fold; and those in authority will do well to remember they are legislators for the public good.

If sceptical to the bad morality, and blind to the consequences of the Lottery imposture, they will continue it; the duty of the Christian and the philanthropist is plain. It behoves all who have the benefit of the Natives at heart, to urge by Petition, the abolition of Government gambling transactions.

2. Gambling on the Races Course.—I propose briefly to touch upon this part of the subject. The principle, selfishness; and the incentive, suppbly, being in both cases the same; the racing character is no less culpable than the fortune seeker by Lotteries.

The passion for gaming by Racing, though confessedly more confined to Europeans, is likewise extending itself gradually among the Natives. The common pleas of "amusement," and "keeping up the breed of good horses," are far-fetched and deceptive excuses of cozenage. In a few solitary cases, sport may be the object; but gambling is the very "essence of the amusement;" and without it, "the lovers of sport" would very soon pronounce the Turf insipid and unattractive. There are no Races in Arabia.

From the debauchery and vice attendant on the Races in England, the Indian Course is pretty free; but who will venture to deny that in India, envy, malice, pride, hatred and contention are the natural fruits of such diversions? "It is idle to say, 'I sanction the innocent amusement, but deprecate the evils as much as any one'; for it is clear we cannot support the one, without promoting the other." The whole system is, and must be, evil; and all the vice and ruin connected with it, are justly chargeable upon every person, who in any way supports or promotes it, by his personal influence or by his pecuniary aid.

As a proof that the expense of racing is not undertaken for mere pleasure, or love of sport, the public is frequently called upon to encourage, and individuals are taxed to support it. Thus we have the Nizam and others laid under annual contribution for a cup; and, also that I should write it, we have "The Ladies Purse," or "Cup."

There is no practice so bad, but men will directly or indirectly strive to defend it; and though in this attack upon fashion and public sentiment I may provoke sarcasm, and draw down ridicule in abundance, I will not shrink from opposition, because I know my cause is good.

I call, therefore, upon every generous mind and virtuous character, to discourage, by every lawful means, gambling in all its branches, especially the more plausible, public and notorious kinds, LOTTERIES AND RACES.

Your obedient servant,

July, 1838.

RELIGIOUS.

SECESSIONS FROM THE CHURCH.—The neighbourhood of Stamford has been distinguished within these few years by secessions from the Established Church on the part of several of her best-blooded ministers—and ministers possessing every large portion within her pale, which they have surrendered for conscience sake. Mr. Tiptaft and Mr. Philpot (the former lately vicar of Sutton Courtyard, in Berkshire, and the latter rector of Great Eversden, in Northamptonshire, both which they resigned on their secession from the Establishment) have been for some years preaching in Calvinist chapels at Stamford and in the neighbourhood; and to their ranks is now added the Rev. F. Tryon, vicar of Deeping St. James, (brother of the late parliamentary candidate for the north division of Northamptonshire, and nephew of the Lady Sophia Whishoot), who, it is stated, has this week sent to the Bishop of Lincoln his resignation of his preferment in the Church, and signified his dissent from her doctrines and communion, as they are ordinarily accepted and acted upon. The subject is one which at this time very much engrosses conversation in the neighbourhood.—Lincoln Mercury.

REV. DOCTOR JOSEPH WOLFE, missionary to the Jews in Palestine and Syria, has been appointed perpetual curate of Littlestone, near Huddersfield, by the Bishop of Ripon.—Christ. Adv.

DEBARRALS OF INFANT BAPTISM.—The Bishop of London has been pleased to inform the Upper House, that the number of baptisms performed by the Established clergy had greatly fallen off in certain parishes, in consequence of the Registration Act; at which he expressed his regret, evidently deeming the fact a proof of the injuriousness of that Act. It is obvious (as a correspondent of the Patriot remarks) that there is no unanimity in the Registration Act to diminish the number of baptisms celebrated from religious feeling, the only proper motive for the practice of such a rite. The only baptisms that could be prevented by this Act, would be those which took place for the mere purpose of obtaining civil registration, which would, of course, be no longer necessary. If the Act in question have been the means of preventing such baptisms, so far from being injurious to the Church of England, as a spiritual institution, it has been the means of removing from her a reproach, a stigma, and a disgrace, which every pious layman of that Church, and especially every pious clergyman, could not but most sincerely deplore.—Ibid.

THE COMMISSION OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY, which met lately at Edinburgh, has refused to adopt a resolution brought forward by the Rev. Dr. Bryce, late of Calcutta, to the effect that the Church of Scotland acknowledge the jurisdiction of the civil tribunals of the country in all matters of civil interest. Mr. Dunlop, the present leader of the Kirk, declaring, and being upheld by the majority of the Commission, that "whenever the question arises 'what is civil,' or 'what belongs to the things that are Cæsar's,' the Church of Scotland admits no civil tribunal upon earth to be the Judge of that question!" The same Commission has, in effect, also declared that the system of lay patronages, now maintained by the laws of the State and of the Church, is "contrary to the word of God," in its refusal to adopt another resolution, brought forward by Dr. Bryce, that such representations as had been made of this system, at a great meeting of Ministers and Elders of the Church, in commemoration of the celebrated Glasgow Assembly in 1638, were unjust, unbecoming in men who were indebted to it for their own status in the Church, and calculated to bring the name of the land into contempt with those who were bound to obey it. And to crown the work, the commission has also held it forth to the world, that it is the doctrine of the Church of Scotland, that Presbytery alone has any foundation or warrant in Scripture. This doctrine had also been propounded at the "Great National Synod," which had been held to celebrate the deposition of the Bishops by the Glasgow Assembly, in 1688; and received the sanction of the Commission in refusing, in a third resolution, also moved by Dr. Bryce to the effect, that such was not the doctrine of the Kirk, and that the language in which it had been set forth was uncourteous towards the Church of England; was proving most injurious to the cause of Church endowment now before Parliament; and ought to be as publicly discontinued by the Church of Scotland as it had been proclaimed at the commemorating meeting!—Advocate.

AN END TO CHURCH-EXTENSION.—On Tuesday night Lord Melbourne gave the Earl of Galloway clearly to understand, that there was no prospect of a Parliamentary grant for the extension of the Church of Scotland. Under the head of "Church of Scotland" will be found a reprint of a discussion in the Presbytery of Edinburgh, which will sufficiently account for this grievous disappointment. The Established Church of North Britain has laid claim to independence of the state, and to that independence the state has determined to abandon it. Thus "vanishing ambition o'erleaps itself, and fall on either side."—Christ. Adv.

DEPUTATION TO PALESTINE.—At a meeting of the General Assembly's Committee for the Conversion of the Jews, held in Edinburgh last week, it was unanimously agreed to send a deputation immediately to Palestine, to learn the state of the Jewish people in that country, so that steps may be taken towards a mission; the deputation afterwards to visit the Jews, and collect information in those parts of the Continent where they most abound. At the head of the deputation is Dr. Black, Professor of Theology, Aberdeen. The whole deputation is highly qualified in point of acquaintance with ancient and modern languages, Jewish learning, and devoted zeal in behalf of Israel. It is understood that there are at present not less than 30,000 Jews in the Holy Land, and that every day is adding to the number. A British consul has been stationed at Jerusalem, whose presence will be a protection to them. Very considerable religious excitement prevails among the Jewish people in great, or greater perhaps, than has appeared since the days of the Apostles; and as the Holy Land is the grand centre, they not only know what is the state of all their brethren in other quarters, but a Christian influence diffused from Jerusalem, through those who had themselves been Jews, would tell with great force throughout the world, —Christ. Adm.

THE REV. J. WILLIAMS.—Letters from this gentleman, dated Sydney, Oct. 3, 1858, have been received. He had been busily employed since his arrival in endeavouring to excite an interest in missions. "I have drawn up a circular," says he, "and have written to a great number of wealthy people. Our first missionary meeting was held last night, and one gentleman gave us 50*l.*, two others 10*l.* each, several smaller sums, and one gentleman 50*l.* per annum for five years. A vessel arrived yesterday from the islands, and brings a most delightful account of the state of Rarotonga and the Navigators' Islands. The priests are making a most desperate effort to establish Popery in the islands: a French frigate has gone to the Gambia Islands with fifty priests on board. The Popish bishop (at Sydney) confirmed about 300 Irish converts last Sabbath-day, and he told them it was no disgrace to be a convert, for Jesus Christ was sent out of heaven an exile, just as they were sent out of their country. I have been well received by all classes in this colony, and have dined with the Governor, who is decidedly friendly to our efforts, and will do all in his power to aid us in our operations. No port charges have been made on the Cumana.
—Christ. Adm.

THE RELIGION OF FRANCE.—Intelligence has been received of a most interesting breach of international law committed by the commander of a French frigate off the Sandwich Islands. The British Misamisraes sent out from Europe having been refused admission by the native authorities of Hawaii, complained, as we understand, of the alleged insult to the French Admiral on that station, but, in the first instance, without succeeding in their attempt to induce him to espouse their cause. Subsequently, they have persuaded the French captain to adopt the extraordinary and anti-governance measure of demanding satisfaction for the insult; and he is stated to have declared, that, unless the Government consented to host the French flag, to receive a French consul, and to pay a heavy fine, he would lay the town in ruins. Thus has Popery been introduced into these islands by violence and wickedness. We are not precisely aware of the nature of the alliance which unites these islands to British protection; but surely it is impossible that this outrage will be suffered to pass without being made the subject of inquiry on the part of our Government.

ICEBERGS IN THE ATLANTIC.—Several vessels which have arrived within the last fortnight were interrupted in their progress by getting entangled in fields of floating ice. The Grease, Washington, the Elizabeth Grey, and the South America, were attacked among floating icebergs for thirty hours. The first iceberg the ship fell in with rose from fifty to sixty feet above the level of the sea. It was dark when she approached it, and Captain Bernow very wisely resolved to lie-to till daylight. About two o'clock, when the moon broke out from the dense clouds in which she had been previously enveloped, and threw her light on the numerous icebergs, shooting up like heavy cliffs, which were visible all round the horizon, the spectacle is described by the persons who beheld it as having been awfully sublime. The ice reflected the beams of the moon, and the combination produced a mild splendour, which approached, if it did not rival, the light of day. The presence of so much floating ice in the Atlantic, as far down as latitude 44, is a rather an unusual occurrence.

MISCELLANEOUS.

FATAL QUARREL.—On Saturday, the 9th instant, an unfortunate altercation took place between two pupils of the Rev. J. Sturmer, curate of the parish of Hays, near Exeter, named Medhurst and Allen, the one aged 21, and the other 18 years, in which the former stabbed the latter in the abdomen with a French knife, from the effects of which he died on Thursday last. Medhurst was apprehended, and the coroner's jury have since returned a verdict of wilful murder against him. Medhurst is nearly 21, and will in a few weeks come into possession of property worth 7,000*l.* Alop was about 18, and belonged to a most respectable family in Staffordshire. Medhurst was noted for ungovernable temper, which he seems to have inherited by right of blood. His mother was an Italian. His grandfather stabbed his wife in a fit of insanity, and is now, at an advanced age, in a lunatic asylum near Exbridge. At Exbridge, on Thursday, after an examination by the magistrates, Medhurst was committed on a charge of manslaughter; the Bench being of opinion that malice was not to be inferred from the evidence.

THE NAWA SYLAK MURDER.—The trial of Bolam is deferred until next week. So great was the excitement, and prejudice against the prisoner, that he would have had no prospect of an impartial trial at the present session.
—Ibid.

PRIZE ESSAY ON THE PUNISHMENT OF DEATH.—The prize proposal for the best essay on this subject, has been adjudicated to the Rev. James Egge, of Bourne.
—Ibid.

EXACERBATION.—On Tuesday week, the remains of the Rev. S. Hillyard, the venerable minister of John Baptist's Chapel, at Bedford, were interred in the burial ground of that chapel. The service was in the adjoining parish of St. Peter, and in two days after the funeral, the rector of that parish sent into the widow a demand of 17*l.* 6*l.* for burial and mortuary fees, although the deceased was not buried in his parish. The demand has been satisfied by the widow, she being unwilling to raise any objection to it. The Rev. gentleman, besides considerable private property, holds two rich livings.

THE SECOND DAILY MAIL between Dublin and Liverpool will commence on the 1st of May. The communication between the capitals of the two islands will then be made in 24 hours.

PERSIAN AFFAIRS.—BERLIN, FEB. 27.—The short official notice of Mr. McNeill's arrival here was a sort of important news for our public, as it confirms the general report that all is well between England and Persia; by a strange coincidence, the Persian ambassador destined for London is now at Vienna, where, however, he makes a longer stay than your ambassador did here, for Mr. McNeill did not stay above 24 hours here. He had taken the shortest route home by going direct from Trebinna to Odessa, without touching Constantinople. His convictions as to the state of affairs in the country he left are said to be vacillating, and, indeed, every thing one hears from Russia confirms the supposition that at this moment she has the full ascendancy at the Court of Teheran.
—Ibid.

UNITED STATES AND NEW BRUNSWICK.—Intelligence has been received from New York to the second instant, five days later than that brought by the Great Western last week. It relates chiefly to the course taken at Washington with respect to the troubles on the Maine and New Brunswick boundary line. President Van Buren sent a message to Congress on the 25th of February, detailing the events on the Aroostook River line, with which the reader is already acquainted. The President states, that after a diligent search through all the documents connected with the boundary question, he cannot discover any data to warrant Sir John Harvey's assertion, that the disputed territory was by agreement to remain under the exclusive jurisdiction of Great Britain, till a final arrangement should be made; he, therefore, condemns Governor Fairbairn's conduct as base, and does not recommend compliance with his request for military aid. He advises the State of Maine to withdraw or disband her troops, and expresses confidence that Sir John Harvey will abstain from hostilities. With a view to a settlement of the dispute, in case there is no probability of a speedy conclusion to the pending negotiation between England and the United States, he announces his intention to propose a reference to a third power. In the mean time, in order that he may be prepared for an emergency, and to obviate the necessity of an extra session of Congress, he requires authority to make provision for hostilities with England. President Van Buren's tone is moderate and conciliatory. With the message, a memorandum, signed by Mr. Fox, British Minister at Washington, and Mr. Forsyth, the American Secretary of State, was communicated to Congress. In this document Mr. Fox expresses his opinion that Great Britain possesses the right of exclusive jurisdiction over the disputed territory, and Mr. Forsyth maintains the contrary; but Mr. Fox engages that Sir John Harvey shall not attack the troops of Maine, and Mr. Forsyth undertakes that the Governor of Maine shall withdraw his troops. It happens, however, that Mr. Fox, in a paragraph of this very memorandum, is compelled to admit that he has no "specific authority to make any arrangement on the subject," and it remains to be seen how far Governor Fairbairn may pay deference to the dictum of Mr. Secretary Forsyth. A discussion arose in the Senate of the United States, of a rather warlike character, on the receipt of these documents. The Senators from Maine were especially bellicose. The Governor of Maine has reinforced his troops with American lands. Upwards of ten thousand Militia are called out. This is his answer to a demand from Sir John Harvey that the "trespassers" should be given up to the British authorities, for punishment, and the force on the disputed territory be withdrawn. Both the landowners who had been taken prisoners, have been released on parole. A letter in a New York paper says that the quarrel originated in the proceedings of two American timber dealers, or "lumberers," whose stores are on both sides of the Aroostook river; so that one or the other claimed the right to seize all the timber stranded on the banks.

SLAVE TRADE: PORTUGAL.—LISBON, FEB. 28.—The slave trade question attracts some notice here at present. Several papers have announced the fact of the negotiations with our ambassador being broken off, and the Nacional, which the general opinion of the Foreign Office is supposed to have been taking this step. The question has also come before the Senate in the course of the debate on the address. The paragraph on the subject was a mere echo of that in the Queen's speech, and it passed without opposition after two or three speeches.

which, however, threw very little light on the subject. The greatest part of the time was taken up by Baron R. de Sahras in announcements on a speech delivered at a public meeting on this subject by Lord Brougham. Another senator (Bergara) alluded to the humane effects of the slave trade on the African population, the hostile tribes being now induced to preserve their prisoners, instead of killing them, as was and would be the case if there was no way of disposing of them profitably as at present. Other speakers professed themselves disposed to put down the trade, with due regard to the dignity of the nation, &c. &c. Vicomte de Bandiera made a speech much like that delivered before in the other Chamber, and communicated in a former paper. The arguments advanced, both by the different speakers and the organs of the Foreign Office, on this subject, are all very inconsistent. Great credit is taken for the decree of 1834, abolishing the traffic; and yet the subject is argued as if no such law ever existed, and the question of abolition is as for the first time proposed on its own merits. The Norfolk to-day, indeed, declares that the decree cannot be executed without ruining their colonies, and quotes the opinion of the Governor in Council of Angola to that effect. This opinion was delivered, it appears, at a meeting on the 14th of September, 1837, when the Royal decree of the 10th of December, 1836, was brought before the council. I have rec'd a letter from Angola, dated November last, which mentions that the governor makes 800 millions on the average by each slave that leaves with a cargo, and says that four vessels had left with slaves that week, so that the governor's perquisite for one week from the traffic would amount to 3,200 millions, or nearly 800,000 £. No wonder that this person is so eager in deprecating the ruin that would ensue were the decree for that abolition to be carried into effect. The writer of this letter observes that there is no one thinks of any other traffic than the slave trade. As to the subterfuge of the colony, it is out of the question.—Pitt.

THE WEST INDIA LAND INVESTMENT COMPANY was formed at Birmingham on the 11th instant. It consists of 5000 shares, of which more than one hundred are already taken, the design being at present, but not necessarily, limited to two hundred. The list of shareholders is most respectable, as is also the board of directors. No doubt is entertained of profitable returns to the parties directly interested; while it is certain that it will heartily rejoice in being able to render their operations subservient to the relief and advancement of the emancipated peasantry.—British Emancipator.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.—Pro-Liberty signs have been taken, in accordance with the proposal of Mr. Sturges, towards forming a society for the Abolition of Slavery and the Slave Trade throughout the world. Delegates from all parts of the country will shortly be invited to meet in London, for the final consideration of the principles and organization of the Society. As it will have a noble field, we most devoutly wish it may have a spirit equally noble, and a successful working of both.—Ibid.

AMERICAN FREE-PRODUCE ASSOCIATION.—Their great principle is embodied in a short sentence, which might well be printed in letters of gold: "Let us cease to uphold slavery by abstaining from its blood-bought produce." "The subject of violence from slave produce has already claimed the attention of many" in the neighbourhood of Philadelphia, and an organization has been set on foot for carrying the design extensively into effect. What stuff is our anti-slavery spirit made of, that, while we excrete American slave-holders, we enrich them? Is the substitution of Penna for Carolina rice too great a sacrifice to be endured, for the extermination of this enormity?—Ibid.

THE GOVERNOR OF JAMAICA AND THE BAPTIST MISSIONARIES.—The fifteen Baptist Missionaries of Jamaica being assembled at their annual meeting at Montego Bay, presented an address to Sir Lionel Smith, which, with His Excellency's reply, came by the last packet, affording a satisfactory reply to the numerous columns of the Times. In their address (which will be long to be given in full) the missionaries speak in terms of high admiration of the government of Sir Lionel, as well as that of the predecessors, the Marquises of Normandy and Sligo. They thus vindicate the negroes from the charge of ingratitude:—"We assure your Excellency that we have scarcely met with a single instance, among the thousands under our pastoral care, who diseased and infirm excepted, in which an indisposition to industry has been the result of the great gift of entire freedom. On the contrary, we state it as our decided opinion, from extensive personal observation and experience, that at no former period of the history of the colony were the negroes so much disposed to labour, or, in the absence of petty annoyances and ill treatment, half so cheerful, contented, and happy. So far from having manifested any disposition to take advantage of the change in their social condition, to revenge the injuries of the past, or even to justify the least suspicion of hostility as the effect of more recent injuries and oppressions, which in some districts have manifested the aspects of a conspiracy to gild the multitude into sets of insubordination, they have manifested both in expression and conduct, a degree of submissive forbearance which nothing but the benign influence of Christianity would ever have inspired." With regard to themselves, the Missionaries say, "We have been charged, as a body, with exciting the peasantry to exorbitant demands for wages, with encouraging habits of idleness and dissipation, with creating differences between master and servant, and, in some instances, with having attempted a disturbance of the public peace. To all these charges, as to all others of a similar kind that have been preferred against us, whether by the press or by the members of our legislature, we give our most decided and unequivocal denial; challenging our accusers to substantiate a single accusation that would injure our characters, as ministers of the gospel, or as members of civil society. So far from having enjoyed the influence we possess to the disadvantage of the general interests of the country, we have done every thing in our power to promote them. To accomplish this object, even when conscious we should meet no other return than ingratitude and defamation, we have scarcely considered any labour too severe, or any sacrifice too precious; and to this influence we cannot but flatter ourselves the present peaceable and promising state of the country is mainly to be attributed." His Excellency replied in the following terms:—"It gives me great satisfaction that you enable in my character, to give effect to the benevolent desires of the British nation with respect to the lately emancipated peasantry; and while I cannot remedy, I can only lament the unaccountable spirit, which in many instances they have had to encounter in their new condition. I shall say little in regard to the calumnies of which you complain. Abuse is often innumerable, and it has done great service to your cause; for you may be assured it has extended the knowledge of your exertions, which have gained you ample honour in every other country. Had it not, and as long as I can give satisfaction to my country and my sovereign, I will gladly partake of that abuse, as a gratifying proof that we are fast destroying the last remnant of slavery throughout the world."—*Chrid. EARTHQUAKE AT MARTINIQUE.—Le Courier de la Guadeloupe, of the 15th instant, contains an account of an earthquake which has caused great damage in Martinique. At a quarter to six on the morning of the 11th, a violent shock, at St. Pierre, lasted two minutes; all the buildings in the town rocked as if they were about to fall, and a quarter of their number were more or less damaged; twenty were thrown down, but no lives had been lost. At the same time, however, Fort Royal was affected most violently, and all the more solidly constructed houses in that place fell down; the hospital was reduced to ruins, and a great number of the patients destroyed. By the middle of the day, when the accounts were sent off from Fort Royal, some state that between 700 and 800 corpses had been found, and were laid out on the Savanahs. Other accounts state from 400 to 500. The village of Case Platte, between Fort Royal and St. Pierre, was entirely destroyed. Under these melancholy circumstances, the Governor had issued a proclamation authorizing the importation, in vessels of any nation, of wheat, flour, and salt beef, and wood and iron work for building purposes, provided that the cargoes of such vessels was composed of three quarters at least of such articles.—Pitt.

From papers received from Martinique to the middle of January, a proclamation from the Governor had been issued, calling upon the negroes not to take advantage of the disasters from the late earthquake, by asking for higher wages, as that would occasion a great number to come over from the neighbouring islands, and so, in the end, be injurious to themselves, by occasioning a competition between them.—Ibid.

EARTHQUAKE IN THE WEST INDIES.—Further accounts have been received of the melancholy effects of the late earthquake at Martinique, Dominica, and other places. The northern provinces have suffered severely. At Guadeloupe it is stated that upwards of two thousand lives have been lost in that island. At Castries the shock was so severe and appalling as to haffle all descriptions. From Figeon Island the accounts are dreadful. From Souffriere intelligence has been received that the shock caused the destruction of a great many of the stone houses, and the place presented "more the appearance of the Sabbath, than the desolation around."—Ibid.

GOVERNMENT NOTIFICATIONS.

ORDERS BY THE HONORABLE THE DEPUTY GOVERNOR OF ARUNACHAL.

The 7th May, 1839.

Mr. E. T. Trevor, Assistant to the Magistrate of Hooghly, has been vested with the powers described in Section II. Regulation III. of 1827.

Mr. R. C. Halkett, Officiating Magistrate and Collector of Dinapore, has obtained leave of absence for fifteen days, on private affairs. Mr. A. G. Macdonald will conduct the duties of the Office during Mr. Halkett's absence.

Mr. A. Reid, Special Deputy Collector in Zillah Behar, has obtained leave of absence, on Medical Certificate, for two months, from the 28th ultimo in extension. Mr. C. H. Livingston, of Barua, will act for Mr. Reid, and Mr. H. N. Farquharson, the Special Deputy Collector in Pat-

3. The Establishment of Engineers at your Presidency is 60, with the addition at present of 12 Superintendents. These added to the Officers of other Arms employed as Engineers, form an aggregate at your Presidency of 72.

4. We have now to announce to you our Resolution to raise the fixed Establishment of Engineers at your Presidency from 60 to 67, composed of three Battalions, each of the following Establishment, viz.

- 1 Colonel.
- 1 Lieutenant Colonel.
- 3 Majors.
- 6 Captains.
- 12 1st Lieutenants.
- 7 2d Do.

5. This augmentation will still leave 1 of the 30 appointments above-mentioned to be filled by officers not of the Engineers—some of these are temporary in their nature, and we would hope that on their education and by a careful attention to the employment of the Engineers, you will be relieved in a short period from the necessity of confiding such duties to officers, who have not been specially educated for this branch of the Service.

6. There are now eleven Superintendents to the Corps of Engineers at the Presidencies of Madras and Bombay. The whole of these are to be on the option of being transferred to Bengal, ranking with the Superintendents at your Presidency according to their rank at the date of their transfer in the various Lists. The option of transfer has been given in order of seniority at such a distance from the date of the order.

7. The augmentation is to have effect from the date of its announcement in its full order.

8. The above augmentation will suffice to bring upon the Establishment all the present Superintendents at the three Presidencies, and also two Cadets who are on the eve of completing their studies at Chitalana.

We are, &c.

(Signed) PHILIP MELVILL, Secy. Mil. Dept.

Fort India House, 26th March, 1889.

The Governments of Fort Sedit George and Bombay are requested to give the Superintendents of the Corps of Engineers at those Presidencies the option of being transferred to Bengal on the terms stated in the enclosed copy of the Honorable Secy. to the Govt. of India, and to report to the Secy. to the Govt. of India the names of those Officers who may wish to avail themselves of it.

The augmentation will have effect from this date.

Fort Madras, 26th March, 1889.

No. 73 of 1889.—The Honourable the President in Council is pleased to make the following Appointment:

Captain E. T. Milner, of the 26th Regiment Native Infantry, to fill the vacant post of Assistant Military Assistant General, during the absence of Major Macgregor's absence or until further orders.

W. A. CARMICHAEL, M. G., Secy. to the Govt. of India, Mil. Dept.

EXTERNAL ORDER BY THE HONOURABLE THE GOVERNOR GENERAL.

Madras, 26th May, 1889.

Lieutenant James Brindley, of the Artillery, in charge of Revenue Survey of Ponnore, has obtained leave of absence, in the Political Department, on the 1st instant, to visit Simla, on Medical Certificate, from the 1st of April to the 1st of December next.

J. STUART, Lt. Col. Offg. Secy. to the Govt. of India, Mil. Dept.

SEPARATE ORDER BY THE COMMANDER OF THE FORCES.

Madras, 26th April, 1889.

The following removals of medical officers are ordered:

Surgeon W. Duff, from the 21st to the 66th regiment of native Infantry.

Assistant Surgeon W. M. Buchanan, M. D., (on furlough) from the 21st to the 16th regiment of native Infantry.

Assistant Surgeon H. J. Tucker, M. D., from the 64th to the 21st regiment of native Infantry.

Corporal A. W. M. Wylie, to whom rank was assigned in Government General Orders, No. 36, of the 16th of February last, is posted to the 7th regiment of light cavalry.

Madras, 26th April, 1889.

The Commander of the Forces directs the re-publication of the following extract of General Orders, issued under date the 18th October 1887, and enjoins the strictest attention to the instructions therein contained:

"Wherever the finding and sentence of a native general court martial is published to the army, the Commander-in-Chief expects that commanding officers of native regiments and battalions will not contrive themselves with barely having the same read at the head of their respective corps; they must use their best endeavours, through the medium of their interpreters, to cause the whole subject, including the Commander-in-Chief's decision and remarks, to be fully understood at least by the native officers. This is to be considered as a standing order of the service, and to be entered in the book of general regulations with each corps.

The undermentioned officers have leave of absence:

from 26th April to 26th December, to visit Missouri, on medical certificate.

4th Regiment N. L.—Ensign R. W. Bird, from 18th April to 18th October, to visit Simla, on private affairs.

14th Regiment N. L.—Ensign C. L. Showers, from 10th March to 5th April, in extension, to enable him to rejoin his regiment.

26th Regiment N. L.—Ensign A. G. Farquharson, from 18th April to 18th April 1889, to visit the hills north of Mysore, on medical certificate.

40th Regiment N. L.—Burgess W. Stevenson, senior, from 26th April to 26th July, to visit the Presidency, on private affairs, preparatory to applying for furlough to Europe.

62d Regiment N. L.—Ensign A. D. Caulfield, from 26th April to 26th October, to visit Lucknow, on private affairs.

It having been brought to the notice of the Commander of the Forces, that committees of survey have occasionally rejected butt layout belts, from an opinion that the plate-straps were too short to allow of the breast-plates being placed at a proper height on the chest, it is notified, for regulation, that the length of the plate-straps mentioned by Government is 1 1/2 inches, which is deemed amply sufficient even for men of great height, and committees are therefore cautioned against rejecting serviceable belts of the length specified.

The Composite artillery division order of the 1st instant, directing Lieutenant and Adjutant C. S. Bird, of the 34th battalion, to act as artillery

THE CONDUCT OF THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT IN INDIA.—Mr. Daniel O'Connell, Mr. George Thompson and Mr. Montgomery Martin have recently informed the British public in England, that the famine with which the Western Provinces was desolated last year, was occasioned by the conduct of the Indian Government. Mr. Martin has, indeed, extended his charge so as to embrace all the famines which have afflicted the country since the year 1769; and he lays at the door of the Company no fewer than nine of the worst visitations. We are sorry to be constrained to add to the catalogue of its crimes, another severity with which the Western Provinces are now threatened. Our letters from Hindustan state, that in consequence of a redundancy of rain during the last year, the stalks of grain shot up with such rapidity as to yield little or no produce. The prospects of the husbandman have, therefore, been in many provinces disappointed; and it has been found cheaper to burn than to reap the ungenerous ears of corn. Scarcity, if not famine, again threatens that unhappy country in the face; and the price of grain is already on the rise. After this fresh demonstration of the most wanton cruelty on the part of Government, we should only compromise our own character, by undertaking any defence of its policy. The measure of its iniquities is now full. The character, which the indignation of Burke saw sixty years ago, of "these inscurible and predestinated criminals," as he described the Company's Government, is now fully realized in the miseries of a famine that you see. Never, perhaps, did any Government exist so utterly inscurible as that of the English in the East. The famine which the Company brought upon the country during the last year cost it a sum little short of forty lakhs of Rupees, four hundred thousand pounds. Had the viciousness of Government been of an ordinary character, so sharp a penalty for its transgression would have produced some tokens of amendment; but, so utterly hardened has it become, by the vicious habit it has contracted of inflicting famines upon India, that punishment, as in the case of criminals who are past reformation, instead of working remorse and reformation, has only led to the perpetration of new crimes. That which was accomplished in one year by the agency of drought, has been performed the next by means of inundation. The means are, indeed, diversified, by that fertility of invention, which two centuries accompany criminality; but in both visitations we trace the same malignant agency of the East India Company. The Company's Government may be considered as an improvement upon the character of the Heathen Saturn. That potent simply devoured his own children; but its Christian representative devours them in the very act of labouring for its support. Reform is now hopeless. We abandon Lord Auckland and his Government to the tender mercies of the English patriots; and we trust that as soon as the news of this treacherous shall reach England, Mr. Montgomery Martin will move for the recall of the Governor General, and for his own appointment as his successor.

OUR HUKKAU AND THE PILGRIM TAX.—The Harbours of Saturday, has an article on the Pilgrim Tax, found in the long article in our last number, in reply to the Anglo-Indian. We attention of our contemporary is directed to two subjects in rather a distinct character. The one refers to the question, Whether the Government of British India is a Christian Government or not; the other, to the connection of Government with the Heathen Temples. We have repeatedly stated it as our humble opinion, that the conduct of our Administration in various instances, has not been such as to entitle it to the high distinction of being regarded as a Christian Government. Whether the policy of Britain in the East ought to be governed by those just and equitable principles which are to be found in the Bible, and in no other creed, is a question upon which, though we may heat issue with our contemporary, we shall not enter at present. The Editor has allowed his own warmth on this subject so unaccountable an ascendancy, as to designate the opinions of those who differ from him, as appeals to passion and bigotry, for purposes which he could not secure. He says, that the use of the epithet Christian, is insidious; and that those who use it, should be captured and reproached; he talks of their fanatical spirit, and of the appeal they make as that of ultra-zealots. This is not the calm and dignified temper in which so important a question can be advantageously discussed; and we, therefore, postpone the discussion to a more favourable opportunity.

As it regards the immediate occasion of these remarks, the relinquishment of the Pilgrim Tax, we rejoice to find one contemporary prepared to go as far as to declare, that the Government should cease to derive a revenue from such a source. He is in error, however, when he supposes that the Tax is still to be levied. The orders of the Directors in 1836, which are now about to be acted on, are clear to him mis-understood. They declare their intention, that "the Pilgrim Tax should every where be abolished." Every argument, therefore, of the Harbours and the Anglo-Indian, built upon the assumption that it was still to be continued, though under different agency, ceases to require notice.

"It appears to us," says the Harbours, "that although it is quite true, and perfectly proper for every enlightened Government to renounce all revenue derived from superstitious rites, it is neither easy, nor in any respect proper, that they should renounce interference of a protective character." The same idea is repeated at the close of the article. "However, then, we may and ought to eschew all revenue or profit derived from religious rites or ceremonies, it is utterly impossible, consistently with the principles on which we profess to govern this country, to yield in the cause of well-meaning, but mistaken zealots, and renounce all interference with, in other words, withdraw all protection from a source of revenue." The Editor evidently intends to reply to this, that the idea of Native Religion is not, with our interference.

If it be a fact, that the Government of British India, in its interference, does it not renounce all revenue derived from such sources, that, during the past half century and more, thousands of sacrifices throughout this Presidency have been secured all protection from Government; and that this protection has been regulated on the most sacred principle, and limited to the two celebrated shrines from which Government drew a revenue? Will the Harbours affirm, that all the Temples and religious establishments of the Hindoos at Benares, with which Government has never interfered, have enjoyed more of that protection which they have a right to expect? Does our contemporary intend to affirm, that it is utterly inconsistent with the principles on which we profess to govern the country?—do put the two shrines of Gya and Juggurnath upon the same footing upon which all other shrines, with their rich endowments and costly gifts, have been left? What the Editor means in his closing sentence, by "protecting the religion of the people," we are at a loss to comprehend. What is understood by the protection of the people, in the exercise of their religion, we gather, without difficulty, from the uniform practice of Government, in reference to those Temples with which it has never interfered. Both priests and people have enjoyed quite as much protection as they could have desired. The Magistrate has protected them from interruption and outrage, in the profession of their creed; the civil authorities have afforded them protection in the enjoyment of their property of every description. With this the devotees and the administrators have been abundantly content; the demand for more protection emanates not from them, but from Christian writers. The proprietors of these Temples know that the protection they have enjoyed, without the interference of the State, has cost them nothing; they know, also, that the protection, accompanied with interference, with which our Editors would encumber them, is rather a costly luxury, with which they can well dispense; and there can be no doubt they will congratulate their brethren at Gya and Juggurnath on being at length free from it also.

GOVERNMENT PATRONAGE OF IDOLATRY AT MADRAS.—Perhaps we have been too ready to express satisfaction with the late Despatch of the Court of Directors, which, by a singular oversight, we only now put before our readers, in another page. In Bengal it has been noted upon; and, therefore, however reluctantly it may have been adopted by the Honourable Court, we have concluded that they were no longer playing false in the business. By the execution of its instructions, too, the evil, as it exists in this Presidency, will be fully remedied. Whether the execution will be found strictly in accordance, with the precept is another thing. Of that we shall be better able to speak, when the reports of the approaching festivals at Pooree reach us.

At Madras, this Despatch affords very little satisfaction. A just displeasure is excited in the minds of the numerous and highly respectable individuals, who have been looking for such relief from the Home Authorities, as would enable them to reconcile their official duties with their Christian principles, by the disingenuous way in which Sir Peregrine Maitland is treated. That distinguished Officer, both by his professional eminence, and his personal character, secured the high esteem of all judicious and good men. He had intellect, principle, and energy; all of them much needed in the direction of public affairs in the sister Presidency. By their exercise he won confidences, and excited hopes. And the sacrifice of such a man, by their idolatrous propensities, was no trivial loss to the Company. They may learn its extent, perhaps, too soon. The noble reproof he administered to the Directors, by his resignation, was no doubt severe; and the Despatch shows it has made them exceedingly uncomfortable. They wince pitifully. To relieve themselves, they go as far as possible towards a falsehood, without actually accomplishing it. Indeed, many will scarcely give them credit for any short-coming in this grave offence. They say that Sir P. Maitland, in tendering his resignation, was mistaken in assuming that it was their desire to depart from their celebrated orders, dated 20th February, 1833. Their object in October, 1837, was to secure the Supreme Government the unfettered exercise of the powers and instructions conveyed by the Despatch of 1833: And so far from desiring to continue the practices against which Sir P. Maitland remonstrated, they had urged in February, 1837, that "no unnecessary delay should take place in bringing forward the whole subject fully and intelligibly, in all its bearings on the financial interests, on the political obligations, and on the moral character of our Government."

This surely means, that after the Honourable Court had despatched the General Orders of 1833, they had consistently followed them up. Whereas, the actual fact is as apposite to that, as any thing can possibly be. The Despatch of 1833 was a strong, hot blast; and in every succeeding order, the great object of the Court was to blow cold on the matter; till in 1837, they thought they had nearly brought it back to the same frozen indifference which had been so rudely disturbed by the Board of Control in 1833. But they misjudged both of the men whom their orders were to affect, and of the Christian sympathy by which in England they would be supported.

Nothing could be easier than to trace the backward course of the Court of Directors from 1833 to 1837; and we may hereafter do so, should there be occasion. For the present it is sufficient to say, that after the Madras Memorial, presented to the Government of that Presidency by the late revered and beloved Bishop Corrie, from more than two hundred persons, had been received at home, the Honourable Court briefly replied in 1837, "We now desire, that no customary tribute or mark of respect to Native Festivals be discontinued at any of the Presidencies; that no protection hitherto given be withdrawn; and that no change whatever be made in any matters relating to the Native religion, except under the authority of the Supreme Government." And the Supreme Government had got its lesson: for in June, 1837, they instruct the Government at Madras, "That, without formally cancelling the General Orders of Sir R. O'Callaghan, forbidding the attendance of troops at religious festivals, those Orders should be others to fall gradually into desuetude; and, as the attendance of troops at popular festivals, and on Natives of rank, as honorary guards, is a usage of long standing under this Presidency, the indulgence is not to be withheld, (except under permission from the Government), even when Natives, to whom the complimentary observance is paid, may be proceeding to the performances of religious duties." Sir Peregrine Maitland, with these orders before him, assumed nothing but what was plain matter of fact, in concluding that it was the desire of the Court of Directors to depart from the Orders of February, 1833.

The Despatch of August last, as we have seen, has been attended to by the Bengal Government. The case is otherwise at Madras. A much esteemed Correspondent at that Presidency writes us so late as the 19th ultimo, that the idolatrous ceremonies are still saluted by the guns of Fort St. George; the connexion of Government and its servants with the various pagodas is as intimate as ever; Christian Officers have to join the Heathen ceremonies at Nagpore, Travancore, and at Triplicane; in short, the Madras Government has entirely disobeyed the orders of the Despatch, and seems to feel quite sure of this disobedience, at any rate, being viewed with affectionate leniency by the Honourable Members in Leadenhall Street. This state of security must be disturbed.

There is another point on which our friends at Madras feel justly aggrieved. Last year, in one of the discussions at the India House, Mr. Lindsay, one of the Directors, to throw odium upon the honourable minded men, who have sought deliverance from participation in idolatrous rites, as hot-headed zealots, asserted that, when the military duties had ceased, certain officers preached Christianity to their Sepoys on the parade. Of course no one in England could well meet such an assertion with immediate denial: but, as soon as it was heard of at Madras, the assurance of its perfect ground-leagues was sent home; and in a late debate, therefore, Mr. Lindsey was called upon to state when and where such a thing had occurred. But all the answer that could be extracted from him was, that the preaching on parade had not occurred within the Madras Presidency. The stigma, then, is cast upon the Bombay or the Bengal Army. The accusation will be inquired into at Bombay. And now we would ask the Officers of the Bengal Army, whether they are willing to lie under this imputation? Has any such imprudence ever been committed in this Presidency? We have never heard of any thing of the sort, or in the slightest degree resembling it. We believe the statement to be a gratuitous falsehood. Whether the credit of it is to be given wholly to Mr. Lindsey, he must himself explain. The old rule of the Bath Pump Room, however, is a good one: the utterer of a slander is to be considered likewise its author.

THE AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.—From the papers received by the last mail, we learn that Mr. Buxton, the able and fervent advocate of the negroes, has just published a small volume, of the deepest interest, on the African Slave Trade as it now exists. He maintains, it is said, these three positions: That, in spite of all our exertions to put it down, the Slave Trade exists at this present moment, to an extent infinitely greater than was ever heretofore known in the annals of the crime; That our national exertions to suppress the trade have not only failed hitherto, but must inevitably fail, with whatever sincerity or vigour we may persist in them, because they are founded upon an erroneous principle; But that the means exist of striking at the root of the infamous trade, by bringing legitimate commerce to the aid of religion in the civilization of Africa; and that Africa herself is best with every facility and advantage for promoting commercial intercourse with her on the largest scale.

The notices we have seen of the work, in the Christian Advocate to the 25th of March, extend only to the first point of Mr. Buxton's argument—the devastations of the Slave Trade as it now exists. And the facts accumulated on this point are truly fearful. The first question is, What may be the number of slaves actually exported from Africa every year? And the second is, if possible, still more harrowing: What is the number of lives annually sacrificed in making good the capture of those slaves? The general answer to these questions is put thus, in the Christian Advocate: "Every body knows that the Slave Trade exists extensively; in vulgar parlance, this 'is no news;' but we suspect that it is a piece of news which it will astonish every body to learn, that reckoning every day of twelve hours' duration for the practical duties of life, every minute of every day consigns to slavery or death at least one individual."

It is no easy matter to ascertain, with exactness, the extent of the Slave Trade; for every one knows that all who are engaged in it, study secrecy above all things, and scruple at an crime to preserve it inviolate. But Mr. Buxton elicits his general conclusion by three distinct, yet concurrent, lines of testimony. One of them, it will be seen, is such as to reflect the deepest disgrace upon British trade. The first class of facts relate to the number of slaves actually imported at the different places which are known to be the destination of the slaves; and the authorities on the subject are the British Consuls, the British Commissioners for the adjudication of captured slave-vessels, and commercial men residing in the places where the trade is carried on, together with the travellers who have published accounts of their visits to them. On unquestionable data thus obtained, Mr.

Buxton shows that there are, at the present time, annually imported into Brazil, ... .. 78,333
That the importations into Cuba are ... .. 60,000
That there are captured ... .. 8,294
And the casualties on the passage are ... .. 3,373

Making together, 150,000

This is the lowest possible estimate of what, by a horrible abuse of terms, may be called the Christian Slave Trade. Apparently from want of information of equal official authority, and not from want of perfectly credible testimony, Mr. Buxton omits, in his estimate, the importations at Buenos Ayres, the United Provinces of the Uruguay, Porto Rico, and Texas; although it is certain that one-ninth of all the vessels condemned at Sierra Leone in 1837, were bound for Porto Rico; and in the course of the year ending in March, 1837, at least 7000 negroes were landed at that port; whilst there is good reason to believe, that as many as 15,000 were imported into Texas within twelve months of the years 1837 and 1838.

But there is also a Mahomedan Slave Trade, from the northern and north-eastern shores of Africa, the extent of which is thus stated by the Christian Advocate: "The exports to the Lunnon of Muskat are 20,000 per annum, upon which a poll-duty is levied, while 10,000 more are supposed to be smuggled every year. Egypt and Arabia are annually supplied with 20,000 more; and, although the authorities quoted by Mr. Buxton are so numerous and satisfactory, that he might with justice have doubled the number, he is content to take 50,000 as the fair estimate of the exports to the Mahomedan markets,—thus making altogether a total of 300,000 Africans annually carried into captivity: at the very lowest possible rate of calculation."

This result is confirmed by a second course of inquiry; which regards the number of negroes shipped at the various resorts of the slavers. The chief sources of information on this subject, are the Governor of Cape Coast Castle, the Officers of Her Majesty's Ships of War on the African Coast, and the papers found on board the captured slave ships. It thence appears that the number of slaves annually exported from

The South-eastern Coast of Africa to America is, ... .. 15,000
From Angola, &c. to America, ... .. 30,000
From Porto to the North of Cape Coast to America, ... .. 30,000
From the Bights of Benin and Biafra, ... .. 140,000

In all, 200,000

This number, when the usual amount of mortality is deducted, is still in considerable excess of the result previously obtained. It agrees more closely with another estimate furnished by Mr. McQueen; who, from chance of information totally distinct from those of Mr. Buxton, concludes that the annual slave importations into America are, to Brazil ... .. 90,000
Cuba and Porto Rico, ... .. 100,000
Captured in the year, 1837, ... .. 6,146

196,146

Besides Texas, Buenos Ayres, and the Argentine Republic, into which he believes there are large importations, though to what extent he has no means of judging.

Now we come to the third and most humiliating line of investigation. The two former show us Great Britain watching and resisting this hideous wrong on human nature; but this third exhibits her guilty of participation in the crime. On the authority of Captain McLean, of Cape Coast Castle, it is said to have been ascertained, "by the concurrent testimony of competent and unimpeachable authority, that the merchandise chiefly, if not exclusively, given in exchange for slaves, consists of cowries, Brazilian tobacco in rolls, spirits and Manchester goods," in these proportions: one-third cowries, a third tobacco and spirits, and a third Manchester cotton goods. Moreover, taking the goods at prime cost, the average price paid for each slave is about £4 sterling. Now it appears that the entire quantity of cotton goods manufactured in Lancashire was, in the year 1836, as follows:

Value of goods for the legitimate African trade, . . . . .	£150,000
Value of goods shipped to Brazil, Cuba, United States and elsewhere, intended for the slave trade, and adapted only to it, . . . .	£250,000

Calculating by the data just given, the number of slaves to the purchase of which this amount of cotton goods was adequate, is no less than 187,500. Such is Capt. McLean's statement: and Mr. Buxton adds, that goods only suited for the slave-trade, are manufactured at Glasgow as well as in Lancashire, and that ammunition and firearms, of a quality only suited to this commerce, are annually exported from England to an extent which, upon the above principle of computation, would purchase 34,174 slaves.

Putting, then, the American-European to the Mohammedan slave trade, we believe it will be no exaggeration to say, that the number of victims torn from Africa every year, to undergo the miseries of slavery, is nearer three than two hundred thousand. Next comes the inquiry, How many other victims are sacrificed in immediate butchery, and in the progress of the slaves to the sea ports, in order to secure these three lakhs. Mr. Buxton's conclusion of the investigation on this point we have not yet seen; but a few startling facts may be mentioned. There are various mounds, in which slaves are captured, but wholesale seizure is by far the most frequent, and, indeed, is that, without which a sufficient number of victims could not be obtained for the market. Major Denham gives one example of this sort of seizure, in which 3000 slaves were captured, and, probably, "double that number were sacrificed to obtain them." He also mentions five different expeditions, in which "at least 20,000 poor creatures were slaughtered, and three-fourths of that number, at least, driven into slavery." Other testimonies equally appalling are produced; but we cannot now pursue the subject farther.

What a sickening revelation of crime is thus placed before us! A million, perhaps, of human beings victimized to death or bondage every year. Surely it is not without reason, that the philanthropists of England are taking up their weapons again. Our readers will have seen in our extracts of European writings not two weeks, that preliminary steps have been taken, towards forming a society for the abolition of slavery and the slave-trade throughout the world. We wish them all success. Government have been failed in every attempt to obtain the concurrence of the Portuguese in the abolition of the trade, and will, therefore, proceed to do in spite of them what they would have gladly done in concert with them. "It is our intention," said Lord Palmerston in the House of Commons, on 8th of March, "to propose to Parliament a legislative measure, for the purpose of giving to our cruises and commissioners the same powerful authority with regard to slave-trading ships, as we of late, which they now exercise with regard to Portuguese slave-trading ships, of the same kind."

THE PERSIAN LANGUAGE.—We are happy to pre-entertain the Governor General, in his capacity as Lieutenant Governor of the North West Provinces, has issued preliminary orders that the use of the Persian language shall cease throughout the districts under his immediate control. We consider this order as tantamount to the final banishment of this foreign language from the British Administration in the East. It is true, that with the general sanction of Government, similar orders, though of a less positive character, were promulgated in the Lower Provinces. It was well known, however, that they were extremely unpopular to some of the most influential members of Government in the provinces; and it was naturally feared, that the language might again creep into our Courts, amidst the rapid mutations to which the Indian Government is subject. But the mature opinion of the highest authority in India, framed after sufficient experience had been obtained of the feasibility and wisdom of the change, must set all these fears to rest. The restoration of Persian is, even a possible contingency, except, indeed, the invasion of India by the Persians, under Scythian influence, should be successful. When the cause of common sense, in the struggle which it wages with ancient prejudices, once becomes lord of the ascendant, its dominion cannot easily be overthrown. We rejoice at this happy consummation for the sake of the Government. Watched, as its measures are, by the wise and good in England with an incessant vigilance; watched, as it is, by a powerful competitor for the sovereignty of this empire, whose agents are perpetually luminating us in the face of Europe, it is no small gratification to be able to point to this honest, wise and equitable measure, and say: We have wiped out another blot from our administration; we have abandoned the anomaly of communicating the people to transact all their public business through a language equally foreign to them and to ourselves; we have thus given an additional pledge that our rule shall be conducted on popular principles. We rejoice still more for the sake of the people, that Government has at length listened to the voice of reason, and taken off the yoke of a foreign language, under which their subjects have been groaning for six centuries.

In a political point of view, the abolition of this language presents a singular coincidence of time. The future history of India will not fail to remark, that the British Government of India, for the period of nearly a century, adopted a line of policy, the most admirably adapted to keep open the way for the successful invasion of India, by the hordes beyond the Indus. Instead of adopting in our administration, those principles which should throw obstacles in the way of the Persians, if they should ever dream of conquering the country, we have followed a course which would enable them to re-occupy the throne of India, with the least possible difficulty. By keeping up the universal use of the Persian language; by perpetuating Mohammedan criminal laws; by striking the coin, in the name of the former dynasty; we have for many years been acting as though we were but temporary residents, prepared to resign the sceptre at the first call to those whose institutions we had so invariably taken for our model. But just at the period when Persia, urged on by the Court of Petersburg, prepares herself in earnest to dispute the empire with us, we have abrogated all those principles of policy, which were calculated to give her an easy introduction into the country. The changes which have recently been adopted, though unconnected with the idea of such a prospect, are more than justified by the course which political events have now taken.

ASSAM TEA CULTIVATION.—There is now a fair prospect that the cultivation of Tea in Assam, will be carried to such an extent, as to give this Presidency a large proportion of the trade in that article. The very high prices which the samples of Assam Tea sent home last year fetched, at the public sale, led immediately to the formation of Companies to prosecute the cultivation of it. The foremost society in point of time, was the Assam Company, with a proposed capital of 500,000*l.*, in shares of 50*l.* each, of which it was intended that two thousand shares should be appropriated to this country. Two of our most respectable Houses of Agency were constituted the representatives of the Company in Calcutta. But before they had received their commission, a Bengal Tea Association had been formed, with a capital of one lakh of Rupees, and Mr. Phipps, on its behalf, had addressed Lord Auckland to ascertain, whether Government was disposed to make over to the undertaking private enterprise. His Lordship declared his perfect willingness to accede to this proposal; provided there was no monopoly; and to prevent unnecessary delay, he transmitted a Minute to the Supreme Council, with his opinion on the subject. Before this resolution could be brought to a conclusion, the agents of the new London Company came into the field. Some discussion took place, and it appeared at length advisable to merge the Bengal Association in the London Assam Company. A meeting was accordingly held on Thursday last, at the office of Messrs. Carr, Tagore and Co., when the subscription was completed, and the title of the united body was fixed as the Bengal and Assam Company. The conditions of union are, that the local management be conducted by a Committee of Directors, to be elected exclusively in this country. The shares which had been allotted to this country, have been eagerly taken up; and double the number would scarcely satisfy the eagerness of the public. We hear that the Committee of the Bengal Branch Assam Company have already engaged the services of Mr. Moseley, who was ejected from the Botanic Garden for the share he took in the Griffith controversy; and we cannot but congratulate the Society on having thus secured the first practical gardener at this Presidency.

We hear that the Agents of another London Society are now in the field in Calcutta; and, without encroaching on the sphere of the Assam Company, are in hopes of being able to obtain a good footing in the Hills of Assam and its neighbourhood. There is room for all the enjoyment that can be spared for the enterprise, and for all the labour that can be spared into the field. In fact, the want of hands to cultivate and manipulate, will be much more felt, than any want of capital to stimulate industry. For half a century to come, we have room in Assam for all the redundant population of the European Hills; and shall have none to spare for the Mauritius and Sydney.

The Admiral, it is said, is coming round to Bengal, with a special view to the state of affairs at Canton. We think his presence there cannot but do good, and it will be a pleasure to hear, that Chinese insolence has been repressed by his just measures; but the most effectual revenge we can take on China, is to push the cultivation of Tea in Assam. It is in that country that the arrogance of the Imperial Court can most effectually be conquered.

ADMINISTRATION OF HEATHEN OATHS.—We have much pleasure in submitting to our readers the letters of two Correspondents, on the existing practice of administering oaths on the Ganges Water, and other idolatrous symbols. They are from gentlemen of very opposite characters. The one is, we believe, a member of the Civil Service; and the other, a respectable Native Officer of one of the Courts. Both, however, draw one conclusion from their experience and observation.

It is, that the present system keeps truth out of the Courts; and, consequently, impedes the course of justice. We are perfectly satisfied that the fact is so; and would confidently appeal to the whole body of our judicial officers for its confirmation.

It is a happy circumstance, that on this subject the religious feelings of Christian Officers, and Hindoo and Mohammedan sentries and witnesses would all plead for the same measure—the abolition of oaths altogether. What the Christian in the abhorrence of idolatry wishes to have abolished, the Hindoo in his attachment to idolatry equally deprecates. Here, therefore, there is no danger of having Native religious prejudice or partiality, by the indulgence of Christian principles. We find, indeed, that in an article in the Quarterly Friend of India, in which we referred some time ago, our revered friend the late Mr. Marshman, maintained that the confirmation of testimony by oaths formed no part of the Native jurisprudence, either of Hindoos or Mohammedans, but in India was a gratuitous innovation, the fruit of English prejudice.—As I had almost said, English barbarism,—brought in on the establishment of our authority in the country. As that opinion was published with the concurrence of Dr. Carey we consider it well worthy of regard. Of its justice, we do not feel competent ourselves to speak.

We see by our English papers, that the proposed for substituting affirmation generally for oaths, has again been under discussion in the House of Commons. The motion was lost by a division of 125 to 93. This, however, is a highly respectable minority; and we trust it is indicative of the progress of public opinion towards that result, which both in reverence for the word of God, and sound judgment, would dictate. It would be a pleasant thing to see the Government of India about about of our English legislators on this point; and the way for them is certainly more easy and open. Here there is neither prejudice nor party opposition to contend with. The course of reason is clear and unobstructed. We shall be exceedingly glad to hear that our Rulers are giving their attention to the matter.

THE VICAR APOSTOLIC OF BENGAL.—Our readers may remember that some months ago, an early discussion was carried on in Calcutta, on the appointment of the learned Bishop of Bourges to succeed Dr. St. John, as Vicar Apostolic of Bengal; and it was asserted that, too arrangement was the result of intrigue. Having a full knowledge of the circumstances, we offered our assistance to repel the charges, and to vindicate the purity of motives which had led the Bishop, after so many years of privation and suffering in Cochin China, to accept so responsible a charge, in obedience to the commands of his superiors. We now learn that the subject of those discussions was brought under the notice of those from whom the appointment had emanated; and a letter has now been received from Rome, which places the transaction in its true light, and completely exonerates the present Vicar Apostolic from all those ungenerous insinuations to which he was subjected, in consequence of his acceptance of the office. We are happy to be able to present a copy of this document to our readers.

lico Cochinese, et Vicario Apostolico

Most ILLUSTRIOUS and REVEREND SIR,

I have received the epistle written by your Excellency, (Ampludo), on the 17th of December. Respecting what you mention in that epistle, I believe nothing new now to be said, except that I exceedingly desire your mind should be at rest, and that it has afforded me very great satisfaction that you have begun to discharge the duties of the Vicar Apostolic of Bengal. As to the rest, I can positively affirm, that nothing was ever written by you which could affect either the recall of Father St. Leger, or his continuance in the office of Vicar Apostolic. Indeed, it is unjust to the College of St. Francis Xavier to say that the recall of Father St. Leger is to be imputed to calumnies proceeding from that College; and it would show a very unworthy regard to the Sacred Congregation; as if the Sacred Congregation could be induced to adopt any measure without careful consideration of the case.

I pray God, in the meantime, long to preserve your Excellency in health and happiness.

As a Father most solicitous for

Your Excellency,

J. P. CARDINALIS FRAXSONIUS, Prof.

WEEKLY EPITOME OF NEWS.

THURSDAY, MAY 29.

Dr. Bird, at Bombay, has been so fortunate as to discover, in the caves of Catura, two copper jars, containing silver and small gold and silver vessel, with an inscription in the ancient character.—The Bombay papers take up the charges brought against the Bombay Post Office, for the delays which occur in the arrival of the Overland Mail; and we think effectually rebut them, by the assertion, that the range of the Bombay post stretches only to Nagpore; that the Mail arrived at that place, without any loss of time; and that the irregularity and detention, of which we so justly complain, occurred between that place and Calcutta, in the route which is under the superintendence of the Calcutta Post Office.—Letters from the army, written before the occupation of Candahar, state that Sir John Keane had superseded Major General Nott, of the Company's Service, commanding one of the divisions of the ARMY OF THE INDUS, and appointed General Willebire to it. A reference will, of course, be made to the Governor General; but such differences are deeply to be regretted, more especially when the army is in the field.—A letter from Simla states, that the number of horses there is at present one hundred; that the aggregate cost is $3,000 Rupees; that grain, and all kinds of Europe supplies, are cheap. When shall we be able to say the same of Darjeeling?—A beautiful little vessel was launched on the side of the river opposite to Calcutta, and was named the Lady Wallace.—A meeting of the Church Missionary Association was held at the Old Church, Boman, on Tuesday last, the Venerable the Archbishop in the Chair, when the Secretary read a very gratifying report of the progress which had been made during the past year. We believe that the Church Mission in this Presidency, has been more successful in its efforts during the past, than during any preceding year.—The official correspondence between the officers of Government and the Maha Rajah Runjeet Singh, are now in course of publication. We call the particular attention of the inhabitants, both of India and Russia, to the following exquisite model of diplomatic writing. "What you write," says Capt. Wade to Runjeet, "regarding the everlasting relations of friendship that distinguish the union of the British and Sikh States, and that they vie with the sun in splendour and brilliancy, is very just and true."—The Harkness states, that a Native Officer of Police has been fined by a Police Magistrate, Mr. Patrick O'Hanlon, 32 Rupees, for having obeyed the orders of the Superintendent of Police.—The Docking Company has just obtained a contract from Government, for the repair of the vessels belonging to the State for three years.—A reward of Two Thousand Rupees has been offered by the Chief Magistrate, on the part of Government, for the apprehension of the person who cut the woman's throat, on the 25th of February last, in the lower veranda of Rajah Rajkissen's house.

FRIDAY, MAY 31.

At the meeting held yesterday, at the office of Messrs. Carr, Tagore and Co., a junction was formed between the Calcutta Tea Association, and the London Assam Company.—The transaction, relative to the fine of the Police Officer, for obeying the order of his superior, is more serious and libellous than we had thought. It appears that the Superintendent of Police had informed the Police Magistrate, that the man had acted under his orders, and offered to be responsible for his appearance at any time; but the Magistrate proceeded to incarcerate him, and peremptorily refused to release him, except on bail of 500 Rs. A quarrel among the Magistrates is always a jubilee to the rogues.—The Editor of the Harkness, not having the Report of the Committee on Transportation, published by order of the House of Commons, under his eye, has actually, in his paper of this morning, perpetrated the remark, that next to visiting Old England, "we fancy many of our readers would delight in a trip to New Holland," to the fiction of the fifth continent.—We rejoice to find from the Courier, that the health of Mr. James Princep has been materially benefited by the voyage home; and that on the 15th March, he was said to be completely recovered. May he return among us with renovated health of body and mind to complete his researches into the ancient history of this country.—Accounts from Candahar via Peshawar state, that the Chiefs fled to Peshawar, just as the British troops were ready to storm the place; that the occupation of it had begun to produce a good effect in Afghanistan; that Dost Mahomed had been offered a lakh of Rupees a year, and an asylum in our territory. The Peshwa whom we captured, had nine lakhs a year given him; and if he lives another year or two, (and he has the longevity of a penderer.) will have eaten up one crore of the Company's Rupees.—Runjeet Singh has not advanced his troops towards Calcutta, as he promised us.—The Indigo prospects generally are good, or rather splendid. If the rain will but hold off for a few days, and the rise of the river can be postponed, there will be Indigo enough raised to inundate the market.—The Marine Board has invited tenders for the supply of three lakhs of maunds of Chirra Poonjee Coal, for three years, at eight annas the maund, deliverable in Calcutta.

SATURDAY, JUNE 1.

The Chowringhee Theatre was totally destroyed by fire yesterday morning, about one o'clock. The fire appeared to proceed from the stage; and as there had been a rehearsal of the Pilot on the previous evening, the conflagration is supposed to have grown out of this circumstance. The place was not insured; and the loss to the proprietors will not fall far short of 70,000 Rupees.—The Mahatma Chieftains of Poona have subscribed two thousand Rupees to the Testimonial, about the raised at Bombay, to the memory of the late Sir Robert Grant.—The Bombay papers state, that the Atlanta, which is about to start immediately for Suva, is so overlaid with articles for Aden, that there is little chance of a prosperous voyage.—The papers are full of dissensions regarding the suppression of Major General Nott, in the ARMY OF THE INDUS, by Major General Willebire.

But it appears that the complaints of partiality to the Queen's troops, have no existence whatever; and that there is no injustice in the case.—It is stated in the letters which have been received from the Army beyond the Indus, that the disposition of the people of Candahar towards Shah Sojah, has undergone a great change; that the former mistrust has been exchanged for confidence; and that he has been received with open arms ever since his accession became established.—We give, among our extracts, a curious Proclamation by a most Holy Hindoo of Bombay, in reference to the recent conversion of the two Parsee ladies. He states that the religion of the Padrees is gradually gaining ground; and he invites all classes of the Natives to abstain from sending their children to their Institutions.

MONDAY, JUNE 3.

Full particulars have, at length, been received of the occupation of Candahar by the British troops. Shah Sojah entered it, surrounded by his own troops on the 23rd of April, and was cordially received.—A meeting of the Mechanics' Institute was held on the 31st. About a hundred and fifty gentlemen assembled. The Chairman stated that there was a balance in favour of the Institution, at the Union Bank, of more than 7,000 Rs. It was proposed to raise an additional fund for a building. This gave rise to an angry, and a very creditable discussion, and the question was at length postponed.—Bengal Bank Shares still continue depressed. They may be purchased at 2,000 Rs. premium, including the forthcoming dividend. The four per cents. also continue to fall. The transfer loan, which fetched a premium of sixteen per cent. may now be done at ten.—The Bombay papers contradict the report, that the Atlanta has gone out overladen. She has nothing but her coal. The number of covers taken by her on this occasion, amounts to 11,853. The express from Madras, with accounts of the disturbances in China, brought to that port by the Good Success, arrived, unfortunately, two days after the departure of the Mail.—Most authentic news has been received, that Ranjeet Sing has lost all power of speech, and that his limbs are become stiff through dropsy. His death is hourly expected. The Maha Rajah, though no coward, has died so many times before his death, that his death, whenever it does occur, will not be credited.—Intelligence has been received to a late date from the Burmese empire; all was quiet; the Acting Resident was on good terms with the Princes and Ministers, and trade at Rangoon was reviving. Every thing wore a peaceful aspect.—Two vessels had lately proceeded to Tavoy, and there obtained good cargoes of rice. This is at present the sole object of export from thence. A new coal field has been lately discovered in the province of Mergal, equal in quality, but infinitely superior in accessibility, to that which was last discovered.—The King of Oude is determined to draw from the obscurity into which they have been thrown, the valuable collection of Persian, English, French and other books, that have accumulated from generation to generation at Lucknow, and to form them into a good library.

TUESDAY, JUNE 4.

The annual prizes to the students of the Government Sungkrit College, were distributed on Saturday last. The Chief Justice conducted the business of the day. The prizes were all in money; the highest, Two Hundred Rupees; the aggregate, four-hundred Rupees.—A very gratifying meeting was held at Barmahore, on the 28th ult., to further the establishment of a strong communication between England and India. The Native gentlemen, who attended, were induced to subscribe for fifty shares.—Sir Frederick Mailland is coming round immediately to Bengal, in his flag-ship, the Wellington. This movement has, doubtless, an intimate connection with the recent affairs in China.—It is stated that the Governor General will visit Lahore, in the ensuing cold season.—Ninety-seven of the robbers, who, a short time since attacked the Malwa Treasury, have been taken. The gang fought desperately, and had about forty of their number either killed or wounded.—Letters from Quetta, of the 21 of May, mention that it was expected that Sir John Keane with Shah Sojah, would leave Candahar for Cabul, on the 24th of May; and that the troops of Quetta would march towards Candahar on the 10th of May.—Mr. J. K. Campbell, who left Calcutta as a passenger in the bark Eleonor last month, has returned to Calcutta in charge of a vessel which the Eleonor encountered at sea in distress. She had been out two months at sea; was bound to Madras, and the men did not know where they were. They had neither water nor provisions. Mr. Campbell quitted the Eleonor and took charge of the distressed brig, and brought her safe into Saugor.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 5.

The Englishman of this morning contains a letter addressed by Mr. Piddington, to those interested in the Opium trade at Calcutta, Bombay and Canton, pointing out a mode in which the vigilance of the Chinese Government may be defeated, and Opium smuggled into that country. The Opium trade, however, having once put the Tea trade in jeopardy, is now past redemption.—A subscription has been opened in Calcutta, in aid of the Secretary of the Chancery Theatre, and his family, who have lost all their property by the fire. The Lord Bishop has opened it with a liberal donation of a hundred Rupees.—A royal salute was fired from the ramparts of Fort William, about 5 p. m. on Monday last, in consequence of the occupation of Candahar by the British troops.—A meeting of the Proprietors of the Union Bank, will be held this day at noon, for the purpose of finally adopting, or otherwise, the new Bank Deed, and deciding on the propriety of increasing the joint stock of the Institution to one crore of Rupees.—The Harbuck of this morning proposes, that the Enterprise Steamer be sent to Suva. The first enquiry on such a proposal should be, whether a vessel, whose engines are so utterly inadequate to her size, can perform the voyage at this season of the year.—If, Mr. Miss Favourite, has just left Calcutta to take up her station at Moulemein and Rangoon.

We beg to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of the following sums for the Friend of India:

CONTEMPORARY SELECTIONS.

NUMBER.—A WARNING.

BE PROPRIETORS OF FRIENDS.—The Padrees have hitherto much perverted the faith of Hindoo and others, and the Padrees, now residing in Bombay being more united than any other caste, having heard that two lads have been converted, have been a little incensed. The religion of the Padrees is gradually gaining ground among us, we therefore earnestly entreat all the people not to send their boys to the Padrees' Institution, because the two boys converted the Padrees' have been in the habit of attending the Padrees' Institution, and the Padrees were in the habit of teaching them the religion of Jesus Christ every day, and by exhorting these weak minded children, they got them to embrace their religion, and thus the Padrees ensnare those boys who attend their school, and such will be the condition of those youths attending their Institution, who have not yet acquired knowledge of their own religion, and let all take care and place their boys in a school in which they may learn wisdom and their own religion, so that the boys having obtained a clear knowledge of their own religion, such an overwhelming calamity may never again befall us. Happily some may object that their means will not allow them to give their children an education. We answer them that there are many Government Schools in several places for English, Marathi, Gujarathi, Parsee, &c., founded for the education of the poorer classes, let them send their children thither, but never to the Padrees' School. For this we can give a very weighty reason, viz, that parents desire their children to be educated that they may obtain employment and support them in their old age, so that they may end their days with joy. But if a parent should in this hope, send his son to the Padrees' school, and be disappointed, and his son go away from him, then of what advantage will the boy's education be to his father; again, should the convert have a young wife, with what grief will her father and mother-in-law look upon her, she will be a widow all her life; and will be obliged to continue in that state. How grievous is this!

After all these painful considerations, a stone itself would sweat. The Padrees' schools are the causes of all these calamities; therefore, we warn the people with one mind not to send their children to the Padrees' school.

PROHIBITION OF THEATRE.

The destruction of the Clarendon Theatre by fire continues to be a marvellous subject of discussion in most of our town circles. All the world knows and admits that of late the clerk of the assembly had several times been heard of kept about;—that the theatre was little better than a collection of dirty rags;—that the warble he was a mass of faded theory;—that the clerk of leaked;—that people fed into a habit of smoking cheroots in the house;—that blood and rant and dream the super-natural, had superseded poetry and probability;—that the aristocracy rarely contemplated the performances;—that, in short, the drama had fallen here as elsewhere into the wear and yellow leaf. All the world, we say, knew this, and yet the lamentations over the destruction of the house are almost universal. Better days were in their hoped-for;—things had reached their very worst, and the next revolution in the wheel, would, it was thought, have given us good plays and good actors. Besides, the theatre was, if nothing else, a monument of peace and rights;—it was hallowed, we may say, by innumerable delicious memories. We lose it, therefore, as we should lose a worn out horse, or a scape grace son, with emotions of regret, because it once yielded pleasure—was once an object of affection.—Exp. Jour.

THE CHRISTIAN INSTITUTION AT BHOWANIPUR.—This institution was originally intended for the education of the children of native clerics with a view, if they should give indications of religious as well as mental ability for the work, to their becoming catechists and missionaries in their own countrymen. It still retains that distinctive character, sixteen Christian youths are boarded, clothed and educated at the Society's expense; the managers have been advised, however, making Hindoo and Mussulman youth. The number of scholars has increased so rapidly, that the London Missionary Society, with which it is connected, have deputed one missionary to its superintendence—he is assisted by three competent East Indian Teachers, besides native assistants. A paid religious service is conducted every Lord's Day morning, at which the majority of the people attend,—their number is, we believe, at present, about 400. The gospel is fully and openly taught in this school, and has been from the first, and although it is situated in the very centre of a most Brahminical neighbourhood, and on the high road to Kala Ghat, it is increasingly attended, and what is still more singular, the larger proportion of the pupils are Brahmin boys.—Calcutta Christian Advocate.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE CHURCH MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.—We regret that we were unavoidably absent from the annual meeting of the Church Missionary Society, which was held in the Old Church House, on the evening of Tuesday, the 25th of May,—the Venerable the Archbishop of Calcutta in the chair. We are happy to hear, however, that the meeting was well attended. From the report we learn that the Society has been pursuing the even tenor of its way during the past year. Both in the scholastic and preaching departments, the same scrupulous means have been employed as in previous years.—We hope to notice the report more at length when it shall appear in print of form. The meeting was presided over by the Venerable the Archbishop—the Rev. Wm. Wyldon, T. Sandys, and Pratt, Messrs. G. Edgry, W. Byrnes, G. Kirby and W. Ryland, Esqrs., and Captain L. . . The following resolutions were unanimously adopted:—the meeting:—

Moved by the Rev. T. Sandys, seconded by G. Edgry, Esq. 1st.—That the report next read be adopted and published for general information.

Moved by the Rev. E. Wyldon, seconded by G. Kirby, Esq. 2d.—That the extent and nature of the functions of the Association are such as to justify such a measure of support on the part of the Christian community, as may, under the divine blessing, lead to a confluence in their labours in behalf of the moral and spiritual welfare of the native population of Calcutta and its vicinity.

Moved by the Rev. Mr. Pratt, seconded by Wm. Byrnes, Esq.

3d.—That the Meeting desires most cordially to join in the sentiments which are expressed in the report, of dependence upon the divine blessing for success in all such labours as have in view the salvation of the souls of men.

Moved by W. Ryland, Esq. seconded by Captain Long. 4th.—That the Rev. Messrs. K. M. Banerjee, T. Sandys, J. C. Thompson, F. Wyldon; and Messrs. W. Halston, Wm. Byrnes, William Byrne, J. T. Cameron, G. Kerr, J. Kirby, E. Edmund, W. H. Perkins, D. W. Madge, J. Richardson, W. Ryland, and M. D. Rogers, be the Committee of Management. Moved by the Rev. T. Sandys, seconded by W. Byrnes, Esq. 5th.—That the thanks of the Meeting be given to the Chairman.

We wish the Society much prosperity from the presence of God during the new year on which it has entered.—Ibid.

THE NEW EPISCOPAL NATIVE CHURCH, CORNWALLIS-SQUARE.—The new Episcopal Church in Cornwallis Square, W.P., we believe, be opened for divine worship in the course of the next month. It is a very chaste and ornamental building, and together with the parsonage house, brings to our recollection many a scene endured by a thousand delightful recollections in the far away country. It reflects great credit upon the pious founders and on the architect, Mr. Van. May it be said of it in the day of reckoning, "this is and that man was born there."—Ibid.

There is a long article in the last Number of the Friend of India, on the subject of the connection of the Government of India with industry, which, as it is chiefly in reply to another contemporary, we do not republish. We are quite of opinion, that it was high time the Government should come to derive a revenue from such a source as the pilgrim tax; but if a tax is to be levied, it must, we presume, be levied by the authority of Government, be who will the receivers of it, whether the Dharmu Sahib, or any other body; and in that case, our interference with this fund cannot wholly cease. Suppose a complete sale of misappropriation or of oppression in the collection of it? Why, then, there will be an appeal to the courts of law in the first instance; but what, if they decide, that the Government administrators of the fund have proved dishonest, or are therefore unworthy to trust? Who in that case is to levy the tax? Is it created? The Government, of course, is the paramount curator of all trusts; since the produce of the tax, must be considered a fund collected in trust for, and in behalf of pilgrims resorting to the holy shrines. It appears to us, then, first although it is quite easy and perfectly proper for an enlightened Government to renounce all revenue derived from superstitious rites, it is neither easy, nor in any respect proper, that they should renounce interference of a protective character. The clamour raised against such interference, is, in fact, based upon a fallacy which we have over and over again exposed, but which is ingeniously repeated, in order to gain, by an appeal to passion and bigotry, a purpose which reason could not secure. We mean the fallacy which assumes the Government of India to be a Christian Government. We deny it. The Government of India is neither Christian, Hindoo nor Mohammedan. The Muslim Government may, indeed, be Christian; but there is no law now which renders that indispensable, for a Hindu or a Mohammedan is admissible, in so far as the law is concerned, as a Member of Council. True, indeed, the precious West character of Indian liberty, patting in a double sense with the characteristic pious faith of the party, in declaring all fellow State agents to be Natives, without distinction of religion or caste, keeps open the condition imposed by the Company, with the sanction of the Board of Control, that renders the privilege nominal as higher offices—the condition that the Native must be educated; but according to the declared will of the British Legislature, a Native of any religion is eligible for the highest offices of state, if qualified for them. How, then, can we predicate of this Government, that it is a Christian Government? As we have once observed, we consider the Protestant Church of Ireland an abuse; but even its furious Orange advocates, in its support, admit the principle, that a state religion must be that of the majority of the people; and try to make out their position.

by treating Ireland for the purpose of this argument, as identified with England, though in every thing else, except paying tithes and taxes, they have maintained a distinction between them sufficiently wide and bold; but neither on that principle nor on any other can the Government of India be termed a Christian Government, or called upon to govern the people of this country, as if it were so.

The use of this epithet Christian, as applied to the Government of British India, is indeed most insolent and ought to be exposed and reprobated, when ever it is employed. When those who use it, call upon the Government to legislate as a "Christian Government," to decide on the merits of any given law or measure of policy, not as respects its justice to the people, but its Christian character, we can form a guess how far some of them would go, if the executive only responded to the fanatical spirit they display; but we sincerely trust they will ever make such appeals in vain. We do not apply these remarks to the Friend of India, though they are suggested by his use of the epithet to which we object; but to those who carry their zeal much farther. If ever the British Government of India should repulse the principle implied in the epithet "Christian," which certain schools are continually applying to it, then, even if the spirit of the age should be too strong for direct persecution to rear its abominable head in this country, every species of indirect persecution would be the inevitable result. No enlightened ruler, however, ever has been in the ad hoc expedient appeals of ultra-reformers, to any such deviation from the main line of justice and good policy. If our empire be indeed an empire of opinion, it is certain, that there is no opinion of the people which tends so much to the security of our dominion as this, that they will ever be protected in the exercise of their religion. However, then, we may and ought to exclude all revenue or profit derived from religious rites or ceremonies, it is utterly impossible, consistently with the principles on which we profess to govern this country, to exclude, for any small amount, the solemn religious and ceremonial observances which, in other words, without any pretence from superstition, there is, indeed, one half of the empire, which our Government, even if the majority of its members were sincere Christians, would do well ever to recognise—that of doing out to others as we would they should do unto us." On that principle, naturally, we shall never withdraw all protection from the religion of the people.—Edw. A. A.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR,—In the last number of the Quarterly Review which has yet reached India, there is an article which appears likely to do much mischief among that class of readers who are willing to accept implicitly the representations of that popular periodical, instead of taking the trouble to read and judge for themselves. The article in question, viz., the review of the "Life of Wilberforce," is peculiarly calculated to encourage this insolent spirit.

By its depreciating manner of speaking of that interesting and valuable work; its plausible objections, and its affected candour; its professed respect for Wilberforce, and its real detraction of his character, I believe many lazy readers have been induced to forego the pleasure and profit which they might have obtained from the work itself, and to rest satisfied with the impression given by the Quarterly, that it is not worth reading.

There are, doubtless, some literary imperfections in the work; many of the extracts from Mr. Wilberforce's diary, were too unimportant to be given to the public. They were evidently merely memoranda for his own convenience; a sort of catchwords to help his recollection. The mixing up and dovetailing his journal with the conversations of a later period is also injudicious, and has an awkward and perplexing effect. Some of the most important events in his life are noticed in a hasty and cursory manner, which contrasts ill with the dwelling on more trivial matters in other parts of the book. Still, notwithstanding these few defects, it is a most valuable and interesting piece of Christian biography; and its personal ought not to be without profit to all classes of readers. Its merit is like the character of his eloquence,—not so striking at first as that of some other orators,—yet it was of the finest class, because it always worked upon the hearts of the hearers;—on his life and diary show the plain, simple, easy steps by which he attained his eminent faithfulness and usefulness, walking really as a child before God, as simple, and as humble.

The Editors were in possession of ample materials, from which they have selected, according to the best of their judgment, whatever appeared to them most desirable; and they have succeeded in giving to the world a most useful and delightful work, though in some few instances, the reader's judgment may differ from theirs. The writer of the article in the Quarterly, however, shrewd and clever, is well known as one of the most independent critics of the day. He has been not unaptly termed, "the cobra capella of literature." Perhaps no living writer is more uniformly ingenious in giving an unfair impression of the tendency of a book, or the spirit of a character. The personal of the book is generally the best antidote to the criticism. In the review of the "Life of Wilberforce," all the literary defects are studiously brought to notice; the unjust and ungenerous insinuation of its having been written for money is thrown out; all those passages which might have been better omitted, are carefully extracted; every infirmity in the character of Wilberforce is repeatedly commented on; every failing magnified; every virtue depreciated; every Christian grace misrepresented; and, without any direct assertions, the impression is left on the mind, that the work is an ill-written catchpenny, and Wilberforce himself a poor second-rate character; fanatical in religion; vacillating in politics; capricious and unstable in all his ways. Happily, Mr. Wilberforce's fame cannot be really affected by the representations of an anonymous writer in an ephemeral periodical. All the most distinguished of his contemporaries have borne their testimony to his powers; and his own writings and actions; his words and his deeds, are sufficient evidence of the mode in which those powers were employed; and the important measures he was able to carry, notwithstanding long-continued and powerful opposition, are clear and convincing proofs of his eloquence, his influence, his benevolence, his energy and his perseverance. Still, though the reputation of Mr. Wilberforce is above injury, the beneficial effect of his example may be seriously diminished and counteracted by the insinuations and anti-divergences of the Quarterly; and it is, therefore, well, to take notice of their unfounded and unsubstantial nature.

The Reviewer's objections to Mr. Wilberforce's religious diary are very comprehensible. Of course, his spiritual conflicts, distresses, and self-reproaches must be most surprising and unintelligible to all who have not experienced that same hidden warfare. The real state of the case is betrayed with much simplicity by the poor Reviewer's exclamation: "If Wilberforce was justified in thus reproaching himself; what terms of self-condemnation are sufficient for common men?" It is much to be wished that the same question may suggest itself to every reader of the work.

With regard to Mr. Wilberforce's political career, though I confess myself to be as staunch a Tory as any Quarterly Reviewer in existence, I can, nevertheless, render my unfeigned admiration to the unblemished integrity and unvarying independence which are his noble and rarer public virtues than even political consistency. Dr. Chalmers has long ago ably advocated the cause of political impartiality. His remarks on the subject are, indeed, a complete answer to the strictures of this Reviewer. The entire passage, though well worthy of attention, is too long for quotation; but the following paragraphs are peculiarly and strikingly applicable to the character of Mr. Wilberforce.

After noticing the probable indifference of a Christian to the minor details of politics, partyship, charges of administration, &c., Dr. Chalmers proceeds to observe, that such a man, "if in Parliament, will sit and vote like a conscientious jurymen on the specific merits of every question that comes before him; we believe that, acting on the guidance of such a principle as this, he will, under every successive change of the Cabinet, vote generally with Ministers, and occasionally against them. It is so much more the interest of every Administration to be right than wrong, that it were strange, indeed, if they blundered the matter so systematically, as to be wrong in any thing like a majority of instances. And, hence, this man of simplicity, who sits loose to the profit, and is alive only to the principle, of our domestic politics, while, by his habitual deviations from the Ministry, he forfeits all confidence as a steadfast and thorough-going adherent of theirs, will, by his more habitual dissent from the measures of Opposition, call down from the other party, a far severer weight of reprobation."

Again: "But after all, it may be asked, of what possible use are such men of simplicity and golly sincerity in Parliament?—men, of whom you are never sure on what side to find them; and whose whole line of proceeding is a constant mockery on the expectations of party. And, were there no higher principle in politics, than those which characterize and mark off the distinctions of party, the question were altogether called for. But there are higher principles. The cause of order and general government is a higher cause, than the cause of any Administration; and often, in periods of turbulence and national distress, this cause is endangered; and it is not the suspected testimony of the partisan, but the testimony of the patriot, that is of any power to still the commotion. It is not the man of thorough-paced devotion to his party, under all the fluctuation of its principles; but the man of steadfast devotion to principle under all the fluctuations of party—it is he, and he alone, who can lift a voice of authority that will be listened to, amid that deafening noise which, at times, is heard to rise, in one appalling outcry of menace and discontent, from all quarters of the land. . . . .

Were this his solitary service, it were enough to stamp upon him a character of far higher value, than any unvarying adherent, either of Ministry or Opposition can lay claim to. But the truth is, that his presence in the Legislature is of daily and perpetual benefit. He bears with him, at all times, an unseen force of control over the motions of Government; and each of the parties, though they may be ashamed to acknowledge it, are yielding him a constant homage, and rendering to his principles and views a constant accommodation. The man who is ever to be found on a higher walk of consistency, than the consistency of mere partisanship, cannot be disregarded with impunity. There is both a moral compulsion in the worth of his own character; and a still more palpable compulsion in the weight of his opinions, over the best and most wholesome part of the community. It is thus that he obtains an unknown ascendancy in Parliament, not visible, in nearly its full extent, to the public eye; but most distinctly and powerfully felt in all those modifying processes under which every bill is shaped and prepared, ere it is brought ostensibly forward. If parties be indispensable to the business of a large deliberative assembly; if the machinery will not work without them; if there be no going on, unless a certain number of hands on each side of the vessel keep steadily by the tackling, at which they are respectively stationed—let the many be enlisted into this needful service, if needful it really be; but let us never want the men of purer and loftier character, who bring thought, and conscience, and moral principle into contact with each specific movement of this great national engine—who make the freshness and simplicity of their own individual worth to bear on all its operations—and who, taking no part in the game of competition between the two parties, but often derided as anomalous by them both, are, nevertheless, of mighty influence in staying both the corrupt encroachments of the one, and the factious extravagance of the other."

Such a man was Wilberforce: such were his principles, and such his power. "The memory of the just is blessed;" and votes from three-quarters of the globe unite to bless his memory. His influence over every good cause in Europe is well known; India owes to him a Church establishment, and the permission for Missionary labour; and Africa, every justice and every benefit which have been accorded to her in modern times. Every attempt to lower the tone of that well-deserved blessing, and to chill the veneration for that honoured memory, must be equally painful to those who know his real character, and pernicious to those who know it not. It is with the hope of lessening prejudice, and strengthening, in some minds, the influence of that bright example, that these few remarks have been thrown together; and I venture to request their insertion in the Friend of India, as I feel well assured that the freest tribute to the memory of Wilberforce, cannot but be welcome to the successors of Carey and of Marshman.

Yours most obediently,

CHRISTIAN JUDGES AND MAGISTRATES COMPELLING NATIVES TO SWEAR IDOLATROUS OATHS.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

SIR,—I have read with much interest the papers in your Journal, and in the Christian Observer, upon the administration of Idolatrous Oaths, by Christian Judges. I am happy to see the subject discussed; it is a great evil, and the remedy appears simple. The experience of public officers in this matter, if given, might lead to suggestions for the re-organization of the system. My own experience in performance of the duties of a Judge and Magistrate is this: I have always considered that the habit of compelling every Native to take an oath, whose deposition is required to be taken in our Courts, tends directly and powerfully to exclude from our tribunals, as witnesses, the most respectable class of Native society. They look upon taking an oath, as a degradation inflicted upon themselves; and a justice requires that the truth of any matter should be elicited, the respectable portion of the community, who know the particulars, and whose testimony could be more relied upon than that of other classes, may be expected to practice every evasion—to say they are sick, or in ignorance of the whole matter, in order to avoid the humiliation of being exposed in our Courts, where they are disgraced by being compelled, in the face of the people, to take an oath which they abhor!

A respectable Hindoo, a public officer of Government, on being asked what he thought of—, one of the Hindoo gentlemen most held in esteem by the Europeans in Calcutta, applied to him a term of contempt, because he had taken an oath in the Supreme Court! Many Hindoos positively refuse to take an oath!

I used often to administer justice without demanding an oath from each witness. If respectable Natives knew that they would escape this degradation, they would be less backward in attending the numerous to attend our Courts.

I have often, without reflecting upon the nature of the proceeding, and following the custom of others, in the exercise of judicial duties, required Hindoos to swear idolatrous oaths by the water of the Ganges, and Noosulmanas to swear by the Koran; though, upon reflection, it is certainly to let down the character of a Christian Judge or Magistrate, to require and to superintend the administration of idolatrous oaths!

It is certainly a most inconsistent process for a Christian Judge, in the administration of justice, to attempt to rear the superstructure of truth upon a foundation of acknowledged falsehood!—unnecessarily to compel witnesses to swear by false gods!—to offend the only one true God, by calling into the Courts of Christian justice, priests of Baal to invoke idols! For a Brahman usual attends to administer the oath!

Nor is there any necessity, politically or judicially, for this honour being paid to idols in Christian Courts of Justice. On the contrary, the demand for such idolatrous oaths is repugnant to the witnesses, and appears distinctly to impede the administration of justice.

If to satisfy English prejudices in the demand for oath-oaths must be taken; the inhabitants of India, high and low, are all, so far as my experience goes, ready to execute what is called a "Hafiz-namah;" that is, to sign an oath, declaring as in the presence of the Omnipresent God, that they will speak the truth. Here no idol is invoked.

I had once occasion to administer an oath to a Nawab of high rank, in a case of much importance, and I did so by his signing this written oath. Why, then, compel men to swear by the Koran? Why, do honour to it, in a Christian Court, by obliging men against their wills, to swear by it as a volume of truth? Is not the name of Almighty God enough to swear by, that we should invoke idols? As an old servant and hearty well-wisher of the Company, I sincerely wish the abolition of heathen oaths.

I have been in the habit of administering an oath, without the invocation of Idols, both to Hindoos and Mussulmans in this effect:

"I swear, as in the sight of the all-seeing and Omnipotent God, who will recompense men according to their deeds, whether they speak truth or falsehood, that the testimony I am about to give, shall be truth, and nothing but the truth."

The Christian Observer for this month (May) has the following striking passage:

"It is a token for good to India, when Christian Magistrates begin to question the propriety of being wardens of Satan's Temples, receivers of Satan's Taxes, and administrators of Satan's Oaths—for all Idolatry is of the Devil."

The following passage from the same work is worthy the serious consideration of our Rulers, and of individual Christians, in these days of threatened danger. We cannot, by any possibility, exclude ALMIGHTY GOD from this Government of affairs on Earth. He will rule and direct all things after the counsel of His will—let us not, therefore, venture longer to insult Him, and provoke His high displeasure. He has declared himself to be "A JEALOUS GOD," who will punish iniquity; and has said, "Thou shalt have NOSE OTHER GODS NOT ME." Let us beware how we actually become the stewards and wardens of other gods and their temples. Let us beware how we, as a Government, or as individuals, compel the Heathens to acknowledge other Gods in our very Courts of Justice! What, if God be saying to us, "Shall I not be avenged upon such a nation as this?"

"We fear," says the Christian Observer for this month, "that much of the displeasure of Almighty God rests in our administration of this land—upon governors and governed—and upon all concerned in the upholding or executing of a system so hateful in His sight, as swearing by Idol Gods, and other abominations. There is nothing clearer in the whole Bible, than that wherever Idolatry exists, there the anger of God dwells; and that his displeasure was ever hottest against his own people, when they joined themselves with the inhabitants of the land to their idolatrous practices, as we are now doing in this heathen country. Let us, then, take heed lest, by our simple compromise, we bring on ourselves the only evil which the Christian cannot resist, the anger of God.

"We are encouraging the inhabitants of the land in their superstition and idolatry. The justice which we dispense among them—such justice as they never knew before—is not the fruit of false religion; but of true; not of Heathenism or Mahomedanism, but of Christianity. If we, then, transfer the fruits of pure and undivided religion, and connect them with that which is impure and defiled, we hold out all the rightful bounties and fruits of that which is good, in judicial or civil union, with that which is evil. Let us do justice to idolaters, as to all men; but let us not engraft our justice upon their idolatry. These are two distinct things; let us confer upon them every rich benefit of our heavenly divine religion; but let it not be in such a manner, as to make them think that they may have the fruit, without the tree; that Christian justice can grow on the stem of idolatrous swearing. To convey such an impression, is to encourage men in their present base superstitions. Again, we say, let us do justice to all sinners; but let us not seek to engraft the administration of that justice upon any form of their sin."

I remain, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

FRIEND TO JUSTICE, AND A SINCERE WELL-WISHER OF THE COMPASS'S GOVERNMENT.

To the Editors of the Friend of India.

MR DEAR SIRS,—A late number of your esteemed Journal had an article headed, "The Administration of Heathen Oaths;" the perusal of which has refreshed my intention of writing a few lines on the subject, which I had in my contemplation, as it is the duty of every individual to afford his assistance in procuring a clear understanding on subjects of public utility. I shall embrace the opportunity afforded by you, to lay before the public the information which I have from time to time obtained on the subject.

2. My firm conviction is, that oaths might be dispensed with altogether, without, in any degree, detracting from the value of evidence; and much good would result from the measure, and save both the functionaries and the people from droning with, and compelling, to superstitious oaths. But, before advancing farther, I must strive to shew, whether administering oaths do in any way tend to elicit truth. My opinion is, that he who speaks a lie when a witness without an oath, in any important facts, knowing that life and death are in his hands, would not speak truth, if an oath were administered to him; and, moreover, I am inclined to think, that the oath administered in the Courts, is seldom viewed with any degree of awe and reverence by the witnesses, under the plea that an sacredness of the water is preserved, when touched by the 3fathos (as are Europeans and Mahomedans called); and, therefore, there should be little or no harm, say they, to tell lies in their statements, when, in the presence of, and on the same bed, with the Magistrate and the Mussulman Amlah.

3. Having stated, that administering oaths does not tend to elicit truth, as far as my present means allowed, I now come to show the ill consequences which it unavoidably produces. The Civil and Criminal Courts are deprived of respectable witnesses, who generally put themselves aloof from the Courts, from the dread of being put on oath. Moreover, when the presence of some respectable or rich men is absolutely necessary, and their property is attached by the Court's orders, they persuade some poor ignorant man, and sometimes those who deal in false swearing, to assume their names, and give certain evidence in which they instruct them. What a defect is this in our legislation! Had not it been better to omit it altogether, which would have secured the presence of more respectable witnesses?

4. Now, oaths by habit have become so common, that the men who submit by false swearing, are numerous; so much so, that in the Zillah Courts of Justice, half a Rupee is quite sufficient a remuneration for a Subditi (as are those who so far feign to be) and even in the Supreme Court of Judicature at the Presidency, there are a certain class of people who submit themselves in this way, and would accept giving evidence for 2 or 3 Rupees. They are a clever kind of men, and are qualified to play strange ricks when answering questions put to them by the Judges.

5. It would be premature now to speak much of the beneficial results which would accrue from abolishing this custom; which has, instead of being the source of eliciting truth, become a means of great abuse to our existing laws. The operation, when commenced upon, with an order, that the false testimony be visited with the penalties of perjury, will speak for itself. I have, therefore, brought my present article at an end; and will take up my pen again when called upon by my feelings.

I am, my dear Sirs,

Very sincerely yours,
T. X. SEX.

IMMEDIATE.

Copy of a DESPATCH, dated 8th August, 1838, relating to the withdrawal of Interference with the RELIGIOUS CEREMONIES of the Native of India.

REVENUE DEPARTMENT.

Our Governor-General of India in Council.

London, 14th August, 1838.

1. Our Chairman has laid before us a letter, which has been addressed to him by Sir Peregrine Maitland, dated the 1st February last, tendering his resignation of the office of Commander-in-Chief at Madras, upon the ground of our Despatch to you in the Revenue Department, dated the 18th October last, in which we committed in the discretion of your Government, as indeed we had previously done in our despatches of the 20th February, 1833, and 22nd Feb. 1837, No. 4, the settlement of all questions affecting the religion of the natives of India.

2. We transmit copy of Sir Peregrine Maitland's letter for your information, and in so doing, we think it necessary to state, that he is mistaken in assuming that it is our desire to disquiet from our orders, under date the 20th February, 1838. Our object, in addressing you in October last, was to secure to you the unfettered exercise of the powers and instructions which we deliberately conveyed to you in our Despatch of the 20th February, 1833, by eluding proceedings on the part of the subordinate which, the cohesive principle being neutralised, decomposition is clearly but steadily proceeding."—Christ. Adv.

MARTINIANUS LARSENSEN IN STOCKHOLM.—It is at length (writes Mr. Scott, under date of Stockholm, Nov. 24,) my happy privilege in communicating that a decision has been pronounced by the Government, granting all that we asked in our memorial, and we even noticing the restrictions proposed, and with such valour and persevering importunity urged, by the Consistory of Stockholm. The principal features of those restrictions were to prevent the Wesleyan missionary from conducting divine service in any other language than the English, or on any other days than Sabbath and holydays; as also from extending any kind of religious aid to others than his own countrymen. In the fourth of the 17th, the royal resolution of the previous day appeared, containing the sanction of His Majesty in the request of the Wesleyan Methodists, for permission to erect a chapel in Stockholm for the public worship of God, without imposing any restriction of any kind.—Ibid.

MARTINIANUS.—A gang of fanatics in Missouri, called Martinians, who pretend to a recent and special revelation from Heaven, have been causing much disturbance in that state. A band of 400 of them have been burning and plundering towns and villages, and committing all sorts of atrocities. They defaced a body of militia sent amongst them, took possession of their small arms and cannon, and were marching to attack the town of Richmond, in Missouri, when the account's left.—Ibid.

SCIENTIFIC.

AN EXPERIMENT was made with complete success with one of Donati's galvanic batteries, under the superintendence of Colonel Pabey, of the Royal Engineers, at half-past 2 o'clock on Sunday, off the gun-shaft, Chatham. 2000s. of powder were exploded in about 10 fathoms of water, the length of the wire conveying the electric fluid being 200 feet; it caused a most tremendous explosion. Three smaller ones were afterwards tried, but only one succeeded; there was a loud rumbling subterranean explosion. The Royal Engineer, at Portsmouth, understands, and has been up to a similar experiment, and the experiment was a complete success.—Manchester Journal.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE PROTECTED BILLS to the amount of 2,000,000*l.* which, they were sent out by the Bank of England to the United States for acceptance have been paid, with the exception of 50*l.* and of the sum 70*l.* has been again secured, while the balance is now paid, and is now—Morning Chronicle.

BRITISH MISERY.—By a Parliamentary Paper, just published, it appears that the total expenses for the year 1858 was 1,100*l.* 1*l.* 6*d.*, and that the number of persons admitted was 2,000.—Ibid.

REPEATED POSTAGE.—THE RESOLUTIONS OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE of the House of Commons on postage recommended a uniform rate of one penny per half ounce, increasing at the rate of one penny for each additional half ounce on all inland letters, so soon as the state of the public revenue will admit of the making a large temporary reduction; that prior to establishing the uniform rate of a penny, it would be expedient in the first instance to reduce the rates on inland general post letters to a uniform rate of twopence per half ounce, increasing at the rate of one penny for each additional half ounce, reversing all the cases of prices current, the letters of soldiers and sailors, and others, now a penny only now is charged; and of the short inland letters, to be charged on a distance of fifteen miles, according to the following recommendation, viz.:—That, considering the weight of concurrent evidence on the evasion of the postage payable between neighbouring towns, and also that the present system of Penny Posts is partial and unequal, a uniform rate of one penny per half ounce ought immediately to be established for all distances not exceeding fifteen miles from the Post Office, where the letter is posted, the payment being made in advance through the medium of some kind of stamp; and that the charge when not so paid in advance should be twopence.—Ibid.

DR. ELLIOTSON, the late Professor of Medicine at University College, and who resigned in consequence of a stoppage put by the council to his magnetic proceedings, has addressed a long farewell letter, consisting of thirty-five pages, to the students, which he transmitted through Mr. Hoffmeister, one of his pupils. Mr. Hoffmeister called a meeting of the students, which was held on Tuesday last, when Mr. Hoffmeister stated, that he had read the document which Dr. Elliotson had entrusted to him, very carefully, and that "he had felt it to be his duty to return the letter to Dr. Elliotson, in order that he might get some other person to make it public. His (Mr. Hoffmeister's) had been compelled to resort to this proceeding, in consequence of the reflections which it contained on the character and conduct of several of Dr. Elliotson's late colleagues and friends of the college. He yielded to a man in respect to Dr. Elliotson, but he also respected the Professors, and he could not, consistently with that feeling of respect, read the letter." Dr. Elliotson, it is said, intends to print it.—Ibid.

EXPERIMENT OF DEATH.—The following is the copy of a paper now widely circulating in Ireland, on the subject of Capital Punishment:—"Christianity Struggling Christianity."—Peculiar exercises may be regarded as the most solemn of murders. Without the gratification of revenge, the impulse of passion, or the madness of drunkenness, one man is employed to strangle in cold blood another man, or boy, woman, or girl; thousands are involved to witness this murder. If no watch sufficiently destitute of fanaticism be obtained to commit the homicide, the Sheriff takes, if one of the leading men of the county) must become the murderer. The clergy are brought forward in the solemn tragedy. In general, either from repugnance, or from some other signs received as tests by the spiritual attendants, the criminal is believed to be one for whom there is hope in eternity. So then, one Christian (for the hangman is also acknowledged as a Christian) is employed for a few shillings to strangle a Christian brother or sister, or in the presence of many thousands of Christian brothers and sisters; a guard of Christian soldiers is arrayed to prevent any possibility of aid from without; and sometimes the Christian comes about with savage delight when the body of the dying Christian is convulsed with the pangs of expiring nature. If the wretched felon be not acknowledged as a Christian, then he is hurried by Christians into the presence of God with the cry of his sin upon his head. Truly the bloody records of British criminal jurisprudence, though it is the most civilized country in the eyes of other nations, viler for refinement, humanity, or enlightened policy.—Ibid.

REINTEGRATION.—At the Mansion-house, on Tuesday, Mr. Holcher, the Prussian Consul, attended by Mr. Holcher, appeared with forty-three natives of Prussia, to conclude of a transaction for which they had been induced to leave Germany for London, and were thence to be shipped as labourers to Demara. It appeared that Dr. Stricker had made a bargain with these men on behalf of Mr. Abraham Green, of Moor-gate, merchant, to serve him in London for one year; and had obtained passports for London. On arriving in this country, however, it appeared that their real destination was Demara; and the Prussian Consul refused to give them passports, as they had not leave from the Prussian Government to emigrate. It did not appear why passports to go from England to Germany were necessary. After a good deal of conversation, the Lord Mayor declined to interfere, except to recommend that three of the Germans, who objected to go to Demara, should be sent to their own country; and Mr. Reeve willingly consented to pay their expenses back again.—Christ. Adv. Dec. 17.

PARAFFINITE SKILL.—A single pound of pig iron, which costs one penny, can be manufactured into watch-springs of the value of 3*l.* 1*l.* 6*d.*

TRAVELLING.—It appears from a Parliamentary paper, that 1,500,000 less persons travelled by stage-coaches in 1858 than in 1845; and 14,400,000 more persons by railway in the same period.—Ibid.

THE LATE PUBLISHER OF THE MORNING CHRONICLE underwent a final examination on Thursday, before Messrs. Teyford and Minshull, the sitting Magistrates, at Bow-street, on a charge of embezzling disbursements, the amount of Mr. Evelyn M. P., and was committed to Newgate for trial. The amount embezzled, according to the evidence, was about 100*l.*—Ibid.

BISHOP'S PALACE REVENUE.—The building of the bishop's palace at Ripon is to be immediately proceeded with.—Hull Times.

DR. SOUTHWELL, the laureate, after remaining in town two or three days, for the purpose of examining some curious manuscripts in the British Museum, relating to the lives of Beaumont and Fletcher, and his favourite poet, Spenser, on which Southwell has been for some time engaged, has taken his departure for the west of England, where he is to be married, at the end of the week, to Miss Bowles.—Ibid.

TRUST-AND-WATER.—Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen, (said Mr. Beaumont, at the last annual meeting of the Bradford Medical Society,) I am not unwilling to obey your call upon me for a toast and a speech, on condition that I am allowed to do it in my own way. I have to request, therefore, that every gentleman will follow my example, by filling his glass with water, instead of wine; and then I shall be most happy to propose a sentiment, and will attempt an address. All the gentlemen present instantly filled their glasses with water; and thus was effected a novel combination of toast-and-water.—Christ. Adv.

TYLES.—A Quaker, villifying the pertinacity of his sect in refusing to give titles to men, gave this whimsical account:—"I had the honour," said he, "one day to be in company with an Excellency and an Honours. His Excellency was the most ignorant and brutal of his species, and his Honours measured just four feet eight inches without shoes."—Ibid.

THE NEGAR TRIP.—It seems that the vessels which bring freight from British North America to the British West India Islands, in order to land back with sugar, do not lay on sugar there, but take it there, and go to Cuba, Porto Rico, or other foreign islands, where they can get it cheaper. British sugars

Dr. Elliotson, the late Professor of Medicine at University College, and who resigned in consequence of a stoppage put by the council to his magnetic proceedings, has addressed a long farewell letter, consisting of thirty-five pages, to the students, which he transmitted through Mr. Hoffmeister, one of his pupils. Mr. Hoffmeister called a meeting of the students, which was held on Tuesday last, when Mr. Hoffmeister stated, that he had read the document which Dr. Elliotson had entrusted to him, very carefully, and that "he had felt it to be his duty to return the letter to Dr. Elliotson, in order that he might get some other person to make it public. Dr. Elliotson, it is said, intends to print it.—Ibid.

are thus in a course of rapid exclusion from the British North American market. This state of things is giving rise to a universal effort among our West India colonies to obtain a high discriminating or prohibitory duty on sugars of a foreign growth. All foreign sugar of the western world (with the exception of Hayti, an island which we should wish to see excepted also from prohibitory duties) is slave-grown sugar, whereas that of our own colonies is now the produce of free labour. To prohibit foreign sugars, therefore, (with the exception above mentioned) would be to prohibit slave produce in favour of free labour produce, and thus to strike a blow of the heaviest and most effective description at slavery itself. The sugar-growers of the United States have taken alarm at the first mention of the subject, as one which "concerns them much more than any thing which has been done for the blacks." The subject has already been taken up by the central committee, who have adopted and presented a memorial to the President of the Board of Trade. We should be very happy if this should be the first step towards the entire prohibition of slave produce in British markets.—British Emancipator.

STUDENT.—FEMALE PRISONERS.—The demand for the women recently arrived was unexampled. Miss Newman, being a very accomplished young woman, was applied for by numerous families, but Miss Excellency has ordered her to continue for some time in the factory. Mr. Spoule, the principal superintendent, has given public notice, that in order to accommodate all, as far as the supply will enable him, he can only permit one servant to a family; several have applied for more than one. None now remain disposable.—Sydney Gazette.

THE NEW MAGISTRATE ACT AND THE HURKAR.—The Hurkar of Friday last has devoted two columns to our remarks on the draft of the new Act for removing the cognizance of suits for petty larceny from the Supreme Court, and vesting it in a Justice of the Peace. In this article various inconsistencies are laid at our door in a strain of impassioned argument, which is prefixed by the assurance that the opposition of the writer will be strenuous, but not intemperate: To exemplify that temperance of language which he has determined to adopt, we are informed that the Act under consideration is "an abortion of Government, concocted in the lust of despotic power, and brought forth like other bastards without a bluish." The whole article is penned in the same strain, and exhibits a fresh instance of the difference between promise and performance.

The Editor is displeased at the representation which we drew of the broad farce of trying a larcenous oozle for trifling thefts in the Supreme Court, and indulges in censure which we shall not imitate, but which, considering the promise of moderation with which he set out, will not fail to amuse the public. The Editor appears, however, to have forgotten that the picture which we drew of the farce, was "sane and lifeless, compared with that which he had drawn, in the previous numbers of his journal. On the 22d of December, the Editor said, "the absurdity of putting such vast machinery in motion, in order to try a poor naked wretch for stealing two old slippers, most probably overvalued at six annas, is not greater than the injustice of keeping a poor wretch in prison for such an offence, perhaps three months before trial, and then awarding him an additional month or two after trial. We have, over and over again, offered our suggestions for remedying this nuisance to judges, nuisance to juries, cruelty to the innocent, and excess of severity to the guilty."

And so late as the 23d of April, the Editor who resents our representation of the ridicule thrown on British jurisprudence by the admission of these contemptible suits into the Supreme Court, adopted the following language on the same subject:

"It never can be well, to expose the gravity of the judicial function, and the solemn tribunals of criminal judicature, to ridicule; but there is scarcely to be found, in the wild customs of Hood's fancy, any thing more absurd or preposterous, than the spectacle of a Judge, with an annual salary of $8,000 per annum, a tribunal, that altogether may cost a crore or two, one grand jury of twenty-three gentlemen, another jury of twelve gentlemen, taken from arduous and important affairs, a sheriff, a deputy sheriff, a clerk of the court, a crier of the Court, &c. &c. all, set in array, to try a poor, naked wretch, whom mulesada fumes has designated to the crime of pilfering a tin shaving pot, overvalued at three annas. We defy either poet or painter, to invent any thing more absurd, than all this. The romance of real life, is said to be more strange than that of fiction; the absurdities of real life, put fiction to the blush. How poor and commonplace, are the extremes of Hood's "innagings," compared with the solemn mockery of the Supreme Court, with all its pride, pomp, and circumstance, sitting in judgement upon a naked wretch, charged with stealing—a tin shaving pot valued at three annas."

To defend our statements, therefore, we have only to appeal from the present views of the Editor, to those which he has presented to the public during the last six months.

"But it is incredible," says the Editor, "that the Friend of India should advocate the propriety of taking advantage of the ignorance of the natives to put them without the pale of the constitution of the country that rules them, and of which India is its right arm;" and this is represented in the preceding sentence as "being an abominable idea." But how does it happen that the gift of the British constitution has been limited to the natives living within the Mahratta Ditch; and that the community on the other side of this imaginary line has no participation whatever in it? If it be so abominable an act to deprive the natives in the city of Calcutta of these inestimable rights; that is to say if it be so abominable an act as to deprive the poor naked wretch,—we adopt the language of the Editor himself on a former occasion—of the right of being tried by a jury, for stealing two old slippers, probably overvalued at six annas, in what terms shall we describe the criminality of the British Government which has continued to deprive a hundred millions of its subjects of this right, for so long a series of years?

That the punishments awarded by the Supreme Court have been much more severe than those awarded by the country courts, has long been a subject of astonishment to the natives. At the same time it cannot be said that the poor native who is brought up before that Court to be judged with all the pride, and pomp and circumstance of Justice, has any greater facilities for making a defence there, than he enjoys in an ordinary tribunal. All the notion therefore, he can have, of the right of being tried by a Jury, is that it carries with it, the risk of a heavier punishment than is awarded to his more fortunate brethren who are endowed with no such right. Before we are charged with inconsistency in extolling the Act, which introduces a simpler, milder, and more expeditious procedure, it might be as well to enquire in what degree of estimation the prisoner himself holds these rights. To talk of the trial by jury, in reference to the natives, as a time honoured institution, is only a waste of words. An Act of Parliament conferred this right on the native within the Mahratta Ditch; and the exercise of it was but lately described in the Hurkar as being a nuisance to judges, nuisance to juries, cruelty to the innocent, and aggravation of severity to the guilty; and the sooner it is abrogated, the better for the cause of humanity.

It is affirmed, that this new Act was concocted in the lust of despotic power. But why should the Editor so soon forget the importunity, with which he assailed Government, and we think with great reason and justice, for some change in the existing law, when on the 22d of December last, he said that "something, if only experimentally, must be done before the next Session; and we hope that our both Judge and Jury feel the mischief, something will be done?" The public has not forgotten the reiterated request of the Grand Jury, that the cognizance of such causes might be removed from the Supreme Court, and lodged in a Magistrate, or in a Quarter Sessions. If the Legislative Council has at length listened to the arguments of the Editor, and to the entreaties of the Grand Jury, why should the act for which the community has called with so unanimous a voice, be deemed an abortion, concocted in the lust of arbitrary power? We thought the lust of despotism had altogether left the Council chamber with the departure of that incomparable despot,

Mr. Macanlay, whose love of liberty was so ardent, that not content with his own share of that blessing, he was incessantly plotting how he could rob others of their also.

The Editor calls this Journal a demi-official organ. We have not the slightest pretensions to such an honour; nor indeed can we conjecture upon what the assumption is founded, except that we happen to find the measures of Government to be praiseworthy, somewhat often than our contemporary. But how will the Editor reconcile the character of a demi-official organ with another article which appeared in the same number of this journal, which he characterizes as one of "severe reprehension?" Would such an organ venture, as he says to "launch a great deal of virtuous indignation," on an omission of the Government of which it was the tool?

The Editor invites our "attention to the solution by enquiry or investigation of another doubt. Whether or not the contemplated Act, as repending an Act of Parliament, be legal or not?" "We tell him," says he, "that it is not." We have long been engaged in investigating this subject, which is one of curious interest, and we feel grateful for his summary solution of the difficulty; but he must excuse the obtuseness of our unbelief. We were the first to raise the question, whether the Local Legislature possessed any such dispensing power. The first occasion on which it was exercised,—the augmentation of the duties on articles imported from England beyond the Parliamentary scale—was one which very closely touched the pecuniary sympathies of the people of England, and was, likely, we thought, to bring the question to an early issue. But no one at home mattered a single complaint at this assumption of power. Year after year, has the Legislative Council stretched forth its unhalloved hands to other Acts, substituting "without a blush, its hasty obstructions," as the Editor describes our Local Acts, for the healthy, legitimate, and noble offspring of the Imperial Legislature. The subject has been mooted in Parliament, and hints have been thrown out that its Omnipotence is daily falling into disrepute in India; but its indignation still slumbers. What are we to infer from this quiescence, but that the Legislative Council possesses the power which it has assumed?

We have defended the present Act, because we believe it will be advantageous to the Judges of the Supreme Court, to the grand and petty Juris, and to the community at large, and beneficial to offenders. The former it will relieve from an intolerable burden; from a nuisance; while the culprit will be exonerated from a protracted imprisonment. Whether the power of awarding punishment shall be assigned to one or two magistrates, or whether there shall be an appeal to the Quarter Sessions, is not germane to the argument between us and the Herbivores, whether the Cooly has an indefeasible right to the time honoured institution of a jury. Though the Editor affirms, that we are determined to "go to the extreme, in our approval of unconstitutional power in the hands of a single magistrate," yet he will find in that same article, a recommendation that two magistrates should assemble to award punishment, if the power be deemed too great for one. If the necessity for an appeal to the Quarter Sessions can be established, let the larcenous cooly have it by all means; any thing, in short, but the old "nuisance."

In a public question like the present, the Editor should avoid all approach to personal allusions. He says that he is startled by seeing such sentiments paraded by any one connected directly or indirectly with the Church, and he proceeds to quote a passage from Clarendon, "that the clergy as a body take the worst measure of affairs of any class of men who can read or write." The author of the article was a layman.

CHINA.—The Rob Roy has at length brought us intelligence from China, to the 5th of May. It relieves our anxiety regarding the safety of the European community at Canton, but confirms the fears of those involved in Opium speculations. The Opium had been gradually delivered up to the Imperial Commissioner, under the official superintendence of Mr. Johnston, to the extent of about seventeen thousand chests, and the Chinese authorities have permitted the trade to be resumed, with some trifling restrictions. Sixteen of the Gentlemen most deeply concerned in the Opium trade were, however, to be detained at Canton until the whole business was settled; all others were at liberty to retire to Macao. Capt. Elliott, the Superintendent, had chartered a clipper, the Drift, to take his despatches to Aden or Suez, and in so doing the return of orders from England; and it was reported, that he intended, as soon as the Opium negotiation had been brought to a close, and all the Europeans had been finally released, to leave Canton and put an entire stop to the trade, until he could receive advice from home. It is also confidently stated, that the merchants in China had determined to abandon the trade, and had written to their Correspondents to suspend all commercial operations with China. Three of the most eminent merchants of the place had been despatched to England, to enforce the claims of the community for an indemnity on the British Government. H. M. S. the Larion, the U. S. Frigate, the Columbia, with her tender, had arrived at Macao. The Chinese Government had also resolved that after a certain period, the officers and crew of any vessel importing Opium should be punished with death, and the British Superintendent together with the American and Dutch consuls had been required to sign bonds to this effect; a demand with which they had peremptorily refused to comply. Such is the substance of the intelligence brought by this opportunity from China.

It is difficult to bring the mind to so calm a consideration of these unexpected and astounding occurrences, as to be able to form any correct notion of the position and prospect of affairs. One thing alone is perfectly clear, that the trade is entirely done up for the present; that no relaxation is to be expected of the vigilance of the Chinese, and that no sooner Government closes its Opium establishments, and its merchants relinquish all connection with the trade, the latter appears that while the Opium was in the course of delivery, some intemperate Europeans endeavoured to renew the smuggling, and Capt. Elliott put forth a proclamation, denouncing such conduct in the severest terms, as placing in jeopardy the lives of all the Europeans there. We think, therefore, that a strong case is made out against the approaching public sale of Opium, which, as the Commissioner Lin has begun to read our English periodicals, will not fail to reach his ear, and to embarrass the future negotiations with Capt. Elliott. Government cannot be supposed to be so pinched for money, as to require the scanty supply which it may produce. A gradual private sale, appears to be required as much from motives of prudence as from those of economy; for to expose so a large quantity to auction under existing circumstances, is in fact to sacrifice it.

It is not improbable, that Capt. Elliott, may put his threat into execution, of laying an embargo on all British trade, until he can obtain directions from home. This would, of course, occasion much individual inconvenience, and entail great loss; but it may be questioned, whether it would not after all be the most prudent course which could be adopted, and whether it would not make a deep and beneficial impression on the Chinese mind. It is impossible that the present outrageous conduct should be passed over without notice. We cannot act, as though these occurrences had never happened, without such a compromise of our character as will entail the most ruinous effects. Wil-out a clear understanding with the Chinese authorities, no safe intercourse can in future be held with them. The impunity of the present outrages, will lead, if it be looked up, to a repetition of it, in a more aggravated form. We have seen that the Chinese authorities made no distinction between those who were innocent of any connection with Opium, and those who were engaged in the trade; and none between nation and nation. All the foreigners at Canton were involved indiscriminately in the measures pursued against the English; and the English residents will, in like manner, be exposed in future to all the risks arising from the smuggling of Opium by other nations, over whom they have no control. Some decisive step must be taken to vindicate our character, and to place our future intercourse upon a secure basis. Of course, the idea of any recurrence to force must be the very last to be entertained. Perhaps the Chinese Commissioner may find that in imprisoning the British Representative, and furiously extorting from him, not only all the Opium which had arrived, but that which was on its way to China, he has incurred a heavy responsibility; and if this be followed up by no decisive demonstration as the suspension of all intercourse for six or seven months, the Chinese may be brought into a mood for a more equitable arrangement than any which their pride has hitherto allowed them to make.

TRANSLATING BY STEAM.—Our worthy contemporary of the Commercial Advertiser has indulged in some very facetious observations on the manufactory of translations by steam at Serampore. We remember to have seen a letter in one of the Calcutta papers some eighteen years ago, stating that marriages were performed by steam at Serampore, under a Royal Licence; and the Governor, at the time took it so much to heart, that such a suspicion should be cast on the settlement, that he offered a reward of Three Hundred Rupees to any one who should discover the slanderer. Since that period the Steam Engine has been confined to its legitimate province of turning logs into paper. We have heard much of late of the universal applicability of the Steam Engine to all the purposes of life: but its employment in effecting translations from one language into another is an unexpected addition to its power. The idea does infinite credit to the ingenuity of the Editor, and, in these days of economy is well worthy the attention of the public authorities. Babbage has invented a calculating machine, and why should we despair of a translating machine to be worked by a high pressure steam engine. It will scarcely admit of a doubt, that if with the assistance of the Commercial Advertiser, such a machine could be added to the steam establishment of the new Mint, and translations could be coined with the same ease as money, it would prove an inestimable blessing to the country. It is a brilliant and original thought, and the imagination kindles at the prospect of those vast and salutary effects which may be expected from the discovery. It will not long continue to be confined to this country, or to the mere manufacture of Native versions of the Company's Regulations. It will pass from clime to clime, and become at once the greatest auxiliary to the spread of knowledge of which the mind has ever yet formed a conception. The curse of Babel, will be deprived of more than half its banefulness. Civilization and improvement will spread with unparalleled rapidity through the world. The heralds of knowledge, with a steam engine and a translating machine, will be enabled instantly to transfuse the intellectual treasures of Europe, into the languages of India and China, and Kamachika. The march of intellect will be expedited into a grand gallop, and the name of the inventor will be wafted to all quarters of the globe, and transmitted in grateful remembrance to the successive generations of mankind. It may also be expected that improvements will be added to the steam translation machine, and that at no distant period, it will be successful in the manufacture of editorial articles, and thus save us and our brethren a world of vexation. In short, there is no limit to the intellectual application of the Steam engine,—when once it begins.

We thank our contemporary for his allusion to the Translator-hip. There is no probability of its being offered to the individual to whom he alludes, namely, to one of the Editors of this paper; and if it were, it would be respectfully but distinctly declined. Circumstances render such an arrangement impossible. If we had entertained the remotest idea of any such offer we should not have taken so indelicate a step as to urge the appointment of a translator with so much importunity. We take no credit to ourselves, when we say that motives of a character very different from those which run in the head of our contemporary have induced us to press the resuming of the translations, and the publication of a Bungalow Gazette. The generous aspirations for the office of translator, have nothing, therefore, to fear from any competition at Serampore. What they have chiefly to dread, is lest Government should adopt the more expeditious and advisable course of effecting the translations by steam, and sending the business to the New Mint.
